Mexican Government Takes Out Full-Page Ads In US Newspapers. The Dallas Morning News (3/21, Mittelstadt) reports, "Worried by the sometimes harsh tone of the immigration debate unfolding in the US, the Mexican government on Monday took its message directly to the American public: As your neighbor, we want to work with you to fashion a solution. In full-page ads in The New York Times, Washington Post and other newspapers, the Mexican government acknowledged a shared responsibility to address illegal immigration and to stem its citizens' northward exodus by creating more jobs at home." Designed by Dallas-based Allyn & Co., the ad says "the US should allow Mexico to participate in the 'design, management, supervision and evaluation' of a guest worker program that should cover 'the largest possible number of workers and their families' currently in the US illegally."

Proposed Tariffs On Chinese Imports Called "Close To Economic Suicide" For US. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Dean, 2.11M) reports, "Morgan Stanley Chief Economist Stephen S. Roach said Tuesday that a successful move by the US Congress to pass sweeping tariffs on imports from China would be 'close to economic suicide' for the U.S." US Sens. Charles Schumer and Lindsey Graham "have proposed a bill that would impose 27.5% tariffs on all Chinese imports unless Beijing sharply revalues its currency." Roach, "in Beijing for meetings with Chinese officials, told reporters Tuesday that he believes that bill would easily pass in the Senate, and could well pass in the House of Representatives as well." He added the tariffs "would be a 'horrible mistake' that could prompt Beijing to cut back on purchases of US treasuries, leading to a weaker dollar and higher interest rates."

French Protesters Call For Strikes Next Week. The New York Times (3/21, Smith, 1.19M) reports, "French students and unions stepped up pressure on the government today, calling for more demonstrations culminating in strikes next week to fight a hotly contested new labor law that makes it easier for companies to fire young employees." The protesters "set March 28 as the fourth 'day of action' since street rallies over the new job rules began Feb. 7."

In an editorial titled "The Decline Of France," the Wall Street Journal (3/21, 2.11M) says, "The right to assemble is a pillar of free society. But in France it's the only pillar its citizens seem to take seriously. So much so that any public debate of import gets conducted in the streets rather than through the ballot box or institutions of a purportedly mature democracy. In less enlightened societies, as opposed to the birthplace of the Enlightenment, that's usually called mob rule." But "the violent street demonstrations roiling France's cities today, and the unhappy career prospects of Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin, are the latest symptoms of an ailing democracy."

Danish Emphasis On Retraining Said To Have Cut Jobless Rate In Half. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Walker, 2.11M) reports, "Most of Western Europe is fighting to hold on to its traditionally strong job protections while in some cases cutting jobless benefits, as the region struggles to compete in a globalized economy. Denmark has gone the other way." The government "allows liberal hiring and firing as in the US. And it has imposed limits on the duration of its high unemployment benefits." But "it also invests more than any other country, as a percentage of its gross domestic product, in retraining the jobless -- a combination it calls 'flexicurity.' Its unusual mix of the free market and big government has helped Denmark cut its unemployment rate in half, from about 10% in the early 1990s to U.S.-style levels of under 5% now."

Blair Government Proposes Ban On Secret Loans To Political Parties. The Washington Post (3/21, A9, Jordan, 744K) reports, "The government of Prime Minister Tony Blair on Monday proposed banning secret loans to political parties to try to end a financing scandal blamed for sending Blair's popularity ratings to record lows." Charles Falconer, the cabinet minister in charge of the judiciary, "said he would immediately seek to amend campaign finance laws to force political parties to disclose who lends them money." Blair's Labor Party "said Friday that it had accepted loans worth more than $24 million from unidentified donors. Under British law, political parties must disclose the source of donations, but they do not have to declare the source of loans." Blair "has been badly hurt by recent disclosures that several wealthy businessmen who privately lent money to his campaign were then recommended for seats in the House of Lords, the upper house of Parliament."

Protesters Continue To Demand Thai PM's Resignation. The Washington Post (3/21, A9, Sipress, 744K) reports, "For several weeks, Thai Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra has faced nightly demonstrations demanding his ouster. Tens of thousands of protesters have crowded into the capital, joining ranks with brown-robed monks, Chinese opera performers and tribal children in colorful costumes." The "spectacle" so far "has remained peaceful, though the potential for violence is growing as Thaksin refuses to budge."

Ethiopian Regime Cracks Down On Critics. The Washington Times (3/21, Pisik, 90K) reports, "A climate bordering on fear has taken hold of the Ethiopian capital as journalists, lawyers and politicians carefully measure their public remarks and contacts in the face of widespread arrests and prosecutions." The Times adds "tens of thousands…have been arrested on a variety of charges, according to Amnesty International, most of these stemming from violent political demonstrations in November. Advocates say it is impossible to know how many are still being held." Human Rights Watch "offers anecdotal reports of farmers denied fertilizer and seed because of their political affiliations, nighttime sweeps by federal police and beatings at checkpoints. Most independent newspapers have been shut down."

NYTimes Backs Liberian Request For Taylor's Extradition From Nigeria. The New York Times (3/21, 1.19M) editorializes, "Last week, Liberia's new president, Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, called for Nigeria to extradite the former president and warlord Charles Taylor to face war crimes charges. Mr. Taylor, who has been living in a Nigerian government guesthouse since 2003, is wanted on a range of charges relating to his decade-long West African rampage, which unleashed campaigns of torture, rape and dismemberment in Ivory Coast and Sierra Leone and on his home turf, Liberia." The Times adds, "In a just world, Mr. Taylor would have already been tried, condemned and sent up the river. … For West Africans, who have endured more than a decade of war, there's no justice without peace."

The FBI agent who arrested Zacarias Moussaoui in August 2001 testified Monday he spent almost four weeks trying to warn U.S. officials about the radical Islamic student pilot but "criminal negligence" by superiors in Washington thwarted a chance to stop the 9/11 attacks.

FBI agent Harry Samit of Minneapolis originally testified as a government witness, on March 9, but his daylong cross examination by defense attorney Edward MacMahon was the strongest moment so far for the court-appointed lawyers defending Moussaoui. The 37-year-old Frenchman of Moroccan descent is the only person charged in this country in connection with al-Qaida's Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

MacMahon displayed a communication addressed to Samit and FBI headquarters agent Mike Maltbie from a bureau agent in Paris relaying word from French intelligence that Moussaoui was "very dangerous," had been indoctrinated in radical Islamic Fundamentalism at London's Finnsbury Park mosque, was "completely devoted" to a variety of radical fundamentalism that Osama bin Laden espoused, and had been to Afghanistan.

Based on what he already knew, Samit suspected that meant Moussaoui had been to training camps there, although the communication did not say that.

The communication arrived Aug. 30, 2001. The Sept. 11 Commission reported that British intelligence told U.S. officials on Sept 13, 2001, that Moussaoui had attended an al-Qaida training camp in Afghanistan. "Had this information been available in late August 2001, the Moussaoui case would almost certainly have received intense, high-level attention," the commission concluded.

But Samit told MacMahon he couldn't persuade FBI headquarters or the Justice Department to take his fears seriously. No one from Washington called Samit to say this intelligence altered the picture the agent had been painting since Aug. 18 in a running battle with Maltbie and Maltbie's boss, David Frasca, chief of the radical fundamentalist unit at headquarters.

They fought over Samit's desire for a warrant to search Moussaoui's computer and belongings. Maltbie and Frasca said Samit had not established a link between Moussaoui and terrorists.

Samit testified that on Aug. 22 he had learned from the French that Moussaoui had recruited someone to go to Chechnya in 2000 to fight with Islamic radicals under Emir Ibn al-Khattab. He said a CIA official told him on Aug. 22 or 23 that al-Khattab had fought alongside bin Laden in the past. This, too, failed to sway Maltbie or Frasca.

Under questioning from MacMahon, Samit acknowledged that he had told the Justice Department inspector general that "obstructionism, criminal negligence and careerism" on the part of FBI headquarters officials had prevented him from getting a warrant that would have revealed more about Moussaoui's associates. He said that opposition blocked "a serious opportunity to stop the 9/11 attacks."

The FBI's actions between Moussaoui's arrest, in Minnesota on immigration violations on Aug. 16, 2001, and Sept. 11, 2001, are crucial to his trial because prosecutors allege that Moussaoui's lies prevented the FBI from discovering the identities of 9/11 hijackers and the Federal Aviation Administration from taking airport security steps.

But MacMahon made clear the Moussaoui's lies never fooled Samit. The agent sent a memo to FBI headquarters on Aug. 18 accusing Moussaoui of plotting international terrorism and air piracy over the United States, two of the six crimes he pleaded guilty to in 2005.

To obtain a death penalty, prosecutors must prove that Moussaoui's actions led directly to the death of at least one person on 9/11.

Moussaoui pleaded guilty last April to conspiring with al-Qaida to fly planes into U.S. buildings. But he says he had nothing to do with 9/11 and was training to fly a 747 jetliner into the White House as part of a possible later attack.

Samit's complaints echoed those raised in 2002 by Coleen Rowley, the bureau's agent-lawyer in the Minneapolis office, who tried to help get a warrant. Rowley went public with her frustrations, was named a Time magazine person of the year for whistleblowing and is now running for Congress.

MacMahon walked Samit through e-mails and letters the agent sent seeking help from the FBI's London, Paris and Oklahoma City offices, FBI headquarters files, the CIA's counterterrorism center, the Secret Service, the Immigration and Naturalization Service, the Federal Aviation Administration, an intelligence agency not identified publicly by name in court (possibly the National Security Agency), and the FBI's Iran, Osama bin Laden, radical fundamentalist, and national security law units at headquarters.

Samit described useful information from French intelligence and the CIA before 9/11 but said he was not told that CIA Director George Tenet was briefed on the Moussaoui threat on Aug. 23 and never saw until after 9/11 a memo from an FBI agent in Phoenix about radical Islamists taking flight training there.

For each nugget of information, MacMahon asked Samit if Washington officials called to assess the implications. Time after time, Samit said no.

MacMahon introduced an Aug. 31 letter Samit drafted "to advise the FAA of a potential threat to security of commercial aircraft" from whomever Moussaoui was conspiring with.

But Maltbie barred him from sending it to FAA headquarters, saying he would handle that, Samit testified. The agent added that he did tell FAA officials in Minneapolis of his suspicions.

Agent Faults FBI On 9/11 (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 21, 2006

The man who caught Zacarias Moussaoui testifies that higher-ups blocked his efforts to determine whether there was a larger plot.

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — The FBI agent who arrested Zacarias Moussaoui weeks before Sept. 11 told a federal jury Monday that his own superiors were guilty of "criminal negligence and obstruction" for blocking his attempts to learn whether the terrorist was part of a larger cell about to hijack planes in the United States.

His testimony appeared to undermine the prosecution's case for the death penalty. Prosecutors argue that had Moussaoui cooperated by identifying some of the 19 hijackers, the FBI could have alerted airport security and kept them off the planes.

Moussaoui is the only person to have been convicted in the United States on charges stemming from Sept. 11. His sentencing trial began several weeks ago, but the prosecution's case was nearly gutted when it was learned that a lawyer for the Transportation Security Administration had improperly coached key aviation security witnesses. U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema decided to allow the government to present a limited amount of aviation testimony and evidence.

Samit's recollections Monday were the first ground-level account of how FBI agents in Minneapolis — where Moussaoui was arrested on a visa violation 3½ weeks before the attacks — were appalled that their Washington supervisors denied their requests for search warrants in the effort to find out why the Frenchman was taking flying lessons and what role he might have in a wider plan to attack America.

"They obstructed it," a still-frustrated Samit told the jury, calling his superiors' actions a calculated management decision "that cost us the opportunity to stop the attacks."

The government considers Samit's testimony essential to its case. On March 9, the agent told the court about his arrest of Moussaoui, now 37, and his desperate efforts to win the suspect's cooperation.

Yet much of his testimony Monday might have backfired on the government. The jury easily could have been left with the impression of an FBI so at odds with itself that it not only missed critical clues of an impending terrorist attack, but did not even know how best to coordinate efforts to stop it.

His suspicions were backed up by Coleen Rowley, then an FBI lawyer in Minneapolis, who in a May 2002 memo to FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III complained that Washington had blocked efforts to determine what Moussaoui was really doing. Rowley is not scheduled to testify during the sentencing phase.

Moussaoui pleaded guilty last year to being a part of the Sept. 11 conspiracy. His lawyers maintain that the government had plenty of leads in the summer of 2001 that a major terrorist action was afoot, even without Moussaoui's cooperation. They point to a memo by an FBI agent in Phoenix warning of Middle Eastern men taking flying lessons, and the fact that then-CIA Director George J. Tenet was apprised of Moussaoui's arrest.

Samit testified Monday that he never knew of the Phoenix memo or of Tenet's interest in the case. He also said he was kept in the dark about the Aug. 6, 2001, presidential daily briefing given to Bush during his vacation in Texas. That briefing, titled "Bin Laden Determined to Strike in U.S.," noted "patterns of suspicious activity in this country consistent with preparations for hijackings or other types of attacks."

Defense lawyer Edward B. MacMahon Jr. also used his cross-examination of Samit to suggest that law enforcement officials never took such threats seriously then anyway.

Under MacMahon's daylong questioning, Samit said that officials at the FBI headquarters in Washington rejected a series of attempts to obtain a warrant to search Moussaoui's personal belongings.

Had the belongings been opened before Sept. 11, agents would have found numerous small knives, jumbo-jet pilot manuals, rosters of flight schools and other clues that might have helped them understand the Sept. 11 plot.

Samit wanted to seek a criminal search warrant, and later one from a special intelligence court. But officials at the FBI headquarters refused to let him, because they did not believe he had enough evidence to prove Moussaoui was anything but a wealthy man who had come to this country to follow his dream of becoming a pilot.

He said that as Washington kept telling him there was "no urgency and no threat," his FBI superiors sent him on "wild goose chases."

For a while, Samit said, they did not even believe Moussaoui was the same person whom French intelligence sources had identified as a Muslim extremist. Samit said that FBI headquarters wanted him and his fellow agents to spend days poring through Paris phone books to make sure they had the right Moussaoui.

Samit said that when he asked permission to place an Arabic-speaking federal officer as a plant inside Moussaoui's cell to find out what Moussaoui was up to, Washington said no.

And he said that when he prepared a lengthy memo about Moussaoui for Federal Aviation Administration officials, Washington deleted key sections, including a part connecting Moussaoui with Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden.

Samit said he was so frustrated and so convinced that attacks were imminent that he bypassed FBI officials in Washington and met with an FAA officer he knew in Minneapolis. But he said FAA agents never got back to him, and never asked to see a pair of small knives, similar to box cutters, that Samit had found in Moussaoui's pocket and in his car.

Samit further described how he took it upon himself to cable the Secret Service that the president's safety might be in jeopardy. He recounted in the cable how Moussaoui had told him he hoped to be able to one day fly a Boeing 747 from London's Heathrow Airport to New York, and how he also hoped to visit the White House one day.

Samit said he warned the Secret Service that those desires could spell disaster. "If he seizes an airplane from Heathrow to New York City," Samit alerted the Secret Service, "it will have the fuel on board to reach D.C."

Samit said he never heard back from the Secret Service either.

And yet, the agent said, he never officially complained to the FBI hierarchy.

"Street agents don't call headquarters and request that supervisors be removed from cases," he said. "I didn't agree with them, but they are in charge."

But Samit said his immediate boss in Minneapolis, FBI Special Agent Greg Jones, did urge Washington to be more receptive.

Samit said he once overheard Jones on the phone with headquarters, telling FBI superiors that Minneapolis was trying to keep Zacarias Moussaoui "from flying an airplane into the World Trade Center."

After the Sept. 11 attacks, Samit said he asked Jones about that conversation, and Jones said he had just made up the scenario as a hypothetical to try to get Washington moving. "He pulled it out of the air," Samit said. "It was a lucky guess."

F.B.I. Discounted Suspicions About Moussaoui, Agent Says (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va., March 20 — The F.B.I. agent who arrested and interrogated Zacarias Moussaoui just weeks before the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, told a jury today that his efforts to confirm his strong suspicions that Mr. Moussaoui was involved in a terrorist airline hijacking plot were thwarted by senior bureau officials in Washington who acted out of negligence and a need to protect their careers.

Harry Samit, under intense cross-examination by Mr. Moussaoui's chief court-appointed lawyer, detailed his frustration over the days before the hijacking as he made numerous requests to look into what Mr. Moussaoui had been up to at the time of his arrest. Mr. Moussaoui was arrested on immigration violations in Minnesota, where he was learning to fly a jetliner.

"I accused the people in F.B.I. headquarters of criminal negligence" in an interview after Sept. 11, Mr. Samit acknowledged under questioning by Edward B. MacMahon Jr. He said that the senior agents in Washington "took a calculated risk not to advance the investigation" by refusing to seek search warrants for Mr. Moussaoui's belongings and computer. "The wager was a national tragedy," Mr. Samit testified.

Mr. Samit said that two senior agents declined to provide help in getting a search warrant, either through a special panel of judges that considers applications for foreign intelligence cases or through a normal application to any federal court for a criminal investigation.

As a field agent in Minnesota, he said he required help and approval from headquarters to continue his investigation. He acknowledged that he had written that Michael Maltbie, an agent in the F.B.I.'s radical fundamentalist unit, told him that applications for the special intelligence court warrants had proved troublesome for the bureau and seeking one "was just the kind of thing that would get F.B.I. agents in trouble." He wrote that Mr. Maltbie had told him that "he was not about to let that happen to him." During that period, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court, had complained about improper applications from the bureau.

Mr. Samit also acknowledged that he had written that David Frasca, a supervisor of the radical fundamentalist unit, had similarly blocked him from seeking a search warrant under the more common route in a criminal investigation. Some of the special court's complaints dealt with the idea that law-enforcement officials were sometimes using the lower standard required for warrants in intelligence investigations and then using the information they obtained in criminal cases.

Mr. Frasca, Mr. Samit explained, believed that once the Moussaoui investigation was opened as an intelligence investigation, it would arouse suspicion that agents had been trying to exploit the intelligence law to get information for an investigation they now believed was a criminal one.

(An F.B.I. spokesman, Bill Carter, said the agency did not comment on pending trials or litigation.)

The distinction between the two standards for obtaining warrants has since been eliminated following the Sept. 11 attacks.

The government is trying to prove to a jury that Mr. Moussaoui should be executed because he bears some responsibility for the deaths from Sept. 11. Prosecutors have argued that if Mr. Moussaoui had told Mr. Samit and other investigators what he knew about Al Qaeda plots to fly planes into buildings, the attacks might have been foiled.

Although Mr. Samit was a government witness who sought to bolster the government's case that he could have uncovered the plot had Mr. Moussaoui spoken to him truthfully, his responses to Mr. MacMahon today appeared to provide a lift for the defense. Mr. MacMahon sought to show that the problem was not with Mr. Moussaoui but with senior F.B.I. officials in Washington who would not budge no matter how hard Mr. Samit pressed them.

The F.B.I.'s handling of clues to the impending Sept. 11 attacks was sharply criticized in a report by the Justice Department's inspector general's office in 2004. Citing a memo from a Phoenix agent who had become suspicious of several students taking flying lessons in Arizona, the report said the agent's memo did not get the timely attention it deserved, not so much because of individual lapses within the F.B.I. but because of "critical systemic failings" that kept information from being effectively evaluated and shared.

The slow and incomplete attention given the memo from Phoenix was illustrative of a system "in which important information could easily 'fall through the cracks' and not be brought to the attention of the people who needed it, the inspector general's office concluded.

FBI Was Warned About Moussaoui (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Timothy Dwyer

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

An FBI agent who interrogated Zacarias Moussaoui before Sept. 11, 2001, warned his supervisors more than 70 times that Moussaoui was a terrorist and spelled out his suspicions that the al-Qaeda operative was plotting to hijack an airplane, according to federal court testimony yesterday.

Agent Harry Samit told jurors at Moussaoui's death penalty trial that his efforts to secure a warrant to search Moussaoui's belongings were frustrated at every turn by FBI officials he accused of "criminal negligence." Samit said he had sought help from a colleague, writing that he was "so desperate to get into Moussaoui's computer I'll take anything."

That was on Sept. 10, 2001.

Samit's testimony added striking detail to the voluminous public record on the FBI's bungling of the Moussaoui case. It also could help Moussaoui's defense. Samit is a prosecution witness who had earlier backed the government's central theory of the case: that the FBI would have raised "alarm bells" and could have stopped the Sept. 11 attacks if Moussaoui had not lied to agents. But under cross-examination by the defense yesterday, Samit said that he did raise those alarms -- repeatedly -- but that his bosses impeded his efforts.

The testimony came as the sentencing hearing resumed for the only person convicted in the United States of charges stemming from the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. Jurors in Alexandria will determine whether Moussaoui should live or die. The proceeding was derailed last week by the misconduct of government attorney Carla J. Martin, who improperly shared testimony with upcoming witnesses and coached them.

An angry U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema halted the hearing for a week. She barred the testimony of the witnesses Martin had contacted and all aviation evidence, gutting the government's case. But after prosecutors offered a compromise, Brinkema issued a revised order Friday saying they could use new aviation witnesses not tainted by Martin's conduct.

Brinkema began the day yesterday by welcoming jurors back to court and quizzing them about whether they had seen or read any of the extensive media coverage, which she had barred them from doing. When they shook their heads no in unison, the judge said, "You've been wonderful."

Nowhere to be seen was Martin, the Transportation Security Administration lawyer whom Brinkema has blamed for the disruption. She could face contempt of court or other criminal charges, and Moussaoui's attorneys had urged her to explain her actions at a special hearing yesterday. That hearing was never convened, and Brinkema did not mention it. Martin's attorney has said she would not testify.

Paul Bresson, an FBI spokesman, declined to comment on the testimony from Samit, who remains an agent in the FBI's Minneapolis office. The primary supervisor Samit accused of impeding his investigation, Michael Maltbie, said in a phone interview yesterday that the issues raised in court "have been looked at extensively by Congress, the Justice Department, my own people."

"The [FBI] director has given me a chance to respond to some of these issues that have come up," said Maltbie, a former counterterrorism supervisor at headquarters in Washington and now a supervisory special agent in Cleveland.

Moussaoui, 37, pleaded guilty in April to conspiring with al-Qaeda in the Sept. 11 attacks. He was sitting in jail on that day of terror because of his arrest a month earlier after his activities raised suspicion at a Minnesota flight school.

The FBI's missteps have been examined in depth by congressional investigators and the independent commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks.

Yesterday, as jurors watched images of FBI documents flashing on TV screens, defense attorney Edward B. MacMahon Jr. walked Samit through a recital of government mistakes, framing nearly every question with the words: "You wanted people in Washington to know that . . . right?"

MacMahon zeroed in on increasingly urgent warnings Samit issued to his FBI supervisors after he interviewed Moussaoui at a Minnesota jail in mid-August 2001. Moussaoui had raised Samit's suspicions because he was training on a 747 simulator with limited flying experience and could not explain his foreign sources of income.

By Aug. 18, 2001, Samit was telling FBI headquarters that he believed Moussaoui intended to hijack a plane "for the purpose of seizing control of the aircraft." A few days later, he learned from FBI agents in France that Moussaoui had been a recruiter for a Muslim group in Chechnya linked to Osama bin Laden.

But when Samit tried to use the French intelligence in his draft application for a Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act warrant to search Moussaoui's belongings, he said, Maltbie edited out the connection with bin Laden because it did not show that a foreign government was involved.

"How are you supposed to establish a connection with a foreign power if it's deleted from the document?" MacMahon asked.

"Well, sir, you can't," Samit replied.

Samit said he also sent an e-mail to the FBI's bin Laden unit but did not receive a response before Sept. 11, 2001. By late August, the agent had concluded that Maltbie and other FBI officials were no longer interested in investigating Moussaoui. Samit acknowledged that he told the Justice Department's inspector general's office that his supervisors engaged in "criminal negligence" and were trying to "run out the clock" because they wanted to deport Moussaoui rather than prosecute him.

Most portions of the inspector general's report dealing with Moussaoui have never been made public.

"You thought a terrorist attack was coming, and you were being obstructed, right?" MacMahon asked.

"Yes, sir," Samit answered.

Samit said he kept trying to persuade his bosses to authorize the surveillance warrant or a criminal search warrant right up until the day before the planes hit the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

"You never stopped trying, did you?" MacMahon said.

"No, sir," Samit replied.

Agent Warned FBI About Moussaoui, Hijack Plan (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, March 21, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va.—The FBI agent who arrested confessed al-Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui testified Monday that three weeks before the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the agent warned his supervisors that Moussaoui likely was part of a plot to take over a commercial jet using small knives to subdue the crew.

The testimony by Special Agent Harry Samit in Moussaoui's sentencing trial shed new light on how the U.S. government failed to seize upon a range of clues that suggested the 9/11 plot was unfolding.

Samit said Monday that he wrote at least 70 pages of memos during the three weeks before the attacks expressing concern that Moussaoui was involved in a hijacking plot, but the Minnesota-based agent said his superiors never acted on the repeated warnings.

Samit's warnings included an Aug. 18, 2001, memo in which he unsuccessfully sought permission from FBI headquarters to search the belongings of Moussaoui, a French citizen who had been arrested on immigration charges.

The agent's warnings proved to be a forecast of the Sept. 11 attacks, in which 19 suicide hijackers used box cutters and utility knives to take over four jets in attacks that killed nearly 3,000 people in New York City and Shanksville, Pa., and at the Pentagon.

Samit's testimony is key in Moussaoui's trial, which is being held to determine whether the al-Qaeda operative — who has pleaded guilty to terrorism conspiracy — should be executed or receive a life sentence. The U.S. government says that the Sept. 11 attacks could have been prevented if Moussaoui had warned agents about the plot, and that he should be executed because he didn't.

Moussaoui claims he was part of another plot and didn't know about the one for 9/11. Samit's testimony appeared to support the defense's contention that authorities had many clues about a possible hijacking plot and failed to act on them.

Samit testified that before the attacks, FBI officials in Washington refused to support his search requests despite Samit's increasingly "desperate" attempts to learn more about Moussaoui, who had raised suspicions among his instructors while training as a flight student.

"God help us all if the next terrorist incident involves this kind of plan," an investigative associate identified in court only as "Cathy" wrote a frustrated Samit on the day before the attacks.

Samit's FBI superiors at the time did not believe he had enough evidence to support a warrant for either a criminal or intelligence investigation. Since then, the USA Patriot Act has made it easier for federal authorities to obtain such warrants in terrorism investigations.

Samit's testimony marked the resumption of Moussaoui's trial, which U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema had suspended for nearly a week after learning that a government lawyer had violated court rules by leaking court transcripts to help coach upcoming government witnesses.

Brinkema responded by ruling that prosecutors could not present evidence that aviation authorities could have helped avert the 9/11 attacks if Moussaoui had told agents about the plot. The judge later amended her ruling to allow aviation witnesses who were not tainted by the actions of government lawyer Carla Martin.

'Criminal negligence' by superiors foiled chance to thwart 9/11, he says

ALEXANDRIA, Va. – The FBI agent who arrested Zacarias Moussaoui in August 2001 testified Monday that he spent almost four weeks trying to warn U.S. officials about the radical Islamic student pilot but that "criminal negligence" by superiors in Washington thwarted a chance to stop the 9/11 attacks.

Agent: Suspicions Of Plot Ignored (NSDY)

FBI investigator who arrested Moussaoui says he wrote some 70 memos about possible threat

ALEXANDRIA, Va. -- The FBI agent who arrested Zacarias Moussaoui testified yesterday that Moussaoui's pose as a flight student never fooled him, but said he was blocked from pursuing his suspicions of a terrorist hijacking plot by supervisors he characterized as "criminally negligent" careerists.

As Moussaoui's death-penalty sentencing trial resumed here after a week's delay to investigate witness tampering by government lawyer Carla Martin, Minnesota Special Agent Harry Samit said on cross-examination that he wrote FBI headquarters about 70 memos about Moussaoui's likely terrorist plans between his arrest on Aug. 16 and Sept. 11, all to no avail.

Prosecutors are trying to show that Moussaoui should get the death penalty because his lies prevented agents from thwarting the Sept. 11 attacks, while Moussaoui says he knew no details of the plot. Defense lawyer Edward MacMahon spent his five-hour cross-examination trying to show that the FBI's failure to act on Samit's instincts was to blame.

"Your investigation here was to uncover the facts that Moussaoui was in fact a terrorist ... and you uncovered those facts didn't you?" MacMahon asked. "I uncovered enough facts to generate suspicion in my mind that he was a terrorist," Samit said, "But that's a far distance from being able to prove it."

Moussaoui, 37, a French-Moroccan, was arrested after his behavior at a Minnesota flight school aroused suspicion. He pleaded guilty a year ago to being part of a broad al-Qaida hijacking conspiracy, but not the Sept. 11 plot. Samit's testimony yesterday was the most detailed public recounting of how Washington supervisors thwarted the field office's efforts to find out more about him in 2001.

Samit said that Moussaoui's evasiveness, flight training, and fundamentalist beliefs made him look like a terrorist suspect. But supervisors felt they couldn't get an intelligence warrant to search his belongings, and thought it would be legally risky to seek a traditional criminal warrant after starting an intelligence investigation.

Michael Maltbie, the supervisor handling the case at the FBI's Radical Fundamentalist Unit, told Samit that getting an intelligence warrant could be bad for an agent's career if it was fouled up, Samit testified. He said Maltbie told him he wanted to "preserve the existence of his advancement potential" in the FBI.

By the end of August, there was more evidence. French intelligence had learned that Moussaoui had been to Afghanistan and had recruited jihadists. But Maltbie wasn't sure it was the same Moussaoui, and demanded that FBI agents overseas search the French white pages for other Zacarias Moussaouis.

Samit acknowledged that he had accused Maltbie and other supervisors of taking a "calculated risk" with 3,000 lives to protect their careers in testimony to the Justice Department. Maltbie now heads the Joint Terrorism Task Force in the Cleveland FBI office.

Witness Flap Casts Doubt On Call For Death In Moussaoui Case (LAW)

By Sarah Kelley And Jason Mclure, Legal Times

Legal Times, March 21, 2006

This was the government's first, and likely only, chance to prosecute a suspect in the Sept. 11 plot in a U.S. court. And from the start, doing so would present a monumental challenge to federal prosecutors. With the world watching, the pressure would be enormous.

Pursuing a death sentence meant raising the stakes in what already was considered the highest-profile criminal case ever in the United States. For the team of three federal prosecutors it meant facing an unprecedented task: convincing a jury that Moussaoui should be executed even though -- by their own admission -- he wasn't directly involved in the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

"I think they have had a difficult hand dealt," says Larry Mackey, a former prosecutor who played a lead role in the trials of Oklahoma City bombers Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols.

The government's decision to seek death was scrutinized from the outset and continued to be so even after Moussaoui pleaded guilty, in April 2005, to participating in a conspiracy to commit acts of terrorism in the United States. But last week it became clear just how precarious the argument for death was. The government's case was in jeopardy of crumbling midway through the penalty phase of the trial after Transportation Security Administration lawyer Carla Martin allegedly tampered with government witnesses.

Martin, a veteran government lawyer who served as the prosecution team's liaison to a number of key witnesses from the Federal Aviation Administration, is accused of coaching witnesses on their testimony and giving them transcripts of the trial -- a direct violation of an order by U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema.

If the blunder results in Moussaoui being sentenced to life in prison rather than death, a large dose of the blame will fall on Martin but also -- fairly or unfairly -- on federal prosecutors Robert Spencer, David Novak and David Raskin.

For the question remains, if the witnesses Martin dealt with were so critical to the case, why did prosecutors allow her to operate with little oversight? And if the government's case for death was so convincing, how could her conduct completely blow it apart?

The three Assistant U.S. Attorneys have spent thousands of hours managing the case, and though they took pains to distance themselves from Martin last week, the prosecution clearly worked closely with her. Her name appears on at least one government filing in the case.

"At the end of the day all responsibility rests at their doorstep," says Mackey of the trial lawyers. "Having said that, they must be tearing their hair out that another government lawyer could do this."

DECISION FOR DEATH

The fact that Martin's missteps could unhinge a case that was years in the making is telling. Many believe the case was weak from the start. It's possible the prosecutors didn't agree with the decision to seek death in the first place.

"These are political decisions," says John Zwerling, a criminal defense attorney in Alexandria, Va. "The shots are being called at the very highest level of our government -- the president, the vice president, and the attorney general. The prosecutors have to march to their orders, and whether or not they believe in it is irrelevant."

In March 2002, three months after Moussaoui's indictment on terrorism charges and just six months after the attacks, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft signed off on the decision to seek the death penalty, reaffirming a commitment to "carrying out justice."

At the time, Moussaoui's possible connection to the attacks was still unclear, though he was repeatedly referred to in news articles and government statements as the alleged 20th hijacker. Having been arrested on immigration charges in August 2001, Moussaoui was sitting in a jail cell when terrorists carried out the deadliest terror attack ever in the United States.

Moussaoui, who has repeatedly proclaimed his allegiance to Osama bin Laden, denies any involvement in Sept. 11. Instead, Moussaoui claims he was to take part in a second wave of terror attacks by crashing a plane into the White House.

As the case progressed, the government's argument for death emerged: Had Moussaoui divulged his knowledge of the attacks, the government could have thwarted the plot, saving thousands of innocent victims.

Despite the obvious legal hurdles, many Americans supported the decision, believing Moussaoui should die for his close ties to the Sept. 11 conspiracy. But some objected, claiming the move was politically motivated -- a way for the Bush administration to hold someone accountable for the attacks. Others said it was an effort to avenge the victims on behalf of their families, and, indeed, the Moussaoui penalty phase has often been referred to as the families' "day in court."

Now, more than four years later, the debate continues over whether the government overstated its case against Moussaoui to justify seeking death. Once he pleaded guilty, if the government had simply signed off on sending him to prison for life, the current trial in Virginia would not have been necessary. And in the minds of some, life in prison would avoid making him a martyr.

Neal Sonnett, a former Criminal Division chief for the U.S. Attorney's Office in the Southern District of Florida, believes the case for a death sentence is weak.

"Had everything gone perfectly, the burden that the prosecution has to meet to get the death penalty is a very strong burden, and it was unlikely that they were going to meet it here," says Sonnett, now a white-collar criminal defense attorney based in Miami.

ASSEMBLING A TEAM

Before the Sept. 11 attacks, the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of New York in Manhattan had handled nearly every major terrorism trial of the modern era -- from the 1993 World Trade Center bombing to the American embassy bombings in East Africa. But after the attacks, the Justice Department decided to make the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Eastern District of Virginia the hub of terrorism prosecutions.

There were several reasons for the choice. Virginia juries had a reputation for being sympathetic to prosecutors, the federal court in Alexandria was known for quickly moving cases through its "rocket docket," and Alexandria lay just across the Potomac from Washington -- where prosecutors would have easy access to their colleagues at Main Justice and the myriad federal agencies that would become involved in any trial. There also was a sentiment that the federal courthouse in Manhattan, which sits just blocks from the World Trade Center site, would not be an easy venue in which to hold a fair trial.

"There was the usual competition for cases, and somebody has to win and somebody has to lose," says Andrew McCarthy, a former terrorism prosecutor in the Southern District of New York. "The thing you have to remember ... at the time those decisions had to be made, there were other things going on that were a lot more important than the usual turf fighting that we had in the 1990s."

Moussaoui's December 2001 indictment was signed by three officials representing each DOJ arm involved. There was Paul McNulty, the Eastern District of Virginia's new and politically connected Republican U.S. Attorney (who has since been nominated to the DOJ's No. 2 spot); Mary Jo White, the outgoing Clinton-era U.S. Attorney in New York whose office had overseen the first World Trade Center bombing and East African embassy bombings; and Michael Chertoff, the head of the Criminal Division at Main Justice in Washington and a former U.S. Attorney in New Jersey.

McNulty has appeared in the courtroom at key stages of the case and from the start saw the trial as an opportunity to prove that the federal court system could effectively handle terrorism cases. He was alongside the prosecution when Moussaoui pleaded guilty, and again last week when the judge chastised the government for making egregious errors in the case. But observers say that McNulty has served more as a liaison to Main Justice in the matter, rather than as a day-to-day manager. A spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office declined to comment.

The line prosecutors ultimately chosen for the trial team reflected the division of labor between the two U.S. Attorney's offices. Two of the federal prosecutors on the team would come from Virginia, and one from New York.

Leading the prosecution is Robert Spencer, chief of the Eastern District's Criminal Division. Spencer joined the federal prosecutor's office in Alexandria in 1995 as an Assistant U.S. Attorney, handling high-profile murder and violent gang cases. Spencer presented the government's opening argument on day one of Moussaoui's trial.

One former colleague says that Spencer is "among the most ethical and persuasive assistant U.S. attorneys in the nation."

Spencer has prosecuted a number of other terrorism cases, including that of Ahmed Omar Abu Ali, an American college student convicted last year of conspiring with al Qaeda and plotting to kill President George W. Bush. He also played a role in prosecuting the "Virginia Jihad Network," which resulted in numerous convictions and guilty pleas from Islamic extremists living throughout the Washington metropolitan region who underwent training to join the Taliban.

The second prosecutor from Virginia is David Novak, considered a specialist at the Justice Department in death penalty cases. Throughout much of the case, Novak personally has interviewed many of the victims' family members. Last week it was a visibly shaken Novak who stood for the prosecution in court to explain how Martin had violated the judge's order on witnesses.

Novak himself is no stranger to ethics issues. In 1993, while he was working as a federal prosecutor in Texas, a defense attorney for Rogelio Rodriguez, an alleged Mexican money launderer, filed a formal complaint with Justice's Office of Professional Responsibility charging Novak with a number of ethical breaches during trial. The defense attorney, Kent Schaffer, a Houston solo practitioner, accused Novak of misrepresenting Rodriguez's statements to an undercover agent about a planned trip. He also charged that Novak lied to the judge about Rodriguez's desire to cooperate with the government, in an effort to meet with the defendant without his lawyer present.

Novak was exonerated in the investigation, according to Schaffer, who last week called the OPR's decision in the matter a whitewash. Rodriguez was later acquitted of the charges. Novak declined to comment for this article.

OPR investigations are generally kept confidential, but this one entered the public domain when Novak filed a libel suit against Schaffer in 1995, calling Schaffer's letter "defamatory." Novak would also file a second libel suit that year, against a defense witness in another Texas money-laundering case who had written to then-Attorney General Janet Reno to accuse Novak of "misplaced vindictiveness" in his prosecution of defendant Antonio Giraldi. Both suits were dismissed within months of each other, in the spring of 1995.

The New York U.S. Attorney's Office was initially represented on the trial team by Kenneth Karas, a Southern District terrorism veteran who had taken a lead role in the prosecution of the embassy bombings case. But in 2003, Karas was nominated to a seat on the federal bench in New York. He was replaced on the team by David Raskin, an up-and-coming prosecutor who had joined the Southern District in 1999 and quickly earned a spot in its elite organized crime and counterterror unit.

An avid amateur baseball player and former catcher on his college team at Ithaca, N.Y., Raskin was known for pulling long hours and had been part of the prosecution team that took down 70 members of the Genovese crime family in New York. Those who worked with Raskin praise him for his judgment and dedication to his job. "Often in the Southern District you'll get some fairly cerebral types," says David Burns, a former Southern District prosecutor who worked with Raskin. "Dave is one of those former-athlete types."

Throughout the Moussaoui case, Raskin has written a number of the briefs filed and presented key arguments along the way.

WHO TO BLAME?

Seeking the death penalty for Moussaoui has been an uphill battle from the start. Early on in the case, Brinkema took capital punishment off the table, but the prosecution fought the decision, and the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals agreed to restore execution as an option.

With the help of hundreds of government lawyers from various federal agencies, the prosecution team interviewed thousands of witnesses and sorted through more than 1 million documents to build the case against Moussaoui.

Then, last week, the prosecution was dealt a blow that threatened to derail the entire case.

Citing the misconduct of the TSA's Martin, Brinkema sanctioned the government by excluding from trial key witnesses and all aviation evidence, which the prosecution acknowledged is the bulk of their case. In a March 14 conference call with the judge, Spencer said without that evidence, "we don't know whether it's worth proceeding at all."

Prosecutors filed a motion asking the judge to reconsider, and on Friday, Brinkema agreed to a compromise. The judge upheld the decision to bar all witnesses and aviation-related evidence with which Martin was involved. But she agreed to allow the government to call aviation witnesses "not tainted by Ms. Martin." The trial is scheduled to resume March 20, and the defense has requested a hearing to further investigate Martin's conduct.

As the prosecution scrambled to salvage its case, the finger-pointing and posturing had already begun.

Last week, the TSA was referring media calls about Martin's violation to Main Justice. Justice, in turn, was referring calls to the Eastern District of Virginia.

For now, the prosecution team is pinning the blame squarely on Martin, whose misconduct shut out the government's key witnesses and crucial evidence.

"In this sea of government attorneys and agents who have assiduously played by the rules, Ms. Martin stands as the lone miscreant," the prosecution wrote in court papers filed last week. Last week, Brinkema informed Martin she could face civil or criminal contempt charges. She also has been placed on administrative leave at the TSA.

But portraying Martin as a clueless, rogue lawyer from another agency won't be a slam-dunk. She was a regular in court, signed her name to at least one of the briefs in the case, and gained prosecution experience during a six-month detail to the U.S. Attorney's Office in the District of Columbia in 1993.

And Martin appears ready to push back. "Ms. Martin has now been viciously vilified by assertions from the prosecution," Roscoe Howard Jr., Martin's attorney and a former U.S. Attorney in the District of Columbia, wrote in a statement on her behalf. "When her opportunity comes, her response will show a very different, full picture of her intentions."

9th Circuit Slams DOJ Over Detention (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, March 21, 2006

Ahilan Nadarajah was detained as a terrorism suspect for nearly five years before he got to argue his case before the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. It only took a three-judge panel 10 days to order his release.

In a unanimous decision Friday, Judge Sidney Thomas wrote that federal immigration officials can't detain an asylum seeker indefinitely after an immigration court orders his release. Thomas wrote that the government's interpretation that a Supreme Court opinion allowed indefinite detention was "patently absurd."

"The general immigration detention statutes do not authorize the Attorney General to incarcerate detainees for an indefinite period," Thomas wrote. He was joined by Judge Richard Tallman and Senior U.S. District Judge James Fitzgerald of the District of Alaska, who sat by designation.

"By any analysis," Thomas wrote, "a five-year period of confinement of an alien who has not been charged with any crime, and who has won relief at every administrative level, is unreasonable under the standards set forth by the Supreme Court. Nor are we persuaded by the government's argument that because the Attorney General will someday review Nadarajah's case, his detention will at some point end, and so he is not being held indefinitely. No one can satisfactorily assure us as to when that day will arrive. Meanwhile, petitioner remains in detention."

Nadarajah's lawyer, Ahilan Arulanantham of the ACLU Foundation of Southern California, argued the case to the panel on March 7, and asked the judges to rule quickly, given the long detention at issue.

"We're very pleased with it," Arulanantham said Friday. "The court was concerned, like the immigration courts and all the courts who heard it in the United States, that the government was wrong.

"Because these are immigration courts," Arulanantham said, "the government basically said, 'we can resist their findings.'" A Justice Department spokeswoman would only say the case may continue to the Supreme Court.

Immigration and appeals courts found that Nadarajah had been beaten, burned and hung upside down, his head submersed in gasoline, by Sri Lankan authorities.

But the Justice Department insisted that Nadarajah was a member of the rebel Tamil Tigers, which it classifies as a terrorist group. And after missing two hearings, a Department of Homeland Security agent appeared in an immigration court to provide evidence of Nadarajah's terrorist links.

That evidence was based on information gathered from the Canadian Mounties and an anonymous letter writer who said it was unlikely that Nadarajah could have left the area of Sri Lanka where he had lived without the permission of the Tamil Tigers. An informant had also said that Nadarajah made a call from jail ordering a murder.

An immigration judge, unconvinced, ruled in Nadarajah's favor. But immigration officials refused to release him, even after he posted $20,000 bail.

Thomas noted that Congress has set up special avenues for the Justice Department to seek prolonged detention of terrorists, which were not taken in Nadarajah's case.

"Indeed, the government does not claim that the detention provisions for terrorists under the Patriot Act justify Nadarajah's detention," Thomas wrote.

"Given that Congress has placed specific limits on the Attorney General's authority to detain suspected terrorists, those statutory provisions must govern such detentions, instead of the general detention provisions that apply to all aliens coming into the United States," he continued.

Judge Orders Release Of Edited FBI Video In Lodi Terror Trial (AP)

By Don Thompson

AP, March 21, 2006

SACRAMENTO - The judge overseeing the federal trial of two Lodi men charged in a terrorism-related case approved releasing an edited version of their videotaped FBI interviews on Monday.

Instead, he ordered portions of the tapes deleted. Edited out of the videotapes to be released will be mentions of two Islamic religious leaders who were deported to Pakistan last year and segments in which Umer Hayat speculates that four Lodi men could be preparing to commit terrorist acts.

None of the men they mention was charged with a crime.

Both Hayats have pleaded not guilty. Their attorneys say they made false confessions after hours of leading questioning by FBI agents. The interviews and confessions were recorded on videotape.

The station will edit the videotapes and turn those versions back to Burrell for review. The approved versions will then be released publicly.

"Most of the information that's being redacted is already in the public record, but we understand the judge's concerns," KTVU attorney Grace Won said after the ruling. "We think they could be ready for broadcast within the next week or two."

Hamid Hayat faces three counts of lying to the FBI and separate charges of providing material support to terrorists by attending the camp. He faces up to 39 years in prison if convicted on all counts.

His father is charged with two counts of making false statements to the FBI and faces up to 16 years in prison if convicted.

KXTV-TV, March 21, 2006

The judge in the Hayat terrorism trial has agreed to release portions of the interrogation tapes to the media over the objections of the defendants' attorneys.

Judge Garland Burrell approved the release of an edited version of the videotapes that were shown to jurors during the trial of Umer and Hamid Hayat. Burrell is ordering the deletion of parts of the interrogations. For example, he will not release portions in which the Hayats mention two Islamic religious leaders who were deported to Pakistan last year. Segments in which Umer Hayat speculates that four young Lodi men could be preparing to commit terrorist acts will also be excluded.

News10 was party to the lawsuit that petitioned Burrell to release the tapes. When they are available, News10 will show them on News10 and News10.net.

Onetime Clerk Is At Center Of Lodi Trial (LAT)

By Rone Tempest, Times Staff Writer

BEND, Ore. — At the convenience store where he worked in this central Oregon resort town before he became an undercover operative for the FBI in California, Naseem Khan was known to his co-workers as "Mike."

The picture of Khan that emerges from interviews with friends, co-workers and landlords in Bend, a picturesque former logging town of 70,000 in the shadow of snow-capped Mt. Bachelor, is of a quiet, hard-working, mostly solitary young man with an interest in law enforcement.

Khan is now the key witness in the terrorism trial of a Lodi, Calif., ice cream truck driver and his son. Last week, he shocked the Sacramento courtroom when he said he saw Al Qaeda's No. 2 figure in 1999 at a mosque in the San Joaquin Valley farming community. He is expected to take the stand today for the first time since he made that claim, which terrorism experts discount as highly improbable.

Khan was first approached by FBI agents in October 2001 in Bend after someone reported him as a possible terrorism suspect, according to friends and court testimony. "He was originally a target," recalled Anne Kimler, who describes herself as a close friend. "They even confiscated his computer."

Quickly cleared of those suspicions, the $7-an-hour manager of the K Market convenience store was hired by the FBI to infiltrate the large Muslim community in Lodi, where he once lived, and was paid more than $200,000 in salary and expenses for his three-year undercover assignment.

The clean-cut, square-jawed Pakistani immigrant took readily to the job of secret agent. "He knew the culture and sometimes he objected to what they asked him to do," said a former girlfriend. "But he really liked the work. It fit his dream of someday going into law enforcement." The girlfriend, who lived with Khan until a recent breakup, asked not to be named because of concerns for her safety.

Jesse Johal, Khan's employer at K Market, which caters to skiers en route to Cascade Range slopes, said he was not surprised by Khan's turn to undercover work. He said Khan took criminology courses at the local community college and sometimes went with police officer friends to the local pistol range. "He was a nice quiet guy," said Johal. "We were a good team."

For a few months after the FBI hired him in December 2001, Khan continued to work at the convenience store. Johal said agents would sometimes visit the informant, code-named "Wildcat," in the store.

Ted and Edie Henderson, managers of the 88-unit apartment complex on Powers Road where Khan lived alone from September 2000 to June 2002, described him as a model tenant who always paid his $420 monthly rent on time.

"He just kept to himself," said Ted Henderson. "I never saw anyone come in or out of his place." Edie Henderson said, "When he left I've never seen such a clean apartment in my life."

In his first round of testimony in Sacramento earlier this month, Khan said he was born in Peshawar, Pakistan, in 1973, to a Pashtun tribal family. After his father died when Khan was still a child, he was raised by his mother and grandmother.

At 16, speaking very little English, he immigrated to the United States with his mother and two cousins, living briefly in Kentucky, New York and Texas, where he attended high school and took the first in a series of low-paying jobs in fast-food franchises and convenience stores.

Records show he moved to California in 1992, living mostly in the Sacramento Valley cities of Marysville and Yuba City. In 1993, when he was 19, court records show he was convicted in Sutter County on a bad-check charge for which he spent two days in jail and was fined $211.

In July 1999, he moved to Lodi, home to several generations of Pakistani Americans, many of whom share his Pashtun ethnicity — including Umer Hayat, 48, and Hamid Hayat, 23, who are on trial. The younger Hayat is charged with attending a terrorist training camp in Pakistan in 2003; both are charged with lying to federal agents.

Khan lived alone in an apartment that overlooked the Lodi mosque. He worked at a pizza delivery business and a convenience store.

Separated from other family members living in Texas, Khan lacked the extensive family base enjoyed by many in the town's Muslim community.

So late one night in 1999 when he was working in the Lodi convenience store, he was open to the suggestion of a garrulous traveler that he come up to Oregon to "check it out."

The traveler, Kimler, a 50-year-old U.S. Forest Service employee from Prineville, Ore., said she took an instant liking to Khan and invited him to stay with her and her family if he came to Oregon.

"We just liked each other and became friends," Kimler recalled.

Khan took her up on the offer and stayed with the family in Prineville for several months before he landed a job as assistant manager at a Taco Bell and went out on his own.

"He always said they were something different," Kimler said of the curries, "but they all tasted the same. Good, but very hot. The kids couldn't eat them."

When Khan found his own apartment, Kimler went with him to help him pick out furniture. She became his confidant and advisor in a conservative Oregon community with no mosque and only a handful of practicing Muslims.

"There's another Muslim in Bend? That's news to me. I thought I was the only one," said Mohammed Elwefati, a Libyan American who manages food and beverages at a popular local steakhouse. Elwefati said he never met Kahn.

Kimler thinks it was this cultural isolation in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks that caused a wave of xenophobia in central Oregon that eventually reached Khan.

K Market owner Johal recalled a man buying cigarettes in the store who asked Khan menacingly if he was planning to "make a bomb."

Kimler suspects one of her own friends, hysterical with fear about terrorism, alerted the FBI about Khan. "I told her, 'Naseem a terrorist?' " she recalled. " 'You have to be kidding.' "

Whatever the cause, court records show that on Oct. 17, 2001, an FBI agent showed up at Khan's Powers Road apartment asking about his knowledge of Osama bin Laden and several Muslim fundraising organizations.

Since his testimony in the trial, Khan has been unavailable for comment.

Apparently convinced that he had no terrorism connections and impressed with his cooperation, agents from Oregon and California visited him again on Oct. 26, asking him to review photographs of suspected terrorists and asking him questions about the Lodi community where he once lived.

Khan told agents he remembered seeing Al Qaeda's No. 2, Ayman Zawahiri, and two other men, Ahmed Mohammed Hamed, a suspect in the 1998 embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania, and Abdelkarim Hussein Mohamed Al-Nasser, a suspect in the 1996 Khobar Towers bombing. He said he saw the three men at the Lodi mosque in 1998 and 1999.

Terrorism experts, even government officials, doubt the accuracy of the Zawahiri sighting, saying that the Al Qaeda figure, Bin Laden's personal physician, almost certainly did not travel to the United States after 1995.

Nothing has surfaced in the Lodi trial that indicates the agents seriously pursued these leads.

Nonetheless, Khan won the confidence of the FBI's Sacramento office and was immediately put to work as an undercover operative and sent out to secretly tape-record conversations with members of the Muslim community. Months into the investigation, Khan was trusted enough to transcribe and translate his own secret recordings, which are the foundation of the Lodi case.

Even after he began working for the FBI, Khan continued working part time at the Bend convenience store and living in the one-bedroom apartment. Sometime in the spring of 2002, he met a woman through a computer dating service who became his steady girlfriend.

The couple later moved into a Deschutes County home that the girlfriend bought. Khan, who told his Lodi contacts that he was a computer consultant who traveled frequently, sometimes stayed away from Bend for weeks at a time.

When he came home, the girlfriend said, he worked on landscaping the property. "He would cook Indian food, and we would listen to Indian music," she said. Other than the fact that he was working undercover for the government, she said, she knew little else about his activities.

She said the couple lived together until about five months ago when she found a goodbye note from Khan wishing her good luck in her future life. She said she contacted the FBI to get in touch with Khan but never heard back from him.

"I loved him. I loved him very much," she said, talking to a reporter in the slush-covered driveway of her home. "I guess this is what happens when you are in government work."

Young Lawyer Gets First Big Test During Federal Terrorism Trial (AP)

By Don Thompson

SACRAMENTO - It was a Sunday last June when leaders from Lodi's Pakistani community paid a frantic visit to Basim Elkarra, executive director of the Sacramento area's Council on American-Islamic Relations.

FBI agents had been interrogating a father and son from the Central Valley agricultural town who they suspected were lying about the younger man's attendance at an al-Qaida training camp in Pakistan. They needed a criminal lawyer for the men, and Elkarra wasn't sure who he could reach on such short notice.

What he did have was the cell phone number of a young Muslim lawyer of Afghan descent. He knew he could reach her, even on a weekend.

Within hours, Wazhma Mojaddidi found herself representing the 23-year-old son, Hamid Hayat, who is now on trial in U.S. District. He could spend most of the next four decades in prison if he is convicted of charges that he attended the camp in 2003 and lied about it to investigators.

It's the kind of high-profile case that rarely gets handed to a lawyer 18 months removed from law school.

"Getting a case of this magnitude for somebody who just recently graduated from law school is pretty unusual," said Eric McElwain, director of international programs at the University of Pacific McGeorge School of Law in Sacramento. "I assume it's just a case of being in the right place - I hope it's the right place - at the right time."

Mojaddidi is working as a team with veteran defense attorney Johnny Griffin III, a former prosecutor who is representing Hamid Hayat's father. Umer Hayat, 48, is charged with lying about his son's attendance at the camp and faces up to 16 years in prison.

Mojaddidi and Griffin, who are scheduled to begin the defense portion of the trial next week, have made an unlikely but complementary team.

Griffin, 46, spent 13 years as a state and federal prosecutor before beginning a private practice in 1998. He dwarfs the 31-year-old Mojaddidi, who says she stands 5-foot-2 1/2.

While she does not wear the traditional Muslim headdress, Mojaddidi favors stylish, colorful clothes that contrast with the dark suits and judicial robes of the courtroom.

Despite her inexperience, Mojaddidi has stood her ground. She sparred with the prosecution's expert on Islamic religion and law, debating the interpretation of a Muslim prayer, the opinions of 13th century Muslim scholars and obscure rhetorical histories dating to the Prophet Muhammad himself.

She challenged an FBI linguist about the significance of news articles praising al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden and Afghanistan's fundamentalist Taliban government. Her client clipped the stories from newspapers and magazines that are widely circulated in Pakistan.

Mojaddidi, a naturalized U.S. citizen who is fluent in several languages, also could interpret the original Urdu in hundreds of hours of secretly recorded conversations between the Hayats and the FBI's informant. She consults with the Hayats, also U.S. citizens, in their native language.

"This has really been a good blend," Griffin said. "She brings the whole cultural knowledge of the whole community. I know there have been some rough moments, but she has, in my view, stepped up to the plate."

Griffin was brought into the case quickly, but the lawyers arrived too late to prevent both Hayats from giving confessions - captured on videotape - to FBI agents during lengthy interrogation sessions last June. They were called in for questioning shortly after Hamid Hayat returned from Pakistan.

Persuading jurors to discount the confessions is among the defense team's biggest challenges. Mojaddidi and Griffin say the Hayats gave the statements after they were worn down by hours of questioning and were telling agents only what they thought they wanted to hear, unaware of the legal consequences.

At the same time, the lawyers are trying to exploit weaknesses with the government's case. Prosecutors so far have not presented firm evidence that Hamid Hayat actually attended the terror training camp, and questions have been raised about the credibility of the informant.

The case represents a leap for Mojaddidi, who previously was using her command of Urdu, Farsi and Pashto to help immigrants with family law cases.

"There aren't many Muslim attorneys," Elkarra said. "She speaks the language and she knows the culture. People feel comfortable with a Muslim attorney."

Mojaddidi was operating her own law practice in Sacramento when Elkarra called her for the Hayat case.

"It was a little bit of an intimidating situation," Mojaddidi said. "Essentially, I walked into a small conference room with about 10 Muslim religious leaders, all men, whom I had not met before."

In an interview with The Associated Press, she described her family's flight from Afghanistan when was 5, what she described as a middle-of-the-night escape into Pakistan in 1979 after the Russian invasion.

The family immigrated to Virginia and later moved to Concord, a suburb in the eastern San Francisco Bay area.

She met her husband, a Pakistani, while attending the University of California, Davis, and soon picked up his native Pashto language. Both are American citizens but speak their native languages to their three U.S.-born children, although Mojaddidi said her son prefers English.

She has never returned to Afghanistan but has visited Pakistan twice with her husband, an aeronautical and mechanical engineer.

"I must say, my first time was a culture shock to me," she said. "Most of the poor are Afghan refugees. To think that could have been me."

McElwain, the McGeorge professor, remembers Mojaddidi as a student and said he expected her to excel.

During a competition in Austria in 2002, he recalled, her team received good reviews but finished 21st among the 108 international universities, too low to qualify as a finalist. At the time, Mojaddidi said she was convinced her team's effort was sabotaged by a judge and wanted to appeal.

"That's just typical of Wazhma," McElwain said. "She's a very strong personality, the kind of person who takes things into her own hands if she doesn't like the way things are going. You just know she's going to go out and make waves wherever she goes."

A Possible Clue On NSA Spying (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

Did President Bush mention the government's secret warrantless surveillance program to the president of Pakistan more than four years ago? A brief passage of a 2002 book seems to raise that possibility.

Bush started by talking about plans for a quick victory in Afghanistan but then turned to another topic, according to the passage on Page 303:

"He had become fascinated with the ability of the National Security Agency to intercept phone calls and other communications worldwide," Woodward wrote, referring to Bush. "If they got the key phone calls, future terrorism might be stopped, certainly curtailed. Bush summarized his strategy: 'Listen to every phone call and close them down and protect the innocents.' "

By this time, Bush had already issued his order allowing the NSA to intercept communications between the United States and overseas locations without warrants. The program was never divulged publicly, however, until press reports last December.

Of course, Bush could have been referring merely to the NSA's traditional surveillance programs, which have long involved intercepting large amounts of communications overseas.

Woodward, an assistant managing editor at The Washington Post, said this month that he does not know what Bush may have had in mind during his conversation with Musharraf. Woodward noted that he has not referred to the NSA's warrantless spying program in his books or reporting.

Suspect In Al-Qaeda Bombings Disrupts Trial In Turkey (WP)

By Karl Vick

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

ISTANBUL, March 20 -- The al-Qaeda operative accused of organizing the 2003 Istanbul bombings and a botched attempt to sink an Israeli cruise ship appeared in a Turkish courtroom on Monday -- and did his best to take it over.

Louai al-Sakka, 32, who by his own account worked beside insurgent leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in Iraq, first told the court he was someone else, then was hustled out of the morning session after refusing to stand to address the judge.

"I performed jihad and killed Americans! Why should I stand up in front of you?" Sakka shouted as guards tugged him toward the door. "Should I stand in front of these liars?"

Sakka, a Syrian described by Turkish officials as a senior figure in al-Qaeda, is accused of providing other operatives with about $170,000 from the group to carry out four truck bombings that killed 57 people over two days in November 2003.

Monday was the opening day of trial for Sakka, who is being prosecuted along with 72 Turks. With the Turks' trial winding down after more than two years, defense attorneys argued unsuccessfully Monday that adding Sakka to the case would cause even further delay.

"I'm not holding a bomb. I just want to talk," Sakka told Judge Zafer Baskurt in the afternoon session, after being summoned from a back row where he had been mugging and joking with other defendants. He again refused to stand, indicating he acknowledged only Islamic law.

The judge responded by recessing the proceedings for two months.

Further complicating the trial, Sakka's attorney was ordered off the case Monday because he faces charges himself. Turkish prosecutors accuse Osman Karahan, a proponent of militant Islam in good standing with the Turkish bar, of aiding and abetting a terrorist organization. Karahan, who also represented 14 other defendants in the Istanbul case, said the indictment falsely links him to last year's bombings of the London transit system.

"All these efforts are to prevent Sakka from talking, because if he talks, a few states would collapse," Karahan said. Sakka already faces prison in Jordan, where he and Zarqawi were convicted in absentia for plotting to blow up hotels and tourist landmarks in the so-called millennium plot. Turkish police arrested him in August while he was allegedly completing plans to steer an explosives-laden yacht into an Israeli cruise ship off the Turkish coast. The plan was discovered when fire broke out in the apartment where he and an accomplice were constructing the bomb, authorities said.

Karahan has quoted Sakka as saying he planned to die attacking the cruise ship. He supposedly believed he would be captured otherwise; his identity was known despite efforts to alter his face through plastic surgery.

On Monday, however, his identity was at issue. More than 20 journalists failed to recognize Sakka as he entered the court building. Cleanshaven and skinny at the time of his arrest, the defendant had put on substantial weight in prison and grown a full beard. He insisted to the judge that his name was Ekrem Ozel, the name on the identity card he was using when arrested, and demanded he be fingerprinted to prove it.

Karahan said he was not sure of his client's identity, either. He said that Sakka, who specialized in moving Islamic militants through Turkey with false papers, had moved in and out of Turkey 55 times on 18 different passports.

"This is going to be a case of worldwide importance, so we need to determine scientifically exactly who he is," Karahan said.

PATRIOT ACT:

Freezing Nuns A Result Of Patriot Act Move (WT)

By Jen Haberkorn

The Washington Times, March 21, 2006

When checks began bouncing at Holy Name Monastery of the Benedictine Sisters last year, Sister Jean Abbott knew something was fishy.

Her calls to the bank revealed that the St. Leo, Fla., account was frozen for five days because one of the account's signatories -- an 80-year-old nun -- didn't have an identification card on file.

The bank blamed the USA Patriot Act for the account freeze.

"The local bank said it was the Patriot Act," said Sister Abbott, who declined to identify the bank. "Someone at the main office of the bank had done, according to the local bank, a spot check on the account, which they do periodically."

The Patriot Act strengthened the Bank Secrecy Act, which requires financial institutions, including banks, creditors and even casinos, to inform the U.S. Treasury Department of transactions they find to be out of the ordinary. But even the Patriot Act cannot close an account -- only a bank can do that.

The number of suspicious transactions that financial institutions are reporting to the government has nearly tripled since the Patriot Act was passed in 2001.

A suspicious act could be a business that doesn't normally use cash but suddenly starts making large cash deposits, or a person who normally deposits just a paycheck and suddenly makes a few deposits of tens of thousands of dollars.

Both could be legitimate transactions, but they also could be a sign of money laundering or other illegal activity.

So both cases will draw a red flag from a bank, prompting it to file a Suspicious Activity Report (SAR), which is sent to the Treasury Department to determine whether the transaction is fraudulent and to start a paper trail that investigators can use later if necessary.

Most consumers will never have their accounts frozen and likely will never know if a report is filed on them, according to the Treasury Department and the American Bankers Association (ABA). It's illegal for a bank to tell consumers that a SAR has been filed on them.

The average consumer "should not be concerned as long as the transactions they're doing are legit," said Anne Marie Kelly, a spokeswoman for the Financial Crimes Enforcement Network, the Treasury Department bureau responsible for administering the Bank Secrecy Act.

"This law is causing so many problems without any demonstrable successes," said J. Bradley Jansen, director of the Center for Financial Privacy and Human Rights, part of the Liberty and Privacy Network in the District. "The Banking Secrecy Act has been on the books since the 1970s. It did not prevent 9/11. It's not designed to prevent anything."

Ten years ago, banks filed 62,473 SARs annually. By 2000, that figure reached 163,184, and two years later, after the Patriot Act revisions, the number of SARs nearly doubled. It reached a peak of 689,414 in 2004 and dropped to 435,167 last year.

More financial institutions are required to file now, boosting the number of SARs. But regulators also have cracked down on banks over noncompliance -- Riggs Bank N.A. faced a $16 million fine last year for failing to file timely and accurate SARs.

"The banks take it very seriously," said John Hall, a spokesman for ABA. "Since those fines were enacted, some regulators feel that the banks are filling them out a little too often."

In Texas, where bankers deal with many immigrants sending money back to their countries, bankers think they have to file SARs on transactions even if they don't look too suspicious.

"Bankers know that even though the Washington regulators say they're not going to second-guess the bankers, the bankers are getting second-guessed," said Karen Neeley, general counsel of the Independent Bankers Association of Texas. "If you want to be safe, you have to file."

After the SAR is filed, it's up to the bank to determine whether to let the transaction proceed, freeze the funds or even close the account, Ms. Kelly said.

"We don't do anything about whether an account is closed or open. That's a business decision by the financial institution," she said.

The Treasury Department refers suspicious transactions to the appropriate law-enforcement agency.

The ABA says banks don't give out account information unless ordered to by law.

"Banks do guard the privacy of their customers. Customer trust is paramount to our industry," Mr. Hall said.

Librarian Is Still John Doe, Despite Patriot Act Revision (NYT)

By Alison Leigh Cowan

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

The hotel ballroom was packed as a sensibly dressed, well-read crowd from around the country gathered in San Antonio on Jan. 21 to celebrate one of their own.

Yet, as many expected, the guest of honor was a no-show, despite the $500 intellectual freedom prize that awaited.

Attendees at an American Library Association gathering blamed Washington for the empty chair. Lawmakers may be giving themselves credit for having improved safeguards on civil liberties when they reauthorized the nation's antiterrorism law, otherwise known as the USA Patriot Act, earlier this month.

But many librarians and civil liberties lawyers say the revisions did nothing to enable the guest of honor to take the stage and discuss the Patriot Act without risk of prosecution.

Known as John Doe in court filings, the guest of honor was the Connecticut librarian who was visited by the Federal Bureau of Investigation last year and presented with what is known as a national security letter demanding patron records.

The subpoena, issued as part of a counterterrorism investigation, not only barred him from disclosing the target of the inquiry, but also forbade him and others at his place of work to ever discuss the letter or even to acknowledge its receipt.

Though some 30,000 national security letters are issued a year without arousing public protest, the librarian was reluctant to comply because of professional ethics aimed at keeping library records confidential.

On the advice of the American Civil Liberties Union, his employer went to court to challenge the constitutionality of the subpoena, the provisions of the Patriot Act that broadened the use of national security letters after Sept. 11, 2001, and the order permanently forbidding discussion of the F.B.I.'s demand.

As the Bush administration pushed for the act to be reauthorized, a handful of Democratic and Republican lawmakers argued that it went too far in encroaching on civil liberties. In the end, they persuaded the White House to accept a compromise that placed library records beyond the reach of a national security letter if they were gathered by libraries operating in what many people understand to be their traditional roles.

While those concessions have allowed lawmakers to say that new safeguards on civil liberties have been put in place, another powerful provision in the Patriot Act, known as Section 215, remains on the books. It gives law enforcement another confidential way to demand information but has seldom been used because it requires judicial approval. National security letters, in contrast, require merely the signature of an F.B.I. official.

Between Section 215 and the new language governing national security letters, some opponents of the new version of the Patriot Act are skeptical that the revisions will provide much protection against unwanted invasions of privacy or infringements on free speech.

"The revised law provides almost no protection whatsoever for libraries," said Ann Beeson, the civil liberties union lawyer representing the organization that brought the suit in Connecticut. "It's virtually meaningless."

The section of the new law that addresses "privacy protection for library patrons" states that library records are beyond the reach of national security letters so long as the library is not operating as an "electronic communication service." Elsewhere, that term is defined as "any service which provides to users thereof the ability to send or receive wire or electronic communications."

But much of what a modern library does courses through its computers. Patrons can research topics on the Web. They can even reserve books from home. "A national security letter can be used to get any library record that is maintained via an electronic communication service," Ms. Beeson said. "That definitely includes Internet access and e-mail records and can also include patron borrowing records."

The new law does establish the recipient's right to challenge the nondisclosure orders that typically accompany national security letters and Section 215 requests. But the recipient would have to wait a year before raising the question anew if the government continued to assert the need for secrecy.

"If you're a business that has resources to challenge it every year, you can," Ms. Beeson said. But she said a judge would be hard pressed to rule against a government request to keep the information secret for reasons of national security. In the Connecticut John Doe's case, she said, "nothing in the new law permits John Doe to disclose his identity."

Though government lawyers demanded that John Doe's identity be shielded in court filings, the government failed to completely conceal the name in those filings, which revealed the plaintiff to be the Library Connection of Windsor, Conn., a nonprofit organization that provides back-office services to some two dozen libraries in the Hartford area.

Eager to testify publicly about the Patriot Act, the group's officers won the right last summer to identify their organization as the recipient of a national security letter after Judge Janet C. Hall of Federal District Court in Bridgeport found that the government had unjustly imposed a prior restraint on free speech. But her decision was stayed while the government appealed, and the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, in Manhattan, has yet to rule.

"I am rather appalled that our country's laws silence John Doe and require him to remain anonymous for standing by his professional ethics, for standing up for the principle that it is nobody's business what you read, or listen to, or look at in the library but yours," Judith F. Krug, the executive director of the Freedom to Read Foundation, told the crowd in San Antonio, as she accepted the University of Illinois's annual Robert B. Downs Intellectual Freedom Award in John Doe's absence.

Alice S. Knapp, a Stamford librarian who is this year's president of the Connecticut Library Association, said she was there "taking pictures left and right." But the Library Connection's executive director, George Christian, and the vice president of its board, Peter Chase, did not attend. Mr. Chase's absence was especially odd since he was to be the Connecticut Library Association's advocate on intellectual freedom this year.

Without commenting on John Doe's likely identity, Ms. Knapp confirmed that she had assumed many of Mr. Chase's speaking duties this year. For moral support, she has been nominating John Doe for other awards.

"We nominate them for everything we can," Ms. Knapp said. "Never mind the pressure they're under. Just the sheer act of bravery to decide not to comply and to decide to make an issue of it was incredibly huge, and within the library community, there is a lot of respect for them."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Homeland Security Targeting Some Plants (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

The AP, March 21, 2006

Chemical plants with lax protections from attacks and accidental leaks are being targeted by the Homeland Security Department — before they can be targeted by terrorists.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Monday his department will crack down on chemical manufacturers and storage facilities that he described as "free riders" — those that haven't beefed up their security measures.

"They're counting on the fact that the industry in general has a good level of investment, and they figure they'll hide among the leaves and essentially freeload on this security work done by others," Chertoff said.

"That's not acceptable," he said. "Progress on this has stalled for too long."

Counterterror experts put the chemical industry at the top of the list of likely terror targets. Congressional investigators have revealed spotty results in how well the chemical industry is prepared to respond in the event of an attack.

At issue is federal regulation of security plans at the nation's 15,000 privately operated chemical plants — one-fifth of which are close to cities and other heavily populated areas.

The chemical industry generally has resisted federal regulation, and large manufacturers have voluntarily taken steps to improve security that they deem adequate. Small chemical firms and plants have largely ignored beefing up safeguards to avoid having to pay for them.

Homeland Security "wants and deserves authority to set federal standards for chemical security, and then enforce those standards," said Chris VandenHeuvel, a spokesman for the American Chemistry Council, which represents large chemical manufacturers. "Four and a half years after 9/11, they still don't have that."

Legislation is pending in the Senate to authorize Homeland Security to shut down facilities that do not comply with minimum safety standards. But the bill by Sens. Susan Collins, R-Maine, and Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., would largely let the chemical industry draw up its own security plans for the federal government to approve or reject.

Chertoff has not endorsed the plan, but he is expected on Tuesday to outline elements that he said would need to be in acceptable legislation. Congressional staffers said it likely would not encourage facilities to substitute safe substances for hazardous chemicals, as environmentalists have demanded.

Without that provision, "there isn't any security that would be good enough," said Rick Hind of Greenpeace. "A small plane or a high-powered weapon would bypass any gate or fence."

Chemical Plants May Be Called To Boost Security (WSJ)

By ROBERT BLOCK

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Reversing course, the Bush administration says it will now work with Congress to require the chemicals industry to better protect its facilities from terror strikes, requiring companies to draft detailed antiterrorism plans and penalizing those that don't comply.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, in remarks today to the American Chemical Council, an industry trade group, is expected to detail the minimum requirements he would like to see Congress include in legislation to bolster security at U.S. chemical plants.

"The fact of the matter is: chemical plants and, in fact, transportation of chemicals, remains a vulnerability," Mr. Chertoff said in a speech yesterday at the Heritage Foundation, previewing his remarks today. "Progress on this has stalled for too long. We do need legislation and congressional action and leadership on this point."

A chemical plant security bill is pending in the Senate, drafted by Sens. Susan Collins (R., Me.) and Joseph Lieberman (D., Conn.). Mr. Chertoff said the administration will work with them to refine and advance the bill into law. The goal "is to have flexibility, appropriate risk management, smart use of technology and not heavy-handed strangulation or overregulation."

Following the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks, lawmakers and some top Bush administration officials pointed to the vulnerability of U.S. chemical plants to similar strikes.

Former Environmental Protection Agency administrator Christine Whitman wanted to use existing EPA authority to compel the chemicals industry to adopt stricter protective measures that would make it more difficult for terrorists to attack plants and tank cars. Fearing overregulation, industry officials convinced the White House to shift plant security to the newly created Department of Homeland Security, but without any power beyond making recommendations.

The Department of Homeland Security wouldn't provide advance details of Mr. Chertoff's remarks. But Chris VandenHeuvel, a spokesman for the American Chemistry Council, said he expects Mr. Chertoff will say legislation must give his department authority to work with the industry to set minimum security standards. He also wants real enforcement power.

"DHS does not have authority it needs to compel the industry to stake steps necessary to protect against terrorists and terrorism, and Mr. Chertoff wants that to change," Mr. VandenHeuvel said.

A 'Unified Command Structure' In Search Of A Leader (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

As Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff sat down for lunch yesterday on the seventh floor of the Heritage Foundation, a vivid scene from the post-9/11 world was unfolding outside the conference-room window.

Two blocks away at Union Station, a small grease fire had erupted on the grill at McDonald's. The blaze was quickly extinguished, but not before jittery security personnel ordered the terminal evacuated. Hundreds of shoppers, diners and rail passengers, heeding shouted warnings to flee the premises, flowed into the plaza outside, where emergency response vehicles joined the usual duck boats and tourist trolleys.

Chertoff aides watched the mayhem from the Heritage windows, but Chertoff himself missed the hullabaloo; one of his lunch partners explained that his security guards had ordered the blinds drawn.

It was just as well -- the secretary has enough crises to worry about these days.

A year after he took over from Tom Ridge at Homeland Security, Chertoff is getting much of the blame for the woeful Hurricane Katrina response, insufficient supervision of the Dubai port deal and domestic defenses that remain, by most accounts, unacceptably weak.

Earlier this month, the conservative magazine Human Events quoted administration officials as saying that Chertoff had "only a few days left" in the Cabinet. The White House denied it, but the rumors -- and calls for his head -- continue.

Yesterday, an hour before Chertoff addressed the International Association of Fire Fighters at the Hyatt on Capitol Hill, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) won vigorous applause from the firefighters for demanding Chertoff's ouster for his role in a "dangerously incompetent" administration.

All of this must have Chertoff, a former star prosecutor and top Justice Department official, wondering why he gave up his seat as a federal appellate judge for a position that earns him -- deservedly or not -- unending criticism.

"You gave up a lifetime appointment for this?" Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) marveled to Chertoff at a Senate hearing last month at which the secretary was getting abuse over Katrina.

"My wife reminds me of that periodically," Chertoff replied, ruefully.

Chertoff's problem is not, as Biden suggests, that he's incompetent. The secretary is highly accomplished. His problem, if anything, is he's a model technocrat in a position that sometimes demands a commanding leader.

A strikingly thin man with a high-pitched voice, pointy ears and droopy eyelids, Chertoff speaks of "the critical points of triangulation" and calls for a "properly risk-managed approach to critical infrastructure." He talks about the need for "total assets visibility" and favors "an integrated, sensible, systems-based approach." He desires "better information about the constituents of the supply chain." And instead of telling people that he's protecting them, he says that his department has "done a lot to elevate the general baseline of security in this country."

Relax, America: Your general security baseline is elevated because of a systems-based approach to critical triangulation points.

These kinds of statements -- all voiced at Heritage yesterday -- make the wiry Chertoff a big target for those building a case that the administration is lax about homeland security. The firefighters' president, Harold Schaitberger, began yesterday's conference with a speech complaining that "the administration and OMB have recommended drastic cuts" in first-responder programs.

Biden asked the crowd, almost all men, whether the administration was protecting Americans. "Well folks, the winds of Katrina and the shoddiness of the Dubai port deal . . . have answered the question," he said.

Chertoff, suffering from a cold, cleared his throat 10 times as he spoke to the firefighters and 20 more when talking at Heritage. He offered a series of explanations for the Katrina problems: "catastrophe of the century . . . a disaster is always an ugly thing . . . Mother Nature can be awfully tough to deal with."

He blended that with his technocratic explanations of DHS ("internal integration into a unified command structure") and attempts at high rhetoric that fell short. Pointing to photos of the Sept. 11, 2001, wreckage, Chertoff said: "You are really part of the war on terror, as well as the war against all hazards."

War Against All Hazards: WAAH?

Chertoff, pursued by reporters, was whisked from the building and into a waiting Chevy Suburban by a knot of aides and bodyguards -- and away to the relative safety of Heritage. There, after lunch, former attorney general Ed Meese introduced him by praising his "dynamic leadership."

Chertoff displayed that dynamism by giving the audience an earful about the need to "integrate all of your organs of power" to achieve "the totality of effort." A few of his listeners allowed their eyes to close.

Chertoff made a beeline for the exit after 30 minutes. "Because of the secretary's schedule, he's not able to take questions," Meese tried to explain. In the war against all hazards, a Q&A session probably would not elevate the general baseline of Chertoff's job security.

U.S. Eyes Privatizing Cargo Security Work (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

Homeland Security officials are looking to have private companies validate the security procedures under which cargo travels from foreign ports into U.S. terminals.

The program, which would give speedier entry to U.S. ports to ships and suppliers that meet the security standards, is now in the hands of 80 Homeland Security inspectors who have to plow through more than 10,000 applicants.

Although Homeland Security plans to hire an additional 40 inspectors in the coming months, the department also is looking to outsource to private companies some of its duties, in particular the validation process, which has dragged for years and involves on-site inspections of ships and cargo abroad.

More than 5,800 companies currently get some shortcuts by being "certified." But only 1,545 have been "validated" to receive the full benefits of the program after first-hand inspections, such as fewer on-site checks at U.S. ports, said Jayson P. Ahern, assistant commissioner of field operations for Customs and Border Protection.

Mr. Ahern says the manpower shortage has the department exploring other options, including contracting the work to the private sector.

"I am not happy where our progress has been," Mr. Ahern told a House panel last week.

The Customs-Trade Partnership Against Terrorism (C-TPAT) was initiated after the September 11 attacks to secure the cargo chain from port to port. Companies that open their doors to full security inspections get fewer checks at ports of arrival and faster processing.

Although critical of the program's sluggish pace, Rep. Loretta Sanchez, California Democrat, endorsed the idea of outsourcing.

"We are relying on companies that we haven't even gone out to check to see if in fact they have the security things in place that you said they had," says Miss Sanchez, ranking member of the House Homeland Security subcommittee on economic security, infrastructure protection and cybersecurity.

"I mean, you have 80 people that can't possibly check these 10,000 companies. What about having somebody else check them?" said Miss Sanchez, who formally asked the agency to consider privatizing the work.

"We have, to this point, resisted the notion of third-party validators. We think it is a responsibility that we should be doing in the government, and not necessarily contracting it out. However, given the current situation ... we want to have more parties involved with a trusted program. We want to have the largest corporations in the industry, the importers reaching back to their suppliers, vendors, manufacturers, putting levels of security in place throughout the supply chain," Mr. Ahern said.

"So perhaps we are coming to a point in time where, in certain environments with certain countries that may not be of a significant risk, maybe [using] the third-party validator has a [place] for us. So we are going to be evaluating that with new eyes, but to this point we have been opposed to it," Mr. Ahern said.

Suzanne Trevino, a spokeswoman for CBP, said yesterday that her agency is looking at the prospect of hiring third parties to validate security.

"At this point, the only thing we will say is that we will look at it, but we have not started a formal process. We don't have the resources to complete the validation necessary or that Congress wants," Mrs. Trevino said.

Last March, the Government Accountability Office criticized the program and cited weaknesses in the validation process, which it said "is not rigorous enough to achieve its stated purpose, which is to ensure that the security procedures outlined in members' security profiles are reliable, accurate and effective."

As of Nov. 2, 2004, more than 7,300 applications had been filed. Of them, 4,153 had been certified and slightly more than 400 validated. Almost 3,000 applications have since been filed.

Peter Tirschwell, publisher of the Journal of Commerce, called the Homeland Security idea an "outsourcing of security."

"They exist in a commercial environment to facilitate commercial transactions. Something as important as our national security, asking them to perform what is a government role -- it's hard to see how that could be successful," he said.

The move comes on the heels of furor over a plan for a Dubai company to operate terminals in six U.S. ports. Asked whether the current mood against foreign companies operating in matters of national security might affect this proposal, Mr. Tirschwell said, "I think it would not be looked at favorably."

Seth Stodder, former director of policy and planning for Customs and Border Protection, said private validation firms can serve as a "force multiplier" but the final responsibility has to lie with the government.

"The devil's always in the details, but in the abstract, I think it's a good idea to help CBP get more validators out there, and that's critical," said Mr. Stodder, who works with the lobbying firm Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld LLP.

"There is a need to step up validation and make it faster, but there are hurdles to think about when using third parties -- training and management, vetting employees," Mr. Stodder said.

Dubai Will Delay Another Acquisition Involving U.S. Plants (NYT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

The Dubai government delayed its $1.2 billion purchase of a military equipment maker yesterday, the second time in a month that a takeover by the Middle East emirate has been jeopardized by American security concerns.

Dubai International Capital, owned by the government of the Persian Gulf emirate, said that it would delay its acquisition of the Doncasters Group, a British company that has nine plants in the United States, by as much as two months from March 31 while government agencies review the purchase.

"After what happened with Dubai Ports, the government is looking at this deal more closely," Sameer al-Ansari, Dubai International's chief executive, said in an interview.

Dubai International is buying Doncasters from the Royal Bank of Scotland Group, its owner since 2001. Shaun Gamble, a spokesman for the Royal Bank of Scotland in London, declined to comment yesterday.

Dubai's purchase of Doncasters, which was agreed to on Dec. 14, may ignite a political debate in the United States similar to that caused last month by the $6.8 billion purchase of the Peninsular & Oriental Steam Navigation Company by DP World, a Dubai-owned company. Succumbing to political pressure over that deal, DP World had to agree to sell its interests in United States terminals. Revenue from Doncasters's American plants, which make parts for tanks and military aircraft, account for about 40 percent of total sales.

"If this deal isn't approved by the U.S., it wouldn't proceed," said Angus Blair, chief executive of Mena Financial, a company in London that advises foreign companies about doing business in the Middle East. "Forty percent is too big to ignore," Mr. Blair said.

The Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, a federal body that considers the sale of American assets to foreign companies, started a detailed 45-day investigation into the Doncasters agreement at the end of February, Mr. Ansari said.

Currency Flow And Trade (WT)

By Michael R. Czinkota

The policy eclat over the acquisition of selected U.S. port operations by Dubai appears to be over. There were threats byCongress to pass legislation prohibiting such ownership, countered by statements that President Bush would veto any such legislation. Now, the Dubai owners have decided to spin off the U.S. operations from the global conglomerate which they have purchased. Yet, there may be significant long-term consequences for currency values and trade practices.

Most of the public discussion of this sordid affair has reflected the growing sensitivity in the United States to ownership and control of assets by non-domestic entities. The debate has focused heavily on possible discrimination against Muslim investors, protection against terrorism in U.S. ports and retaliation against U.S. investors abroad.

What appears to be not yet widely understood are the potential effects that these and similar policy decisions (such as the Unocal walk-away by China) can have on the value of global currencies and on trade flows. Congress' law of unintended consequences may strike again: The short-term direct effects of this action are likely to be far outweighed by the long-run indirect effects.

The United States has experienced more than 20 years of current-account deficits. It imports more than it exports. In past years, every month has brought more news about growing trade deficits, now up to $68.5 billion per month. It is hard to remember that President Nixon decided to abandon the fixed-exchange rate system for the Western world because of an annual imbalance of $5 billion. But we do see in more recent times that, typically, nations with a current-account deficit above 5 percent of gross domestic product (GDP) have experienced grave domestic and international consequences.

Even though the current imbalance is approaching 6 percent of GDP, these harsh consequences have not occurred in the United States. There the conditions are special: They are influenced by a high willingness of other countries to hold U.S. dollars, a substantial ability of foreign individuals and institutions to lend those dollars to the United States and a high U.S. capability to embed the dollar as a global currency. As a result, there is a surface picture of tranquility which has abounded in global trade and currency markets.

However, we know that this trend will have to change. Eventually, the United States will have to export more and import less. The key questions are how to achieve such change, how long to wait for such change and whether it should occur through market forces or through government intervention. It does appear that in addition to growing international competitiveness of U.S. firms, changes in the value of the U.S. dollar are needed to reverse the astounding trade imbalances.

The Dubai withdrawal may well be the watershed that triggers shifts in exchange rates now. The congressional debate, the national posture and the global repercussions may well form the basis of new Plaza Agreement-type conditions, which will gradually drive down the value of the dollar for the long term.

The pronouncements by Congress, the growing public debate and the withdrawal plans of the foreign investors directly play to the emotions of investors. The message is clear: Investments and ownership by foreign capital holders will be scrutinized with new rules, and may well be attacked, rejected or publicly scorned. This will be done regardless of plans made by the administration or commitments made to global agreements.

In other words, confidence in the U.S. dollar has been challenged by the U.S. itself. We know that money is just a piece of paper. What matters most in setting its value is the psychology behind it -- the trust, outlook and confidence in the government that has issued the money. Investors may be shaken by the public response to the port-acquisition plans, but Mr. Bush's steadfast embrace of foreign funds is an important counterpoint which reduces the urgency of the concerns, lets any shift come slowly and results in a soft landing.

The uncertainty and therefore the risk for anyone holding dollars or dollar-based assets has now increased. Such a change influences the perceptions of investors and their actions. Fewer investments from abroad into the United States and a decrease in dollar holdings will depreciate the price of the dollar, making imports more expensive and exports cheaper. In addition, continued discussions may affect U.S. public opinion and eventually change the views, brand preferences and country-of-origin sensitivity of American buyers.

This almost kabuki-like political interaction on port ownership may well presage a long-delayed and necessary shift in trade outcomes. What appears to be an unfulfilled policy debate on foreign investment may yet stimulateimportant changes in trade patterns which are based on market forces rather than government intervention.

A House committee said Monday it would review several post-Katrina hurricane contracts for waste and abuse, citing recent concerns about limited oversight and the haste in which they were awarded.

The Government Reform Committee will hold at least one hearing in April, said Robert White, a spokesman for chairman Tom Davis, R-Va. Witnesses and the specific contracts that will be scrutinized have yet to be determined, he said.

Last week, the Government Accountability Office reported in its first preliminary overview of Katrina contracts that the government wasted millions of dollars, including at least $3 million for 4,000 beds that were never used. The report blamed in part mismanagement and poor planning by agencies.

Rep. Henry Waxman (news, bio, voting record), the senior Democrat on the panel, suggested earlier Monday that Davis to hold hearings on Katrina contracting. Waxman has proposed creating an independent, anti-fraud commission and has criticized congressional oversight of the hurricane recovery effort.

A House select committee also chaired by Davis issued a report last month saying waste in government contracts was due largely to poor planning. In one case, Mississippi officials requested from the Federal Emergency Management Agency 450 trucks of water and ice. After FEMA could not immediately deliver it, state officials were forced to buy from the commercial market at an untold cost, the report said.

"We spent five months investigating Katrina, including the contract issues," White said. "We understand there needs to be further review — GAO report or no."

New Orleans Mayor Backs Building Plan (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, March 20 -- Mayor C. Ray Nagin (D) finished work Monday on a plan to rebuild New Orleans, endorsing a proposal that would allow all residents to rebuild their homes in neighborhoods shattered by Hurricane Katrina.

The mayor's advisory commission, formed after Katrina struck Aug. 29, recommended in January that some flooded neighborhoods be replaced with parks and that the city take a go-slow attitude in rebuilding low-lying areas. But that suggestion was greeted with jeers and outrage at public meetings.

Nagin, who is running for reelection on April 22, distanced himself from that plan.

On Monday, he offered to let residents rebuild anywhere but warned that homeowners in flood-prone areas would do so at their own risk. "I'm confident that the citizens can decide intelligently for themselves," Nagin said.

The report also recommended revamping schools, and a wish list of projects included new light-rail systems, new riverfront development and better flood protection.

"It has been controversial in some respects, but I am pleased by the results," Nagin told hundreds of residents who gathered to hear about the plan.

The release of the report came hours after civil rights groups took aim at the state's plan for rebuilding. Critics said that plan gives short shrift to poor and low-income victims, focusing too much on bailing out homeowners and encouraging high-end development at the expense of low-income renters.

If a White House proposal is approved by Congress, the bulk of Louisiana's reconstruction would be funded with $9.2 billion in federal grants using a plan by Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D).

Blanco's plan still needs approval by the state legislature, the Department of Housing and Urban Development, and the Louisiana Recovery Authority.

More Katrina Fatalities Could Be Found (LAT)

By Ann M. Simmons

The Los Angeles Times, March 21, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — The discovery of two bodies in the wreckage of a neighborhood devastated by Hurricane Katrina seven months ago has served as an unsettling omen to families still searching for missing relatives.

Eight bodies have been found since March 1, and with about 1,400 people still unaccounted for, Louisiana state officials said they could not rule out the possibility of finding others.

Until recently, recovery teams were unable to retrieve bodies from the neighborhoods that were rendered uninhabitable and designated off-limits to residents.

The two bodies found Sunday in the rubble of a collapsed home in the city's Lower 9th Ward have not been identified.

Investigators with the Orleans Parish coroner's office, which recently took over the process of identifying and releasing the remains of Katrina victims, would not say precisely where they found the bodies or comment on their condition.

"All I can say is we picked up two bodies," said John Gagliano, the coroner's chief investigator. "I don't have any more information as to the identification. We haven't done anything with them yet."

The hurricane left 1,287 people dead in Louisiana.

Until early March, the federal government's Disaster Mortuary Operational Response Team was in charge of alerting families when a deceased relative had been identified, and then releasing the remains to the appropriate funeral home. That task now falls to the parish coroner.

The New Orleans Fire Department has been using dogs to sniff out human remains in targeted areas.

The state-contracted Find Family National Call Center has received 11,601 phone calls since September to report people missing after the storm. As of Monday, 1,445 had not been accounted for, according to Kristin Meyer, public information officer with the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals.

However, officials said that most of the unaccounted-for were probably alive.

"We expect 300 to 400 will be really, truly missing," said Melissa Walker, another state health department spokeswoman. "Some might have died and been washed out to sea, and we'll never ever know." Others might be intentionally missing, she said.

Walker said that between 30 to 50 people, initially thought to be missing, were being located every day.

Meyer said that in many cases, people moving from evacuation shelter to trailer to other temporary housing haven't been able to contact family. When they finally do connect, relatives who filed a missing-persons report don't always inform authorities that their loved one has been found.

Walker said the Baton Rouge-based Find Family National Call Center receives about 150 calls a day from families looking for relatives. Between 10 and 15 of them are new callers.

Relatives are required to fill out an eight-page report with detailed information, including unique physical identifiers such as birthmarks and tattoos.

A file is opened on each person reported missing. The name is run through several missing-persons databases, including that of the state police and groups such as the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children.

Still, residents and community activists said it was crucial to monitor the demolition of homes — which recently started in some neighborhoods — to ensure that proper searches were being made and that remains of victims could receive a decent burial.

"We have people who go out to where they're planning to bulldoze a home and make sure they've checked with cadaver dogs first," said Lisa Fithian, a spokeswoman for Common Ground, an all-volunteer grass-roots relief organization. "We try to make sure that whatever bulldozing is done, is done correctly."

Sunday's discovery sent chills down Valerie Schexnayder's spine. Until January, most of her immediate family had been scattered across several states, and there were moments of worry that some might be lost.

"I feel very grateful to the Lord that my family is reunited together," said Schexnayder, 60, whose house in the Lower 9th Ward was damaged beyond repair. "But I have some cousins, and we can't find them all. I hope they're all alive and well."

New Orleans Lacks Emergency Shelter As Storm Season Nears (USAT)

By Anne Rochell Konigsmark And Mimi Hall

NEW ORLEANS — As hurricane season approaches, the city doesn't have an emergency shelter, and local officials are asking for federal help to get people out of harm's way if another disaster strikes.

Residents who can't leave town on their own ahead of an oncoming storm during hurricane season, which begins June 1 and runs through November, will be asked to board buses at the city's downtown convention center. They'll then be shuttled to shelters in outlying areas.

“The emphasis will be on survivability, and that means getting out of the impact area,” said Terry Ebbert, the city's director of homeland security.

Ebbert said he fears that without federal help, citizens could be stranded in the city with nowhere to go. Neither New Orleans nor Louisiana has the resources to evacuate and shelter large numbers of residents, and the federal government has not yet committed needed aid, Ebbert said.

Ebbert sent written requests for help recently to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and R. David Paulison, the acting director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, both of whom he criticized for not reacting quickly enough. "The silence has been deafening," Ebbert said.

The federal Homeland Security Department is working on hurricane preparation in Louisiana, said the department's preparedness chief, George Foresman. "As they identify their gaps and shortfalls … that's where we're going to make sure there's a contingency plan in place," he said.

Foresman and FEMA will be in the region this week to get a "clear, blunt assessment" of what's needed, Chertoff said Monday.

The city has dropped the idea of using the Superdome or any other city structure as a shelter. During Hurricane Katrina, which hit New Orleans on Aug. 29, the Superdome became a nightmare for 20,000 residents who rode out the storm there. The roof peeled off and it rained inside; the building lost power and it became dark and hot; toilets stopped working; and food and water became scarce.

"I am never going to do a shelter of last resort again," New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said.

If there is a massive evacuation of southeast Louisiana, as there was ahead of Katrina, "there won't be enough buses," said Jeff Smith, acting director of the Governor's Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparedness. "The federal government needs to step in. But they have been very slow to respond."

Chertoff said his department has finished early assessments of state preparedness and evacuation plans and will work closely with the Gulf Coast states to make sure they have whatever they need to handle the next storm season. Homeland Security also has to "get our own house in order," Chertoff said.

To that end, the department is working on plans to better track supplies sent in to victims, handle hundreds of thousands of phone calls in the aftermath of a bad storm and better manage debris removal. Chertoff also urged citizens to do more to prepare on their own: "You cannot count on help coming in the first 24 to 48 hours (after) a catastrophe."

WAR NEWS:

President Offers Iraqi City As Proof Of Success In War (ABJ)

By Carl Chancellor And Lisa A. Abraham

Akron Beacon Journal, March 21, 2006

CLEVELAND - Iraq is the central front in the war on terror and the United States will not abandon that front until democracy is established, President Bush said Monday.

Bush came to the City Club of Cleveland to lay out his vision for peace and democracy in the Middle East in an effort to bolster support for the war in Iraq, now entering its fourth year.

``In the face of continued reports about killings and reprisals, I understand how some Americans have had their confidence shaken," he said. ``Others look at the violence each night on their television screens and wonder how I can remain so optimistic about the prospects for success in Iraq. They wonder what I see that they don't."

Bush said he sees the successes, and spoke in detail about the liberation of Tal Afar -- an Iraqi city that he said was roughly the size of Akron -- some 35 miles from the Syrian border.

Bush said the city had become a stronghold for terrorists, who brutalized residents and intimidated them through violence.

The town, liberated in September 2004, quickly fell into the hands of al-Qaeda again when local police weren't able to maintain order.

Terrorists planned to use the city as a strategic base where al-Qaeda could plan new attacks on the United States, he said.

But Bush said the United States was able to change its tactics to reclaim the city again -- this time for good -- by using the new strategy of ``clear, hold and build."

Bush admitted that, in the past, coalition troops would go into a town like Tal Afar and drive out insurgents. And when coalition troops eventually left, the insurgents would return.

DOJ_NMG_0019655

When troops returned to Tal Afar in 2005, he said, they drove out the terrorists, but this time Iraqi troops remained in place -- a move that has ensured the continued stability of the city.

``The people of Tal Afar have shown that Iraqis do want peace and freedom," Bush said.

The president said the United States must continue to fight the war on terror on whatever front necessary, including Iraq and Afghanistan.

``If we were not fighting this enemy in Iraq, they would not be idle," he said. ``They would be plotting and trying to kill Americans across the world and within our own borders."

Bush said more days of sacrifice and fighting are ahead, but he predicted that freedom would prevail, in the same way that Germany and Japan were turned into democracies after World War II. He said a democratic Iraq would one day serve as an inspiration for freedom throughout the Middle East.

``The United States will not abandon Iraq," Bush said. ``We will not leave that country to the terrorists who attacked America and want to attack us again. We will leave Iraq, but when we do, it will be from a position of strength, not weakness.

``Americans have never retreated in the face of thugs and assassins and we will not begin now."

Bush Asks U.S. To Look Past Iraq Bloodshed (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, March 20, 2006

Beginning the fourth year of an unpopular war, President Bush defended his Iraq record on Monday against skeptical questioning. He said he could "understand people being disheartened" but appealed to Americans to look beyond the bloodshed and see signs of progress.

Bush fielded questions for nearly an hour at the City Club, a forum known for its tough interrogations of world leaders. Not only was he grilled on Iraq, but he also was asked to justify his warrantless wiretapping program, U.S. relations with Pakistan and his domestic priorities.

The president was asked why he deemed Iraq — which turned out not to have weapons of mass destruction — as enough of a threat three years ago to launch an invasion, in contrast to nuclear-ambitious Iran today.

"One difference was that, in Iraq, there was a series of unanimous (U.N. Security Council) resolutions that basically held the Iraqi government to account, which Saddam Hussein ignored," Bush said. Still, he said Iran was a concern, on the question of nuclear weapons and on its role in Iraq.

The White House has accused Iran of meddling in Iraqi politics and of supporting armed militias in Iraq by sending men and weapons, including components for increasingly lethal roadside bombs. Iran and the United States have agreed to talk about Iraq, but Bush said, "It's very important, however, for the Iranians to understand that the discussion is limited to Iraq. We feel like they need to know our position."

As the president delivered the latest installment in an upbeat defense of his Iraq policy, opponents used the day after the third anniversary of the invasion to step up their criticism.

Three potential 2008 presidential candidates — Democratic Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel (news, bio, voting record) of Nebraska — offered critical assessments at the International Association of Firefighters' legislative conference in Washington.

Biden said it was time for Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to "be told to go home" and for Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "be given his walking papers." Richardson said U.S. involvement in Iraq had been "badly mismanaged by the administration."

Hagel, in an interview at the conference, said many of the predictions and promises made by the administration have fallen short, such as that oil revenues would pay for the war and the conflict would be short. He also pointed to Vice President Dick Cheney's assertion last May that the insurgency was in its "last throes."

"There's been a credibility erosion for three years," Hagel said.

On Capitol Hill, some Democrats said there had been progress in Iraq, as Bush asserted, but they said it was clouded by problems across the country. They said Bush had gone to war without enough troops.

"Some positive signs do not mitigate this administration's gross miscalculations and stunning incompetence in Iraq," said Rep. Steny Hoyer (news, bio, voting record) of Maryland, the No. 2 Democrat in the House.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said the "policies of the Bush administration and the civilian leadership of our military have made America less safe and left Iraq on the precipice of all-out civil war."

Bush pointed to success in stabilizing an insurgent stronghold in Tal Afar, a northern Iraqi city of 200,000 near the Syrian border.

"The strategy that worked so well in Tal Afar did not emerge overnight," Bush said. "It took time to understand and adjust to the brutality of the enemy in Iraq."

"The example of Tal Afar gives me confidence in our strategy," the president said.

One woman asked Bush whether he saw terrorism as a sign of the biblical Apocalypse, and a man followed up with how he could restore confidence in U.S. leadership after several reasons for going to war with Iraq later proved false.

"Like you, I mean, I asked that very same question: Where'd we go wrong on intelligence?" Bush said. He said he was working to improve intelligence gathering because "the credibility of our country is essential."

As for the Apocalypse, Bush said, "I haven't really thought of it that way. ... I guess I'm more of a practical fellow."

Bush bantered with the audience at times. And despite the probing questions, he received several rounds of enthusiastic applause.

"Anybody work here in this town?" Bush joked to laughter as he responded to question after question.

The White House made no attempt to screen either the audience or the questions, said spokesman Scott McClellan.

However, much of downtown near the hotel where Bush spoke was barricaded off. About 100 anti-war protesters chanted for the Republican president to leave the heavily Democratic city, held signs with peace messages and banged on drums.

Inside, not all the questions challenged Bush's war rationale.

One member of the audience invited him back for the Cleveland Hungarian Revolution 50th Anniversary next October. Others complimented him on his vision for a nuclear treaty with India and for his "very enlightening" comments about Iraq.

Cheney, attending a political fundraiser in Hanoverton, in northeast Ohio, also defended U.S. involvement in Iraq and said decisions on troop levels would be made without political consideration.

"Our coalition is also helping to build an Iraqi security force that is well trained and well equipped," Cheney said.

Old Forecasts Come Back To Haunt Bush (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

Three years of upbeat White House assessments about Iraq that turned out to be premature, incomplete or plain wrong are complicating President Bush's efforts to restore public faith in the military operation and his presidency, according to pollsters and Republican lawmakers and strategists.

The last two weeks have provided a snapshot of White House optimism that skeptics contend is at odds with the facts on the ground in Iraq.

Vice President Cheney said Sunday that his 10-month-old claim that the insurgency was in its "last throes" was "basically accurate" and reflects reality. Since Cheney's original comment, on at least 70 days there have been violent attacks that in each instance killed more than 10 people. Two weeks ago, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said the United States is making "very, very good progress" -- less than 48 hours before the U.S ambassador warned of a possible civil war breaking out. And Bush yesterday said his optimism flows in part from success in Tall Afar, a city in northern Iraq, though local residents there said sectarian violence is spreading.

Pollsters and some congressional Republicans said the administration's sunny-side-up appraisals, instead of lifting the public mood, may now complicate the task of sustaining support for a long-term military commitment in Iraq. The loss of trust, they said, is affecting Bush's presidency more broadly, as polls show his public support at a nadir.

Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.) said in an interview that Cheney was wrong about the insurgency being in its last throes and that she sent word to the White House recently to level with the American people about the challenges. "We need to assume that things are going to be very hard because when you do, you plan accordingly," said Wilson. "I am always cautious about always seeing things in the best light because war is not like that" and the public knows it.

Michael Dimock, associate director of the nonpartisan Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, said a recent survey by his group showed the public skeptical toward Bush, about both his administrative competency and his personal credibility. Only 40 percent of respondents said Bush was trustworthy, a 22-point drop from September of 2003, six months after the invasion of Iraq.

Dimock said the cumulative effect of the past three years has made Bush's public-relations challenge imposing, and perhaps impossible. "When you give a speech and try to persuade people that they are only hearing the bad and things are going better than the media is saying, if a majority of people say they do not find you trustworthy, it is hard to be persuasive," he said.

Frank Newport of the nonpartisan Gallup polling organization said White House efforts to turn around public opinion are complicated now because Bush is waging the wrong argument. His polling shows a majority of Americans agree with Bush that troops should not be pulled out immediately and that Iraq is better off now and will be in the future as a result of the invasion, two points the president made yesterday. Yet 6 out of 10 said the war was not worth it because, Newport said, the public does not see an upside for the United States. "The focus for Americans is Americans," he said.

Newport, whose survey found a 26-point drop in the number of people who find Bush trustworthy since the 2003 invasion, said Bush can restore his standing on Iraq, on his credibility and on other issues by improving his overall popularity -- a feat past slumping second-term presidents have found difficult to pull off. The erosion in the public's support for Bush at a personal level is a striking reversal for a president who for most of his first term was described by the public as a strong and trustworthy leader, especially on national security measures.

This erosion in trust is not a new phenomenon for a wartime president. Lyndon B. Johnson's upbeat appraisals of progress in the Vietnam War proved wrong so often that by 1967 commentators spoke of his "credibility gap" with the public, a liability that soon helped push him out of office.

In recent months, Bush has moved to talk more candidly about the problems in Iraq and yesterday said repeatedly that he understood the public's concerns. But it has not stopped his slide in the polls.

There also has been a steady drumbeat of criticism -- from Democrats in particular -- that the administration should have been more forthright about the war and its cost from the outset. There were the famous claims by Cheney and others that U.S. troops would be greeted as liberators after the invasion. Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), a strong supporter of the war, said that was true -- to a point. "The same people who cheer when you get rid of someone they hate might not be so happy" when you occupy their country for three-plus years, he said.

Other statements were proved wrong. The weapons of mass destruction the administration said Saddam Hussein possessed before the war have never been found -- and many experts believe never existed. White House officials hammered then-chief economic adviser Lawrence B. Lindsey for claiming the war could cost as little as $100 billion, saying the estimate was too high. The actual tally is fast approaching four times that amount, according to the Congressional Research Service, which estimates a $360 billion price tag to date.

Perhaps the most famous rosy statement came nearly three years ago when Bush proclaimed: "We have seen the turning of the tide" under a banner that read "Mission Accomplished." Since then, more than 2,300 Americans have died in Iraq.

Bush Defends Iraq Policy Before Tough Questioning (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson

Knight Ridder, March 20, 2006

CLEVELAND - Hoping to shore up support for the Iraq war, President Bush opened himself to questions at a rare public forum Monday and got an earful from skeptics who questioned his motives and his credibility.

Speaking to the City Club of Cleveland, Bush acknowledged that many Americans don't share his confidence that Iraq can become a stable democracy. The freewheeling question-and-answer session that followed his prepared remarks gave skeptics a chance to confront the president directly.

Bush seemed taken aback when the first questioner asked him whether he views the conflict in biblical terms, as an apocalyptic struggle for the Middle East. Some of the president's critics have speculated that his Christianity and a wish to protect the Holy Land are behind his desire to transform the Middle East.

"The answer is, I haven't really thought of it that way," he replied. "First I've heard of that, by the way. I guess I'm more of a practical fella."

Bush said his primary concern was protecting Americans from another terrorist attack.

Another questioner suggested that the president had damaged his credibility in the run-up to war by linking Iraq to terrorism and weapons of mass destruction.

"That's a great question," Bush said before taking issue with the assertion that he had tied Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein to the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001.

"I was careful never to say that Saddam Hussein ordered the attack on America," he said.

While that's true, the president did link Iraq to 9-11 in other ways.

For example, in a letter to Congress at the start of the war, Bush said the use of force against Iraq "is consistent with the United States and other countries continuing to take the necessary actions against international terrorists and terrorist organizations, including those nations, organizations or persons who planned, authorized, committed, or aided the terrorist attacks that occurred on September 11, 2001."

As for weapons of mass destruction, the president said the incorrect assumptions about Iraq's arsenal were an international intelligence failure.

"I asked that very same question: Where'd we go wrong on intelligence?" he said. "The credibility of our country is very important. I agree with you."

Another questioner asked why Bush had ordered an invasion of Iraq but is relying on diplomacy in the dispute over Iran's nuclear programs. The president said he felt he had exhausted diplomatic options with Iraq.

"The Iran issue is just beginning to play out," he added.

But Bush stressed that he's willing to go to war with Iran to protect Israel.

"I've made it clear, and I'll make it clear again, that we will use military might to protect our ally, Israel," he said.

A college student expressed concerns about the cost of the war, suggesting that the money spent in Iraq could be better used to help pay college tuitions at home.

"We can do more than one thing at one time," the president said.

The tough questions - all delivered in polite and respectful terms - were striking because Bush typically appears before audiences dominated by screened Republican supporters.

The City Club, a 94-year-old civic organization, bills itself as a "citadel for free speech" and insists that guest speakers take questions. Despite the obvious skepticism of some audience members, the president appeared to win over the crowd with his friendly banter and willingness to engage critics.

"He's got to get out and do more of this," retired radiologist Ted Castele said after the 90-minute session. "There are a lot of concerns, serious concerns."

Polls show that most Americans think the war was a mistake and don't expect a good outcome.

"I understand how some Americans have had their confidence shaken," Bush said. "They wonder what I see that they don't."

The president devoted most of his speech to declaring progress in Iraq, and cited the long campaign to rid the northern city of Tal Afar of terrorists as an example. Yet he also conceded:

"I wish I could tell you that the progress made in Tal Afar is the same in every part of Iraq. It is not." But "the example of Tal Afar gives me confidence in our strategy," he said.

Audience Peppers Bush With Questions About Iraq (USAT)

By David Jackson

DOJ_NMG_0019659

President Bush has often appeared before invitation-only audiences that tend to lob him softballs during question-and-answer sessions. But not Monday, when he took some tough questions from residents in Cleveland.

Most of the queries dealt with the Iraq war as it entered its fourth year — the financial costs, disputed rationales, and even whether the conflict is a sign of a coming apocalypse.

"Anybody work here in this town?" Bush joked during the 91-minute session that began with a speech about his Iraq strategy, but switched to Q&A.

Bush has opened himself up to audience questions more frequently in recent months, starting with a December speech on Iraq before the Philadelphia World Affairs Council. Last week, he took critical questions on his prescription-drug program at a senior citizens center in Maryland.

Bush clearly enjoys the repartee. Adam Levine, a former Bush assistant press secretary, says the president is "at his best" in a give-and-take. More important, this lets him bypass the media.

"When the noise level gets to a certain point, it's important for the president to communicate directly with people," Levine says.

About time, some political analysts say. "Going public, that's the strategy that seems wisest," given Bush's low approval ratings, says Shirley Anne Warshaw, professor of political science at Gettysburg College in Pennsylvania. "Americans are very forgiving of their leaders." Bush's approval rating was at 36% in a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll taken March 10-12.

Audience members, invited by the City Club of Cleveland, pressed him on the war. A woman cited a book whose author says the Bush administration has reached out to "radical" Christians who see the war and terrorism as signs of a coming apocalypse. "Do you believe this?" she asked.

Bush won audience sympathy with his halting answer: "The answer is," he said and paused. "I haven't really thought of it that way," he said finally, to audience laughter. "First I've heard of that, by the way." Bush then repeated his oft-stated contention that victory in Iraq is a key to success in the overall war on terrorism.

A man asked about what he said were the administration's prewar claims that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction, sponsored the9/11 terrorists, and had purchased nuclear-bomb materials. "All three of those turned out to be false," the questioner said. Bush disputed him: "I don't think we ever said — at least I know I didn't say — that there was a direct connection between September the 11th and Saddam Hussein. We did say he was a state sponsor of terror."

A questioner who said he was a high school student asked: "Mr. President, with the war in Iraq costing $19,600 per U.S. household, how do you expect a generation of young people such as ourselves to afford college?"

Bush questioned the student's premise: "Hold on, we can do more than one thing at one time," he said, insisting the economy was robust enough for national defense and student loans.

Before the Q&A, Bush devoted his speech to the "clear, hold and build" strategy in Iraq. He focused on the city of Tal Afar, where he said U.S.-led forces have cleared out terrorists and helped build democratic institutions. He called that an "example of progress in Iraq that most Americans do not see every day in their newspapers or on their television screens."

In an aside about Iran's nuclear ambitions and threats against Israel, Bush promised to use "military might to protect our ally Israel, (though) our objective is to solve this issue diplomatically."

There were some friends there. A man who said he represented the Cleveland Hungarian Revolution 50th Anniversary Committee noted that his group has a major event coming up in October.

"I'm not sure what I'm doing in October," Bush said to more laughter. "Put me down as a 'maybe.' "

Bush Urges U.S. To Take Long-Term View Toward Iraq (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, March 21, 2006

CLEVELAND — Three years after the United States launched the invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein, President Bush said today that the overhauled U.S. strategy of clearing insurgents from the cities and then using Iraqi and U.S. forces to rebuild was succeeding.

The president cited the rebound by the city of Tal Afar, which U.S. forces abandoned in the autumn of 2004 after successfully battling insurgents, only to see the fighters return in two months. Bush said that with concerted military efforts followed by rebuilding the civic structures and holding elections, "the terrorists are becoming marginalized."

"The strategy is working," the president said.

Today's speech was the second in a series of at least three that the president is delivering to mark the anniversary of the start of the Iraq war. Each is intended to draw attention to one aspect of the conflict that, according to the administration, demonstrates that the United States is meeting its goals there — the daily reports of chaos and death notwithstanding.

Facing polls that increasingly indicate that the American people are turning away from their earlier support for the invasion and war, Bush acknowledged that the images of bombings, beheadings and other attacks on Iraqi civilians were horrific.

"Nobody likes beheadings," the president said.

And he said it was "not easy to capture in a short clip on the evening news" the signs of progress. They are not as visually dramatic, he said, as a bombing in a marketplace.

Last Monday, Bush acknowledged that the violence continued to tear the country apart. He said U.S.-trained Iraqi forces were increasingly taking a leading role in securing the nation and would be responsible for more than half the country by the end of the year.

Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), a critic of Bush's Iraq policy, pointed out Sunday that this includes vast stretches of uninhabited desert.

"The fighting has been tough," Bush told the Cleveland audience. "The enemy that we face has proved to be brutal and relentless There will be more days of sacrifice and tough fighting before the victory is achieved."

But, the president said, with the new control exercised over Tal Afar and other towns and cities, "most of the country has remained relatively peaceful."

The president's audience, gathered at midday at a downtown hotel, was the City Club of Cleveland, a nonpartisan organization founded in 1912 that says it is the oldest "continuous free speech forum" in the United States. It responded with only occasional displays of enthusiasm, interrupting Bush's speech with applause for the first time nearly 28 minutes after he began speaking, when he said, "The decision to remove Saddam Hussein was the right decision."

The president spoke for an hour and a half, with nearly an hour of it spent answering questions from the audience. For a president whose public appearances are usually carefully choreographed, the questions were penetrating and critical.

The first was about "prophetic Christians" who see the war in Iraq as an early sign of the apocalypse.

To a question about the false premises for going to war — that Iraq was developing weapons of mass destruction, that it was buying materials for nuclear weapons from Niger and that it was becoming a haven for terrorists — Bush said, "I asked the very same question: Where did we go wrong on intelligence?"

A high school student, asserting that the war was costing $19,600 per household, wondered whether that money could be put to better use as college tuition aid.

"We can do more than one thing at a time," Bush replied.

Bush's speeches reflect a two-fold campaign: To lower expectations and at the same time hold out prospects for a successful outcome. Unless pressed by a questioner, the president makes no mention any more of one of the original reasons for the invasion: the suspicion that Hussein was developing unconventional weapons. No evidence of such a program has been found.

Rather, Bush focuses on the effort to establish democracy in a part of the world where it is rare, and on placing Iraq at the center of his effort to secure the United States from terrorist attacks.

He has also avoided the optimistic language that Vice President Dick Cheney has used. Ten months ago the vice president said that the insurgency was in its "last throes" and three years ago, as the invasion began, he predicted that U.S. troops would be greeted as liberators.

White House aides have concluded that Bush would lose credibility with such a rosy scenario.

The speech today was intended, said White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan, to demonstrate "how we have adapted to circumstances on the ground — we've seen problems and we've changed our approach to meet the realities on the ground."

In Tal Afar, which Bush said here in Ohio was roughly equivalent in population to Akron's 200,000 or so, the United States took a new approach. Rather than fighting terrorists, expelling them and leaving, Bush said, it executed a policy of "clear, hold and build." Military units expelled insurgents from the city and surrounding towns, and U.S.-trained Iraqi troops stayed behind to hold the city and work with local leaders to rebuild the economy.

"Spreading democracy and liberty is at the heart of our strategy of defeating the terrorists," Bush said.

By citing such examples, Bush is seeking to refute the sense that the United States is slipping deeper into a sinkhole from which it has no exit strategy.

That view has been reinforced by the increasing displays of sectarian violence dividing Sunni and Shiite Muslims. Today, McClellan disputed the assessment of the former Iraqi prime minister, Ayad Allawi, once a strong U.S. ally, that the fighting had turned into a civil war.

In a CNN/USA Today/Gallup national survey released last week, 55% of Americans said that chaos and civil war were the most likely outcomes in Iraq; 40% said they expected that a stable government would be formed. Only 37% of those polled said they believed the war in Iraq had been worth the cost — a sharp decline from 46% in January. Fully 60% of those surveyed said the war had not been worth the cost, equaling the highest percentage Gallup has ever recorded on that question.

And a poll released last week by the Pew Research Center found that public support for keeping U.S. troops in Iraq had reached its lowest point since the 2003 invasion. Half of the respondents said they wanted to bring U.S. troops home as soon as possible, compared with 44% who said the troops should stay "until the situation is stabilized."

Elsewhere today, the war's critics also took note of the anniversary.

Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware, the senior Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, noted that the invasion "got rid of a brutal dictator. And that's good. But we may be on the verge of trading him for chaos and a new terror haven in the Middle East.

"That's a bad bargain for America's security," the senator said.

He said such an outcome was looking increasingly likely "because of the dangerous incompetence of this administration."

The president's recent visits to Ohio have generated political controversy.

Sen. Mike DeWine, a Republican running for reelection, did not join Bush today, prompting Phil Singer, the spokesman for the Democratic Senate Campaign Committee, to say, "George Bush has become an albatross around the neck of the Republican Party."

Bush Concedes Iraq Grim But Sees Signs Of Progress (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush entered the fourth year of war in Iraq on Monday with a dramatically detailed and graphic accounting of violence there and allowed that many Americans have trouble accepting the successes he claims in a conflict that promises more "sacrifice and tough fighting."

With some analysts in Baghdad and Washington alike maintaining that sectarian violence in Iraq is devolving into civil war, the president is taking a new tack of balancing a sober and chilling recognition of persistent bloodshed with an unrelenting optimism for eventual victory.

Bush fielded a long series of often-critical questions from an audience in Cleveland, unusual for the often-shielded president. But he seized on progress that has been made against insurgents in one Iraqi city, Tal Afar, as an example of what he views as a turning tide in Iraq.

In his recounting of the successful battle for control of Tal Afar and the continuing struggle in Iraq, Bush maintained that insurgents' attacks were tailor-made for televised shock value because the insurgents cannot defeat the U.S. military.

"I understand how some Americans have had their confidence shaken," Bush said during his speech in the political battleground of Ohio, where he also had traveled to make his case for war before the U.S.-led invasion. People "look at the violence they see each night on their television screens, and they wonder how I can remain so optimistic. … They wonder what I see that they don't."

The president sees places such as Tal Afar, a northern Iraqi city of 250,000 where about 1,500 insurgents had taken control in 2004 and subjected Iraqis to a barrage of bloodshed. Now it is in the control of Iraqi military and police forces.

What much of the public sees is the overthrow of former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein gone awry, with a majority of Americans—57 percent in the latest Gallup Poll—telling pollsters they now consider the March 2003 invasion a mistake.

Bush: Despair understandable

"I understand people being disheartened when they turn on TV screens and see the loss of innocent life," Bush said. He recited some of the bloodshed that had beset Tal Afar—such as mortar shells lobbed into soccer fields where children were at play—before security was established in the city last year. "Nobody likes beheadings [or] … when innocent children get car-bombed."

As he has before, Bush presented the violence as a strategic campaign by terrorists to shake the resolve of U.S. forces that the president vows will not retreat from intimidation. But for a president hoping to frame an optimistic picture of Iraq, he delved into difficult details.

"In one grim incident, the terrorists kidnapped a young boy from the hospital and killed him, and then they booby-trapped his body and placed him along the road where his family would see him," Bush said. "When the boy's father came to retrieve his son's body, he was blown up. These weren't random acts of violence."

Bush took questions for nearly an hour from an audience at the City Club of Cleveland that had not been screened by the White House. In doing so, the president confronted critical questions not only about the conduct of the war, and the impact its cost is having on domestic programs such as education, but also about his program of domestic surveillance of suspected terrorists.

One man asked why the public should have confidence in a government that misjudged the threat Hussein posed before the invasion.

"I asked that very question—'Where did we go wrong on intelligence?'" Bush replied. "The part that's really important is how do we regain credibility when it comes to intelligence."

The administration has lost its credibility, Democratic critics maintain.

Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.), accusing the Bush administration of being "tone deaf" to suggestions for improvement, called on Bush to wage a Camp David-style diplomatic initiative to establish a stable government in Iraq.

'Pull out all the stops'

"We need to plan now for the real possibility that we may not be able to salvage the situation in Iraq," Biden, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said at a news conference Monday. "We must pull out all the stops … and run the risk of doing everything in [Bush's] power to get a coalition government" running in Iraq.

"This president has to take a political risk," said Biden, who is weighing a presidential campaign in 2008. "This war is Bush's war, by his own definition. His presidency will be defined and judged by its outcome. If his war fails, then America is hurt—America fails."

Anthony Cordesman, a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, made his own assessment of the situation in Iraq. Despite gains in creating a stable government, Cordesman said: "We face a scale of problems that we still tend to deny. There is a real risk that Iraq will degenerate into full-scale civil war or a level of divisiveness that will paralyze or limit Iraq's progress for years to come."

Bush Bluntly Defends Iraq Strategy, But Admits Missteps (NYT)

By John O'Neil

DOJ_NMG_0019663

President Bush gave a blunt defense of the American strategy in Iraq today, while acknowledging that ordinary Iraqis had been left exposed to terrorism during the war's earlier stages.

As the debate continued over where the war is headed at its third anniversary, a leading Democrat, Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., called on Mr. Bush to throw himself into an all-out effort to forge a government of national unity in Iraq and to begin planning for the civil war that was likely to follow if the effort failed.

Mr. Bush delivered an account from the Iraq war today that was both characteristically optimistic and unusually candid about shortcomings in the war's earlier phases and the suffering it caused for ordinary Iraqis.

Speaking to the City Club in Cleveland, the president told how Tal Afar, a city in western Iraq, had been freed from the control of Al Qaeda in Iraq, which it took over after the 2003 invasion and then re-established its hold on the city after a too-brief military operation by American forces in 2004.

The problem, he said, was that American forces concentrated initially on rooting out insurgents from a given area and then pursuing them elsewhere, an approach that left Iraqi citizens vulnerable, he said.

"Just put yourself in the shoes of the citizens of Tall Afar as all this was happening," Mr. Bush said.

"On the one side, you hear the coalition and Iraqi forces saying they're coming to protect you," he said. "But they'd already come in once, and they had not stopped the terrorists from coming back. On the other side, you see the terrorists and the insurgents. You know they mean business."

Mr. Bush described how Al Qaeda members in Iraq fired mortars at playgrounds, beheaded people assisting American forces and even booby trapped the body of a boy they had kidnapped and killed.

"You and your family feel besieged, and you see no way out," he said.

In early 2005, Mr. Bush said, "We recognized the problem and changed our strategy."

He described how the city was retaken in 2005 in a painstaking effort that combined military operations with the steady rebuilding of both the local security forces and the city's economic and political life.

"Now, you see your children going to school and playing safely in the streets," he said. "You see a city that is coming back to life.

Mr. Bush held out the story of Tal Afar as "a concrete example of progress in Iraq that most Americans do not see every day in their newspapers or on their television screens."

Senior administration officials had taken to the airwaves en masse on Sunday, the third anniversary of the war's beginning, to argue that the news media's focus on bombings and sectarian violence had given a skewed view of the progress being made in Iraq.

Mr. Bush began by acknowledging the recent outbreaks of violence that followed the bombing of a Shiite shrine a month ago. "The situation on the ground remains tense," he said. "I understand how some Americans have had their confidence shaken."

Mr. Bush also took note of a statement by Senator Biden of Delaware, the senior Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee, who said this morning that "we can't want democracy and peace more than the Iraqis."

"I agree," Mr. Bush said, and went to argue that the best way to build democracy there was by declaring "that the United States will never abandon Iraq."

Mr. Biden called for President Bush to make an all-out effort to forge a government of national unity there or get ready for full-scale civil war.

Speaking to reporters in Washington, Mr. Biden said that he agreed with the assessment made on Sunday by Ayad Allawi, the former Iraqi prime minister once favored by the White House, who declared that a low-level civil war had already started.

Mr. Biden said the United States had only a brief opportunity to head off a civil war that could destabilize the Middle East.

While praising the American ambassador in Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, Mr. Biden said that the only chance of Iraq's divided parties coming together was if Mr. Bush threw himself into the talks directly. Mr. Biden called for the president to convene a meeting of Iraq's top leaders and precede it by working to persuade countries around the globe to pressure Iraqis to settle their differences.

If a unity government is not formed by the summer, he said, the situation will be beyond repair. In that case, Mr. Biden said, America should withdraw all but 30,000 troops, who would be used to "keep the chaos confined to Iraq."

Mr. Bush's speech followed a carefully calibrated mix of optimism about eventual victory and caution about how long American troops would be involved that was displayed on Sunday by Mr. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, who sounded much as they had on the first anniversary of the invasion. At that time, the rebuilding effort had just begun, the insurgency was far less fierce, and the American occupation had suppressed, temporarily, the sectarian violence scarring Iraq today.

The picture painted by the administration clashed with that of Mr. Allawi, once hailed by Mr. Bush as the kind of fair-minded leader Iraq needed. He declared in an interview with the BBC on Sunday that the country was nearing a "point of no return."

"It is unfortunate that we are in civil war," said Mr. Allawi, who served as prime minister after the American invasion and now leads a 25-seat secular alliance of representatives in Iraq's 275-seat National Assembly. "We are losing each day, as an average, 50 to 60 people through the country, if not more."

"If this is not civil war," he said, "then God knows what civil war is."

Mr. Allawi's assessment was contradicted by Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the senior American commander in Iraq, who said on the CNN program "Late Edition" on Sunday that "We're a long way from civil war."

On the CBS News program "Face the Nation" Mr. Cheney sought on Sunday to place the war in a broader context. "It's not just about Iraq, it's not about just today's situation in Iraq," he said. "It's about where we're going to be 10 years from now in the Middle East and whether or not there's going to be hope and the development of the governments that are responsive to the will of the people, that are not a threat to anyone, that are not safe havens for terror or manufacturers of weapons of mass destruction."

The war has taken more than 2,300 American lives, and those of 33,000 to 37,000 Iraqis, according to the estimates of the Iraq Body Count Project, an independent group that monitors the news media.

Bush Says He Remains Confident In Iraq Strategy (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Richard Keil

Bloomberg, March 21, 2006

March 20 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush, speaking as the conflict in Iraq enters its fourth year, said the terrorists who destroyed a Shiite shrine last month won't succeed in sparking a civil war or thwarting democracy there.

Bush said today that he remains optimistic about the outcome of the war that defines his presidency, even though people in the U.S. are seeing ``horrific images coming out of that country'' from the recent sectarian violence.

``I understand how Americans have had their confidence shaken,'' Bush told the City Club in Cleveland, a day after Iraq's former prime minister said his country is in the midst of a civil war and edging toward a ``point of no return.''

The U.S. has been battling an insurgency in Iraq since Saddam Hussein's regime fell, and sectarian violence flared anew after a terrorist bomb destroyed a shrine in Samarra Feb. 22. With U.S. military deaths in Iraq surpassing 2,300, public support for the war dropping and the cost of the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan rising to $9.8 billion a month, Bush was giving the second in a series of speeches aimed at rallying Americans behind his policies.

``There comes a time on certain terribly important issues where everybody has made up their minds and it's very hard to change that,'' said Stephen Hess, a presidential scholar at the Brookings Institution in Washington. ``We've been at this for three years, and Americans have a better sense now of what the costs are.''

`Right Decision'

The president acknowledged that some in the U.S. are questioning whether the U.S. should have invaded three years ago. ``The decision to remove Saddam Hussein was the right decision,'' he said. The president said he will press ahead.

``We will settle for nothing less than victory,'' he said. ``The United States will not abandon Iraq.''

Bush cited the success U.S. and Iraqi forces have had in the city of Tal Afar, driving out insurgents then moving in to stabilize the city ``block by block.''

DOJ_NMG_0019665

Tal Afar, in northern Iraq, had been a staging area for insurgents and a battleground since the U.S.-led invasion on March 19, 2003. After several attempts to drive the insurgents from the city, the U.S. launched an offensive last September.

Back to `Normal'

Bush said after the military campaign, the U.S. and Iraqi government forces moved in to help rebuild housing, schools and other facilities. The tactics were the result of ``much trial and error," he said.

Since the city was stabilized, Bush said, residents voted in the December parliamentary elections and are ``resuming their normal lives."

``The example of Tal Afar helps give me confidence" that the U.S. strategy is working and will help Iraqis take over responsibility for their own security, Bush said.

While Bush continues to insist he won't set a timetable for a U.S. withdrawal, he has set a goal of having Iraqi forces take responsibility for most of the country's territory by the end of the year, allowing U.S. troops to pull back to providing logistics support and training rather than combat patrols.

The administration is trying to blunt criticism from members of Congress, including some of Bush's fellow Republicans, and suggestions that Iraq is descending into civil war. Former Prime Minister Ayad Allawi, who heads the secular Iraqi National List party that took 25 seats in the December elections for the 275-seat parliament, said yesterday that the sectarian violence is threatening to spin out of control.

Civil War

``We are losing each day as an average 50 to 60 people throughout the country, if not more," Allawi said on the BBC's ``Sunday AM" program. ``If this isn't civil war, then God knows what civil war is."

Republican Senator Chuck Hagel of Nebraska said on ABC's ``This Week" program yesterday that he agreed with Allawi and that Iraq has been in the midst of ``a low-grade civil war" for at least six months. ``Our own generals have told me that."

Hagel and some other lawmakers also have criticized the administration for painting a too optimistic picture of U.S. progress in Iraq in the past.

Three months into the battle against the insurgency, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld dismissed the resistance American troops were facing as ``pockets of dead-enders" that the U.S. military was isolating and eliminating. Last May, Vice President Dick Cheney said the insurgency was in its ``last throes."

Bush's job-approval ratings have been falling as a growing proportion of Americans say they believe the war was not worth fighting in the first place.

In the last Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, 37 percent of those surveyed approved of his job performance -- a low point of his presidency in that survey. Other national polls have shown similar results.

The Journal/NBC poll survey indicates that Iraq is a crucial cause of dissatisfaction, with 61 percent of adults saying they disapprove of Bush's handling of the conflict. Fifty-one percent said the overthrow of Hussein hasn't been worth the cost in human and financial terms, and 50 percent said the war has weakened the U.S.'s standing in the world.

In response to a question from an audience member, Bush said Iran pursuit of nuclear technology is a threat to peace because the current leadership in Iran has pledged to destroy Israel.

The U.S. stance is to use diplomacy to resolved the confrontation with Iran, Bush said, adding that the U.S. will use ``military might to protect our ally, Israel."

On another subject, Bush defended his decision to authorize the National Security Agency to monitor telephone and e-mail traffic from within the U.S. to suspected terrorists overseas.

``I believe what we're doing is constitutional," Bush said in answer to a question. ``We're going to keep doing it."

Bush Acknowledges 'horrific Images' In Iraq (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, March 21, 2006

President George W. Bush on Monday acknowledged the "horrific images" coming out of Iraq as the third anniversary of US invasion passed, but vowed that the US would "not abandon Iraq".

"We will not leave that country to the terrorists who attacked America and want to attack us again," he told an audience in Cleveland, Ohio. "We will leave Iraq, but when we do, it will be from a position of strength, not weakness."

Although Mr Bush and Vice-President Dick Cheney have denied that Iraq is on the verge of civil war, the Iraqi prime minister Iyad Allawi said at the weekend that it was already in a civil war, citing the 50-60 deaths per day.

Mr Bush tried to address that pessimism by offering Tal Afar, a town on the Syrian border that had been a strategic location for al-Qaeda, as a "concrete example of progress". First, he talked about how insurgents had turned it into a besieged, armed enclave using beheadings and roadside bombs.

"These were deliberate and highly organised attempts to maintain control through intimidation. After about two weeks of intense activity, coalition and Iraqi forces had killed about 150 terrorists and captured 850 more," he said.

After this counter-offensive, the number of people voting in the elections rose from 32,000 in January to 175,000 in November.

Mr Bush, however, conceded that progress was not "the same in every single part of Iraq", highlighting sectarian tensions in Baghdad. But he reiterated his hope that Iraq would become a democratic "inspiration throughout the Middle East".

Anthony Cordesman, Arleigh Burke chair of strategy at the Center for Strategic and International Studies warned that it could be 2007 or 2008 before stability is restored.

At the weekend General George Casey, commander of US forces in Iraq, said he did not believe that substantial troop reductions were imminent: "Maybe not over the course of the next few months, but certainly over the course of 2006 and into 2007."

Last week a poll showed that only one third of Americans thought Mr Bush had a clear plan for Iraq. However, only 24 per cent thought the Democrats in Congress had a clear plan.

Bush Pledges Not To Give Into Insurgents (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

CLEVELAND -- President Bush yesterday said U.S. strategy in Iraq has been developed through "trial and error" but said troops won't leave until they exit from "a position of strength, not weakness" and resolved not to surrender to insurgents.

"We will leave Iraq, but when we do, it will be from a position of strength, not weakness," Mr. Bush told the City Club of Cleveland yesterday in the second of a series of speeches on the war on terror. "Americans have never retreated in the face of thugs and assassins, and we will not begin now."

As in his first terror speech last week, Mr. Bush pirouetted from Iraq to Iran, calling that nation "a serious threat" to Israel in particular and saying the United States will use military force to protect Israel.

"I've made it clear, and I'll make it clear again, that we will use military might to protect our ally, Israel," Mr. Bush said in response to an audience question, although he said several times that there is still a chance for negotiations to work with Iran.

He also said the situation in Iran is not like the situation three years ago, as the United States was on the brink of war in Iraq.

"One difference was that in Iraq, there was a series of unanimous resolutions that basically held the Iraqi government to account, which Saddam Hussein ignored," he said.

The president also answered about a dozen questions from the audience, ranging from a defense of his wiretapping authority to his vision for reducing the wealth gap between white and black Americans and his immigration guest-worker plan.

Speaking a day after the third anniversary of the U.S. invasion of Iraq, Mr. Bush said news on the ground is mixed and admitted that the U.S. strategy has emerged "only after much trial and error."

He was also unusually frank in talking about the difficulties, including "horrific images" of executions, car bombs and reprisal murders and said he knows that Americans "wonder what I see that they don't."

But he said there are signs for hope -- most of them dependent on the ability of Iraqi security forces to step up their operations.

Mr. Bush said the situation in Tal Afar, a city 35 miles from the Syrian border that used to be a key location for al Qaeda, shows how coalition forces are learning from their mistakes.

Coalition troops first ousted militants from Tal Afar in September 2004, but within two months, the terrorists had returned and taken over the city again. Mr. Bush said Iraqi security forces weren't ready at the time to maintain peace.

Last summer, three battalions of coalition forces made a second attempt at cleaning the city, this time led by 10 Iraqi battalions. The difference, Mr. Bush said, was this time the Iraqis were ready for peacekeeping.

"It took time to understand and adjust to the brutality of the enemy in Iraq. Yet the strategy is working," Mr. Bush said.

Democrats said Mr. Bush's initial strategy failed because of poor decisions such as not committing enough U.S. troops. House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat and a war supporter, said the troop issue was the "one colossal blunder, above all others" that will stand out for historians.

And Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and a war opponent, said Mr. Bush still doesn't see the situation in Iraq clearly because he "fails to see the very real possibility that Iraq will continue the downward spiral into full-scale civil war."

During the 90 minutes, the president was animated, at times leaning forward on the podium to answer questions from the audience, freely joking with the audience of hundreds in the hotel ballroom and bantering in Spanish with one questioner.

At one point an audience member, apparently an Indian who wanted to ask a question about U.S.-Pakistani relations, joked, "Every chief needs Indian oversight."

Mr. Bush joked back, "How long were you working on that?"

In another exchange, Mr. Bush was asked whether he agreed with some evangelical Christians who see the war in Iraq as a sign of the apocalypse. The president said he hadn't "thought about it that way," adding, "First I've heard of it, by the way."

An Iraq Success Story's Sad New Chapter (WP)

By Peter Baker

CLEVELAND, March 20 -- As President Bush tells the tale, the battle for Tall Afar offers a case study in how U.S. and Iraqi forces working together can root out insurgents and restore stability. "The example of Tall Afar," he told an audience here Monday, "gives me confidence in our strategy."

Reports from the streets of Tall Afar, half a world away, offer a more complex story. U.S. forces last fall did drive out radicals who had brutalized the mid-size city near the Syrian border. But lately, residents say, the city has taken another dark turn. "The armed men are fewer," Nassir Sebti, 42, an air-conditioning mechanic, told a Washington Post interviewer Monday, "but the assassinations between Sunni and Shiites have increased."

The twists of Tall Afar underline the difficulties Bush has had in reassuring a doubtful American public that progress is being made in Iraq. The president and his aides say that the positive developments in Iraq get overwhelmed by the grim pictures of mayhem and massacre that dominate the evening news. If Americans knew about the success stories, the White House maintains, they would understand Bush's confidence of victory.

Yet even the success stories seem to come with asterisks. The administration hailed the election of a new democratic parliament last year, but the new body has so far proved incapable of forming a government for more than three months. U.S. forces have trained more Iraqi security troops, but the only unit judged capable of acting fully independently of U.S. assistance no longer can.

The cycle has taken a new spin with the latest evolution of Iraq from violent insurgency against foreign occupiers to sectarian strife bordering on civil war. Since the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra last month, hundreds of Iraqis have been killed in reprisals in a bloody spate of violence that has eclipsed most periods during the three years since the U.S.-led invasion.

All this has taken its toll on Bush's credibility, Republican strategists say, making it hard for him to make people see what he sees in Iraq. Continuing his latest drive to rebuild public support for the war, Bush flew to this Midwestern city on Monday to empathize with the pessimism many Americans feel as the war heads into its fourth year, while trying to explain the basis for his own optimism.

"In the face of continued reports about killings and reprisals, I understand how some Americans have had their confidence shaken," he told the City Club of Cleveland. "Others look at the violence they see each night on their television screens and they wonder how I can remain so optimistic about the prospects of success in Iraq. They wonder what I see that they don't."

To illustrate, he devoted his talk to Tall Afar, hoping to use the progress there as a symbol of hope for the rest of the country. The city of 290,000 in northern Iraq was at one point awash in violence, a haven for insurgents and foreign extremists. An initial U.S. military offensive in the fall of 2004 dislodged them only temporarily. When the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment returned last year, it set about trying a new, more patient strategy that focused more on winning over the local population, building cooperation with Iraqis, surrounding the city with a wall and ultimately flooding Tall Afar with patrols.

As Bush noted, the military heralded the offensive as a model for counterinsurgency. "The strategy that worked so well in Tall Afar did not emerge overnight -- it came only after much trial and error," the president said. "It took time to understand and adjust to the brutality of the enemy in Iraq. Yet the strategy is working."

Bush acknowledged that this offensive stood out. "I wish I could tell you that the progress made in Tall Afar is the same in every single part of Iraq. It's not," he said. But, he added, "the progress made in bringing more Iraqi security forces online is helping to bring peace and stability to Iraqi cities."

The Tall Afar strategy may not apply easily to other areas, particularly Baghdad -- a far larger and more populous city where it would take enormous numbers of U.S. troops to replicate the strategy, military analysts say.

The 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment "did a wonderful thing" in retaking Tall Afar, said Ahmed Hashim, a professor of strategy at the U.S. Naval War College who advised the regiment on counterinsurgency and cultural tactics. But Hashim, who wrote a book on the Iraqi insurgency that is being published next week, said he doubts that the example is readily transferable to the rest of Iraq, in part because of the weakness of the central government in Baghdad.

Hashim said he has also seen indications lately that the insurgents have begun "seeping back in" to Tall Afar now that the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment has rotated home and been replaced by another Army unit. And given the deep ethnic and sectarian divides in Tall Afar, he said, it is quite possible that the city could succumb to civil war, along with the rest of the country.

A Washington Post employee interviewing residents of Tall Afar found continuing anxiety in the streets. "Al-Qaeda has started to come back again," said Jaafar al-Khawat, 33, a tailor. "They have started to kill Shiites and Sunnis who cooperate with the Americans. Last Wednesday, they killed a truck driver because he worked with the Americans."

Yasir al-Efri, 23, a law student at Mosul University, said al-Qaeda pamphlets began appearing on the biggest mosque in Tall Afar in the past two months claiming credit for attacks. "The Tall Afar mission failed," he said. "The city will turn back to how it was before the battle within two months. The Americans are busy putting cement barriers and barbed wire around their bases and no one is taking care of the infrastructure."

Sebti, the mechanic, was more fearful of sectarian conflict. "People now are afraid to send their kids to school," he said. "I have to take my son to and from the school every day. There are two gangs in Tall Afar now that specialize in kidnapping children. Police can do nothing against that."

In his Cleveland speech, Bush received supportive applause for removing Saddam Hussein but also faced polite skepticism from some who addressed him during a subsequent question period. No major Ohio politician other than the mayor appeared with Bush, whose approval ratings have sunk below 40 percent, and war protesters demonstrated outside the downtown hotel where he appeared.

One man in the audience asked about Bush's credibility given that some of the reasons he originally gave for the war proved false. The president quarreled with the contention in one instance, denying that he ever made a "direct connection" between Hussein and the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, even though he often linked Baghdad with al-Qaeda generally. "I was very careful never to say that Saddam Hussein ordered the attacks on America," he said.

Bush acknowledged that the credibility issue -- the failure to find weapons of mass destruction that the administration said were in Iraq -- affected his ability now to confront Iran, which he has accused of secretly building nuclear weapons. But he offered tough language for Tehran, characterizing it as bent on destroying Israel. "It's a threat to world peace, it's a threat, in essence, to a strong alliance," Bush said. "I made it clear, I'll make it clear again, that we will use military might to protect our ally Israel."

Iraqi Turmoil Puts Mideast On Edge (CSM)

By Nicholas Blanford

The Christian Science Monitor, March 21, 2006

BEIRUT, LEBANON - The toppling of Saddam Hussein's regime was supposed to usher in a new era for the Middle East, according to the architects of the invasion, one in which Islamic extremism would be rooted out and budding democracies would replace stifling dictatorships.

Yet the region three years on is experiencing heightened sectarian tensions between Sunni and Shiite Muslims, expanding Islamic militancy, high levels of anti-Western hostility, and authoritarian regimes still clinging to power, analysts say.

"The balance sheet on Iraq since the US invasion has some positive aspects, but in most respects it is negative," says David Mack, vice president of the Washington-based Middle East Institute. While the invasion ousted Mr. Hussein's brutal regime, the subsequent turmoil "has probably strengthened the ability of autocratic regimes to resist evolutionary political change," Mr. Mack says.

The Iraq invasion jolted complacent regimes, especially as it coincided with nascent attempts by Arab democracy campaigners to push for reform. But, says Jordanian political commentator Rami Khouri, "the way the American adventure in Iraq has gone has emboldened many Arab [regimes] to defy the US because they feel that it has gone badly in Iraq and the Americans are not likely to do this again."

Take Syria, which has been in the gun sights of Bush administration hard-liners for years. The regime of President Bashar al-Assad has antagonized Washington since 2003 by its sluggish response to US demands such as curbing support for militant anti-Israel groups and, until recently at least, securing the border with Iraq. The ace up President Assad's sleeve, which has persuaded most Syrians to continue supporting the government and is making Western advocates of regime change hesitate, is concern over Iraq-style violence coming to Syria.

"The ethnic and religious composition of Syria is roughly similar to the divisions found in Iraq and Lebanon and no less explosive," says Theodore Kattouf, president of Amideast, an educational organization in Washington, and a former US ambassador to Damascus. "It seems that the bloodshed, chaos, and uncertainty of Iraq have led most Syrians to the default position that even a bad regime is preferable to the risks of instability."

The turmoil in Iraq is not solely to blame for the ills in the region, but it represents a powerful dynamic that has rippled across the Middle East feeding into other conflicts. "The situation in the broader Middle East is more complex, fragile, and dangerous today than it has been for a long time. Several of the multiple conflicts in the region are reaching a boiling point," UN special envoy Terje Roed-Larsen said last week.

Some analysts argue, however, that the political, economic, and social situation in the Arab world is so poor as to warrant shock therapy reform.

"Societies that have failed to tackle their serious developmental needs for so many decades ... eventually have to deal with one form of chaotic transition or another," says Ammar Abdulhamid, a Syrian social analyst and dissident. But he predicts a messy transition in which "deep-seated and long-simmering ... sectarian, ethnic, tribal, and other atavistic modes of belonging continue to rear their ugly heads."

The disorder in Iraq has strengthened the hand of Iran, an influential player in the maelstrom of Iraqi Shiite politics. And the ability of Iran to project itself into the Arab world through Shiite allies, with Moqtada al-Sadr in Iraq and Hizbullah in Lebanon, is a source of deep unease among Sunnis in the region. Strengthening ties between Iran and Syria with Hizbullah and Iraqi and Palestinian groups has further aggravated Sunnis over the emergence of a "Shiite crescent" stretching from Iran through Iraq, Syria, and into Lebanon.

"Yes, there is an alliance linking Syria, Iran, and Hizbullah, but it is a political alliance, not religious," says Sheikh Naim Qassem, Hizbullah's deputy secretary-general. "Whoever tries to draw a big Shiite picture will get muddled by all the contradictions."

Misconception or not, Sunni concerns of a Shiite crescent are likely to harden if Iraq continues what appears to be an inexorable slide into a Sunni-Shiite civil war, analysts say.

"The increasing violence and mistrust between Iraq's Sunni and Shiite communities carries the potential to exacerbate already existing tensions in an arc extending from Lebanon down to the eastern province of Saudi Arabia, where the minority of Saudi Shiites also inhabit a territory that is home to some of the richest oil fields in the world," says Mr. Kattouf.

Perhaps most worrying for regional stability is that Iraq has become a crucible for extremist Sunni militancy, a magnet for volunteers to join the insurgency against US and British forces. There are growing indications that the battle-hardened veterans of Iraq are returning to their home countries and planning attacks against their governments or Western targets.

"The Iraq which was only a potential safe haven for terrorists is now the chief breeding ground for a new wave of terrorism that may threaten the entire region and the United States," says Mack of the Middle East Institute.

Although Saudi Arabia has had some success in the past two years at clamping down on extremist militants following a wave of bloody attacks against foreign targets in 2003, Syria, Jordan, and Lebanon have all experienced outbreaks of Al Qaeda-style violence.

Still, whether the violence in Iraq will take root in neighboring countries or is a passing phenomenon remains to be seen. "Violent radicals be they Islamists or criminal elements are a tiny minority who disrupt and create fear, but have nothing to offer politically or economically," says Judith Kipper, director of the Middle East Forum at the Washington-based Council on Foreign Relations.

The Stone Face Of Zarqawi (WSJ)

By Christopher Hitchens

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

In February 2004, our Kurdish comrades in northern Iraq intercepted a courier who was bearing a long message from Abu Musab al-Zarqawi to his religious guru Osama bin Laden. The letter contained a deranged analysis of the motives of the coalition intervention ("to create the State of Greater Israel from the Nile to the Euphrates" and "accelerate the emergence of the Messiah"), but also a lethally ingenious scheme to combat it. After a lengthy and hate-filled diatribe against what he considers the vile heresy of Shiism, Zarqawi wrote of Iraq's largest confessional group that: "These in our opinion are the key to change. I mean that targeting and hitting them in their religious, political and military depth will provoke them to show the Sunnis their rabies . . . and bare the teeth of the hidden rancor working in their breasts. If we succeed in dragging them into the arena of sectarian war, it will become possible to awaken the inattentive Sunnis as they feel imminent danger."

Some of us wrote about this at the time, to warn of the sheer evil that was about to be unleashed. Knowing that their own position was a tenuous one (a fact fully admitted by Zarqawi in his report) the cadres of "al Qaeda in Mesopotamia" understood that their main chance was the deliberate stoking of a civil war. And, now that this threat has become more imminent and menacing, it is somehow blamed on the Bush administration. "Civil war" has replaced "the insurgency" as the proof that the war is "unwinnable." But in plain truth, the "civil war" is and always was the chief tactic of the "insurgency." * * *

Since February 2004, there have been numberless attacks on Shiite religious processions and precincts. Somewhat more insulting to Islam (one might think) than a caricature in Copenhagen, these desecrations did not immediately produce the desired effect. Grand Ayatollah Sistani even stated that, if he himself fell victim, he forgave his murderers in advance and forbade retaliation in his name. This extraordinary forbearance meant that many Shiites -- and Sunnis, too -- refused to play Zarqawi's game. But the grim fact is, as we know from Cyprus and Bosnia and Lebanon and India, that a handful of determined psychopaths can erode in a year the sort of intercommunal fraternity that has taken centuries to evolve. If you keep pressing on the nerve of tribalism and sectarianism, you will eventually get a response. And then came the near-incredible barbarism in Samarra, and the laying waste of the golden dome.

It is not merely civil strife that is partly innate in the very make-up of Iraq. There could be an even worse war, of the sort that Thomas Hobbes pictured: a "war of all against all" in which localized gangs and mafias would become rulers of their own stretch of turf. This is what happened in Lebanon after the American withdrawal: The distinctions between Maronite and Druze and Palestinian and Shiite became blurred by a descent into minor warlordism. In Iraq, things are even more fissile. Even the "insurgents" are fighting among themselves, with local elements taking aim at imported riffraff and vice-versa. Saddam's vicious tactic, of emptying the jails on the eve of the intervention and freeing his natural constituency of thugs and bandits and rapists, was exactly designed to exacerbate an already unstable situation and make the implicit case for one-man "law and order." There is strong disagreement among and between the Shiites and the Sunnis, and between them and the Kurds, only the latter having taken steps to resolve their own internal party and regional quarrels.

America's mistake in Lebanon was first to intervene in a way that placed us on one minority side -- that of the Maronites and their Israeli patrons -- and then to scuttle and give Hobbes his mandate for the next 10 years. At least it can be said for the present mission in Iraq that it proposes the only alternative to civil war, dictatorship, partition or some toxic combination of all three. Absent federal democracy and power-sharing, there will not just be anarchy and fragmentation and thus a moral victory for jihadism, but opportunist interventions from Iran, Saudi Arabia and Turkey. (That vortex, by the way, is what was waiting to engulf Iraq if the coalition had not intervened, and would have necessitated an intervention later but under even worse conditions.) There are signs that many Iraqi factions do appreciate the danger of this, even if some of them have come to the realization somewhat late. The willingness of the Kurdish leadership in particular, to sacrifice for a country that was gassing its people until quite recently, is beyond praise.

Everybody now has their own scenario for the war that should have been fought three years ago. The important revelations in "Cobra II," by Michael Gordon and Bernard Trainor, about the underestimated reserve strength of the Fedayeen Saddam, give us an excellent picture of what the successor regime to the Baath Party was shaping up to be: an Islamized para-state militia ruling by means of vicious divide-and-rule as between the country's peoples. No responsible American government could possibly have allowed such a contingency to become more likely. We would then have had to intervene in a ruined rogue jihadist-hosting state that was already in a Beirut-like nightmare.

I could not help noticing, when the secret prisons of the Shiite-run "Interior Ministry" were exposed a few weeks ago, that all those wishing to complain ran straight to the nearest American base, from which help was available. For the moment, the coalition forces act as the militia for the majority of Iraqis -- the inked-fingered Iraqis -- who have no militia of their own. Honorable as this role may be, it is not enough in the long run. In Iraq we have made some good friends and some very, very bad enemies. (How can anyone, looking down the gun-barrel into the stone face of Zarqawi, say that fighting him is a "distraction" from fighting al Qaeda?) Over the medium term, if our apparent domestic demoralization continues, the options could come down to two. First, we might use our latent power and threaten to withdraw, implicitly asking Iraqis and their neighbors if that is really what they want, and concentrating their minds. This still runs the risk of allowing the diseased spokesmen of al Qaeda to claim victory.

Second, we can demand to know, of the wider international community, if it could afford to view an imploded Iraq as a spectator. Three years ago, the smug answer to that, from most U.N. members, was "yes." This is not an irresponsibility that we can afford, either morally or practically, and even if our intervention was much too little and way too late, it has kindled in many Arab and Kurdish minds an idea of a different future. There is a war within the war, as there always is when a serious struggle is under way, but justice and necessity still combine to say that the task cannot be given up.

Mr. Hitchens, a columnist for Vanity Fair, is the author of "A Long Short War: The Postponed Liberation of Iraq" (Penguin, 2003).

Passing The Dinar (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

Two months before the Iraq war began, David Kay reported to the Pentagon for a job in the agency being formed to run postwar Iraq. Kay, a former Defense Department scientist and weapons inspector in Iraq, was supposed to oversee the police.

He assumed this meant preparing for the looting and crime to be expected when any regime collapsed. But those problems didn't seem to be on anyone else's mind, he told me, recalling his first day on the job.

"I said our first priority should be to establish order quickly, but that was considered a peripheral issue," he said. "The attitude was that it's not a problem, and if something happens the military will deal with it. I had one of the worst feelings ever in my gut, that this was going over a cliff."

On his second day on the job, he resigned — an excellent career move in retrospect, although Kay doesn't believe it took any special clairvoyance. There were tough questions before the war, like figuring out whether Saddam had W.M.D. or forecasting the strength of the insurgency. But the looting and disorder were easily predictable, and Kay wasn't the only one making the predictions, as Michael R. Gordon and Bernard E. Trainor document in their new book on the war, "Cobra II."

Before the war, Dick Mayer, a former policeman working for the Justice Department, came up with a plan to send in thousands of international police officers to maintain order after the invasion. But Pentagon officials bristled at the expense, and the White House rejected the plan.

A similar plan was proposed in a prewar briefing at the Pentagon by Robert Perito, a veteran of peacekeeping operations in other countries. He told the Defense Policy Board, the advisory group led by Richard Perle, that neither Iraqi authorities nor American soldiers could be counted on to maintain order, and that the U.S. should send in a constabulary force as soon as it occupied Iraq.

"The group at the Pentagon liked the concept and said it was a worthwhile thing to do," Perito told me. "But as one member put it, 'Not this war.' Their feeling was that the conflict in Iraq would be over so soon and things would be back to normal so quickly that it wasn't worth the effort."

Some Pentagon officials did warn of civil disorder and crime, but they didn't do anything about it. They passed the buck to Gen. Tommy Franks, even though he didn't have enough troops or money for the job and showed little interest in postwar planning. He simply assured President Bush that there would be a "lord mayor" in each city and large town to deal with civilian problems.

Looting, crime, mayhem — that was always someone else's department. The buck-passing reached its most absurd level at a briefing in the Situation Room just before the invasion, when Bush heard about the postwar plan to rely on Iraqis for law enforcement. According to Gordon and Trainor, the president was told of an intelligence report concluding that the Iraqi police "appeared to have extensive professional training."

That was like concluding that Inspector Clouseau appeared to be a master detective. During Saddam's era, when his security forces were the prime enforcers of order, the Iraqi police were notorious for corruption and lethargy. Officers waited for citizens to report crimes and expected bribes for investigating them. To the police, preventing crime, or even doing street patrols, was not their job.

When the regime fell, they didn't even protect their own police stations against the mobs of looters, a lack of professionalism that came as no surprise to the Iraqis I encountered shortly after the invasion. Nor were they surprised by the initial outbreak of violence against the buildings built by an oppressive regime.

But they were shocked at how little the Americans did in response. The looting went on so long that it became a regular job. Thieves methodically dismantled office towers, removing wires, pipes, walls, floors, escalators. In the summer of 2003, they took the "broken windows" theory of social disorder to a new level — to broken buildings — and Iraq has been paying the price ever since.

That summer, as Iraqis watched looters and criminals taking control, they kept asking why nobody put a stop to the crime. The answer from officials in Washington, it turns out, is the same one that would have been given by the old Iraqi police: not my job.

Gunmen ambushed a police station in the city of Muqdadiyah north of Baghdad Tuesday, killing at least 15 police officers and a guard at a nearby courthouse, police said.

The suspected insurgents struck at dawn, burning the police station and detonating a string of roadside bombs as they raced from the scene, a police spokesman in the region said.

At least seven others, including police officers and civilians, were injured in the attack in Muqdadiyah, which is about 90 kilometers (60 miles) north of the capital.

The attack came a day after at least 39 people were killed by insurgents and shadowy sectarian gangs in Iraq. Reports Monday showed that much of the violence targeted police officials.

Ongoing Wave Of Violence In Iraq Kills 39 (AP-Y2)

By Steven R. Hurst

At least 39 people were killed by insurgents and shadowy sectarian gangs, police reported Monday — continuing the wave of violence that has left nearly 1,000 Iraqis dead since the bombing last month of a Shiite Muslim shrine.

As the Iraq war entered its fourth year, police found the bodies of at least 15 more people — including that of a 13-year-old girl — dumped in and near Baghdad. The discoveries marked the latest in a string of execution-style killings that have become an almost daily event as Sunni and Shiite extremists settle scores.

Sectarian killings have swept across Iraq since the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite Muslim shrine in Samarra. An Associated Press tally, including the deaths reported Monday, put the toll at 993 since the golden dome atop the Askariya shrine was left in rubble by two bombers, who are believed to remain at large.

Among those killed in scattered violence Monday were 10 policemen, who are prime targets for insurgents, most of them Sunni militants, trying to break the will of the mainly Shiite police force.

As night fell on Monday, a bomb struck a coffee shop in northern Baghdad, killing at least three civilians and injuring 23 others. The bomb was left in a plastic bag inside the shop in a market area of the Azamiyah neighborhood, police Maj. Falah al-Mohammadewi said.

At about the same time, gunmen killed two oil engineers leaving work at the Beiji refinery north of Baghdad. An electrical engineer and technician were gunned down at the nearby power station, Beiji police Lt. Khalaf Ayed Al-Janabi said.

In southeast Baghdad, also toward evening, a roadside bomb blew apart a minibus, killing four pilgrims returning from the holy city of Karbala, where millions of Shiite faithful gathered to mark the 40th and final day of the annual mourning period for Imam Hussein, grandson of the Prophet Muhammad. Five pilgrims on their way to Karbala were wounded in a drive-by shooting earlier in the day, police said.

Otherwise, the commemoration passed largely without incident and absent the violent bomb attacks that have hit pilgrims there over the past two years.

Authorities in Baghdad closed the international airport until Tuesday, citing the need to protect the Karbala commemoration, apparently from any attackers who might try to fly into the country.

And Jordanian authorities closed their border with Iraq until further notice to "prevent those without valid travel documents from entering the country," said Maj. Bashir al-Da'ajah, spokesman of Jordan's Public Security Department. The New York Times reported the border was closed because a large number of Palestinians living in Iraq were trying to cross into Jordan without proper documents.

Much of the violence targeted police officials:

• Roadside bombs — one just a few hundred yards from an Interior Ministry lockup in central Baghdad and one in a farming area near the so-called Triangle of Death south of Baghdad — killed at least seven police officials. A prisoner was also killed in the Interior Ministry bombing.

• In the northern city of Mosul, gunmen killed a policeman and an oil ministry official, police said.

Iraqis Sound Angry On Invasion Anniversary (AP)

By Sinan Salaheddin

AP, March 20, 2006

Some Baghdad residents voiced anger and dismay when asked about their lives as the U.S.-led war in Iraq entered its fourth year Monday, when insurgents and sectarian gangs killed at least 38 more people.

Salah Hashim, a 49-year-old businessman, said he yearned for the return of Saddam Hussein, the country's ousted dictator, given the violence that now envelops the country.

"Despite all he did that was bad, we did not suffer as we are now," Hashim said. "Now we have lost everything, even a sense of living. The Americans promised us, especially (President) George Bush, prosperity. And we thank them all because we got it — but we got a prosperity of car bombs, kidnappings and killings."

At least 992 people have been killed in a surge of sectarian killings since the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite Muslim shrine in Samarra, according to an Associated Press count.

"Now I have to spend time worrying about my safety while walking in the streets," said Hashim. "I have to worry about my children when they leave home for school. Instead of being comfortable and enjoying time with my family, I worry that I can't ensure their good life."

Ahmen Najeeb, a 33-year-old supermarket owner, said he originally "waved his hands" at American forces as they entered the country in March 2003, but that his outlook has since changed.

"Day after day the Americans proved that they are here to steal our oil and protect their homes by keeping the their war against terror in another country," he said.

One English teacher, though, said that Iraqis had tolerated Saddam's tyranny for so long that it was worth fighting through the violence to rebuild the country.

"What we are now living in is not an American failure nor that of the Iraqi government," said Assmaa Ali, 38. "The problem is in the Iraqi people ... we started fighting each other using statements and words. Now we are fighting each other with guns.

Ali said the only ones to blame were the insurgents and sectarian fighters who cause the problems. "They are the main reason behind the loss of life and destruction. We should help both the government and coalition forces in fighting these troublemaker instead of blaming them."

One man who said three of his daughters were killed by a bombing last year sounded despondent.

"I got nothing from this so-called liberation, just this cell phone and my satellite receiver. But I lost my three daughters," said Nawar Maarof, a 34-year-old taxi driver who said he had dreamed of becoming an accountant. "I have a feeling that my destiny is the same. Anyway, we're all dead."

"We deserve all this because we didn't fight the Americans," he said. "We had to know from the start they would not help us and were lying about liberating Iraq."

Freedom, Yes, Iraqis Say, But At Great, Grave Cost (WP)

By John Ward Anderson And Omar Fekeiki

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, March 20 -- By almost any standard, Bashar Muhammed, the owner of a thriving Internet cafe, is a Baghdad success story. Three years after the United States invaded Iraq and overthrew Saddam Hussein, the Internet business here is booming, and Muhammed has what most Iraqis could only dream of under Hussein -- freedom, a cutting-edge job, lots of customers.

But when conversation turns to his life and prospects, he sighs and voices frustration that Americans just don't get it.

"It is true that we got freedom after the war, but uncontrolled freedom -- chaos and violence," he said in a cool, deliberate tone. Five of his relatives have been killed in car bombings and assassinations, Muhammed said, noting that most recently an uncle was killed for being a Sunni Arab.

"The new generation is growing on violence and sectarian ethics, and this will affect Iraq for many years to come," he said. "We are living a more devastating war every day."

As Iraqis on Monday marked the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion, there was a stark difference between their pessimistic outlook and some U.S. officials' upbeat assessment of the situation. With insurgent violence grinding on, essential services sagging below pre-invasion levels and the prospect of civil war looming, many Iraqis question whether Hussein's ouster was worth the cost.

Many thousands of their countrymen have been killed. In December, President Bush estimated the Iraqi toll at 30,000.

Laith Muhammad, 32, a student in Fallujah, 35 miles west of Baghdad, listed the risks Iraqis face these days. "We either die by the Americans, the insurgents in the name of jihad, the security companies, which kill you and leave you laying in the street, the Iraqi police or . . . the death squads," he said. Such squads are widely believed to be operating from within the country's Interior Ministry. Muhammad cited private militias as yet another threat.

"Three years after the American invasion of Iraq, I have only one wish," he said. "I do not want democracy, food, electricity and water. I just do not want to die."

Other Iraqis, however, are less quick to blame the United States.

Sardar Muhsin Maheed, 25, a student at Mosul University, said too many people blamed the occupation for all of Iraq's ills. He traced most problems to Hussein, suggesting that issues such as the poor economy are legacies of the ousted president.

"The U.S. has liberated us from Saddam and his oppression," he said. "We are not ready to form a democratic state, and that is because of the burden left by Saddam's regime."

Another of Hussein's legacies, he said, was sectarian tension in the country. An Iraqi government has been democratically elected, but the politicians and their parties are creating a new Iraq based on religious and ethnic interests.

Luay Mohammed, a 57-year-old Sunni Arab who spent 35 years working for the Education Ministry, said he was forced to retire because the government and the ministry are now run by Shiite Muslims. His son could not get a job "because he is not a Shiite and he did not suffer" under Hussein, Mohammed said, his voice laced with bitterness and sarcasm.

"We've been waiting for years for true democracy to come, a democracy that makes everybody live and work together with respect and love. But here it is: a democracy with maximum chaos," he said. Now, all of his sons have cellular telephones -- not because it is hip or because of a communications boom, but because the security situation demands it. "This is what democracy has brought us."

The U.N. sanctions that had been imposed on Hussein's government have been lifted, and a vibrant free press has emerged. But unemployment is stuck between 27 and 40 percent, while oil production -- which the government counts on to generate 90 percent of its revenue -- remains below prewar levels.

"The toppling of Saddam Hussein's regime was worth everything," said Fakhri Fikry Kareem, owner and publisher of the daily Meda newspaper, one of more than 100 newspapers that have begun publishing in Iraq since Hussein's fall. Despite a rocket attack on his office, a bomb attack on his car and the killing of three of his reporters, Kareem said: "I have never felt as free to speak any day in my life as today. If George Bush did anything good, it was toppling Saddam Hussein."

Kareem, 63, said he opposed the war. While drinking Turkish coffee and fingering a long string of worry beads in his Baghdad living room, he talked of what might have been, suggesting that perhaps the United States could have removed Hussein without starting a broader conflict.

"I am not pessimistic," he said. "But I'm upset, because the war and the occupation, which could have led to a new situation in Iraq, were squandered by the stupid mistakes committed by the American administration and military and the U.S. representatives in Iraq."

Subhi Nadhem Tawfik, a professor at Baghdad University's Center for Strategic Studies, said people no longer believed that helping Iraq was foremost on the U.S. agenda during the invasion. "The U.S. has won a tremendous strategic victory," which has come increasingly at the expense of Iraq, he said.

"With the occupation of Iraq, the strategic significance of all the states in the region was diminished," Tawfik said.

The war and its aftermath have so far cost the United States about $250 billion. Congress allocated $21 billion to repair essential infrastructure and revitalize the economy, and to establish programs for good governance and democratic institutions. As much as $3.5 billion has been diverted to pay for better security, but Iraq remains the largest U.S. government reconstruction effort since the Marshall Plan following World War II.

Meanwhile, many Iraqis -- especially in Baghdad, home to almost a quarter of the population -- said they don't see much evidence of the aid.

"We hear about tens of billions of dollars spent on reconstruction," said Bashar Muhammed, the Internet cafe owner. "The only reconstruction in the country I see now are the cement barriers. There are lots of them."

New Business Blooms In Iraq: Terror Insurance (NYT)

By Robert F. Worth

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Twice in the past year, Muhammad Said has survived assassination attempts that left his car riddled with bullets. He works part time as a bodyguard for his father, a Baghdad city councilman, and helps a friend who has contracts with the American military. Both are very dangerous jobs.

So last month, Mr. Said, a slim, baby-faced 23-year-old, did what a small but growing number of Iraqis are doing: He walked into the offices of the Iraq Insurance Company and bought a terrorism insurance policy. It looked like an ordinary life insurance policy, but with a one-page rider adding coverage for "the following dangers: 1) explosions caused by weapons of war and car bombs; 2) assassinations; 3) terrorist attacks."

It cost him 125,000 dinars, about $90. Mr. Said paid more than most people because of his risky occupation. The payout, if he dies, is five million dinars, around $3,500, or about what an Iraqi policeman earns in a year.

That guarantee appears to be the first off-the-shelf terrorism policy in the world, insurance experts say. In most countries, of course, there is no need for it: death by terrorism is rare enough that it is usually covered by ordinary accident insurance. In Iraq it is not, partly because the state used to compensate the families of war victims directly. So the Iraq Insurance Company began stepping into the gap about a year ago.

"Am I worth only five million dinars?" Mr. Said asked wearily, after signing his policy. "It is not a solution. But Iraqis can be attacked by anyone, just walking on the street: Americans, insurgents, the Iraqi Army." The payout is not a lot of money, even by Iraqi standards. But in a country where terrorism kills hundreds of people a month and no one can rely on the government or employers to provide for their relatives afterward, it seems to be an idea with a future.

The Iraq Insurance Company, a state-owned group, has sold about 200 individual terrorism policies in the last year, and is now negotiating with several government ministries and private companies for group policies that would cover thousands of employees.

The idea of insuring ordinary people in what may be the most violent place on earth came from Abbas Shaheed al-Taiee, an executive at the Iraq Insurance Company.

"It is a kind of gift to the Iraqi people," said Mr. Shaheed, 53, a big, heavyset man with terribly serious eyes and a reputation as a master salesman. "We have expanded the principles of life insurance to cover everything that happens in Iraq."

Amazingly, the company has yet to pay out on a single claim.

"We have sold policies in Dawra, Ramadi, Falluja," Mr. Shaheed said, naming some of the most dangerous places in Iraq. "The contract is a good luck charm."

Mr. Shaheed (whose name means martyr in Arabic) emanates a gravitas that must be an asset in his line of work. He manages a sales staff of about 50 across Iraq, but also sells the policies himself, traveling from one workplace to another, like a kind of bureaucratic Grim Reaper.

He says the terrorism policy makes no distinctions between who fires the shots or detonates the bombs. He would be perfectly willing to insure an insurgent, though he has not done so to his knowledge, he said.

"It is a market here; there are no differences," he said, in his grim baritone. "We evaluate people's pockets."

In the United States and Europe, insurance companies offer customized policies to organizations sending employees to dangerous places, including Iraq (some news organizations, for example, insure their reporters this way). But those policies are highly tailored to each company's activities and risks, and they are generally expensive.

The idea of a standardized, terrorism life insurance policy appears to be unprecedented, said Robert Hartwig, the chief economist of the Insurance Information Institute in New York.

Some other insurance experts agreed that the policy was a novel one, but said they would hardly call it a good deal. "In an American context, it's very overpriced," said Robert Hunter, the director of insurance for the Consumer Federation of America, an association of consumer rights groups. "In America, you could probably get $100,000 worth of life insurance coverage for maybe $125 to $150," especially a healthy 23-year-old, he said. "And that would cover you no matter how you died."

Selling insurance in Iraq has never been easy. The first insurance companies here were established in the 1950's, when they competed with Western companies. But the idea never gained wide acceptance, in part because some Islamic authorities disapprove of insurance, considering it akin to gambling.

Also, many Iraqis preferred to rely on their tribes or families in case of accidents or deaths. The state also played a powerful paternal role: during the Iran-Iraq war, for instance, the government generously compensated the families of soldiers who died, sometimes with a car or property as well as money.

After the Persian Gulf war in 1991 the market shrank further, because foreign reinsurance companies pulled out, forcing Iraqi companies to depend only on their own assets, said Aziz Hassan, a former deputy finance minister.

Strangely, Iraqi insurance companies have done relatively well since the fall of Saddam Hussein, despite a stagnant economy and the uncertainty over Iraq's future. Six private insurance companies were founded in 2004, and now compete with the two state-owned companies.

The Iraq Insurance Company has renovated its offices — they were looted and burned after the fall of Baghdad in April 2003 — and the company now employs between 250 and 300 people. They have sold at least 2,700 life insurance policies since the fall of the Hussein government.

In 2005, the company's net income was about $2.5 million at current exchange rates. "We broke records," said Bassim Mahdi Saleh al-Sheikhli, the company's managing director. "Business has never before been so good."

The company attributes much of its success to salesmen like Mr. Shaheed, who now operate more freely — albeit more dangerously — than they did in the past.

"From my point of view, sales is an art," said Mr. Shaheed, who has worked at the Iraq Insurance Company for 18 years. "For instance, talking to a father with children is different from talking to a man still single. You have to bring out his passion to protect his family."

Because the salesmen carry money and travel, their own jobs are unusually dangerous. They do not carry guns. Many have bought terrorism insurance themselves, including Mr. Shaheed.

One rule applies to all prospective clients. "When we talk about death and risks, we refer to ourselves: 'I might die tomorrow,' " Mr. Shaheed said. "When we talk about the payment, we say, 'The company pays you.' "

Once a client has agreed to buy a policy, a price is negotiated. It ranges from 60,000 dinars for the safer professions — teachers, businessmen and the like — to 125,000 for policemen and translators for Western companies. The payout is the same regardless.

On a recent afternoon, Mr. Shaheed sat at a desk in his second-floor office, chatting quietly with a potential client. Nearby on the couch sat Basmel Nafaa, a 48-year-old businessman with a bald head and an impish grin. Mr. Nafaa had already bought an ordinary life insurance policy, and was considering buying terrorism coverage too.

"He's the best we have here in Iraq," Mr. Nafaa said of Mr. Shaheed. "He's a good hunter."

Mr. Nafaa recounted how Mr. Shaheed had approached him at the wholesale market where he often works, as if by chance. The salesman chatted amiably about mutual friends, and then began telling a story about a man who had died without leaving anything for his wife and children. Before long, Mr. Nafaa was sold.

"He hardly even needs to remind you of the dangers you face," Mr. Nafaa said. "We see it everywhere."

Mr. Nafaa began offering examples. A few months earlier, his 12-year-old son Joseph was standing outside the family home waiting for a school bus that never came. The boy persuaded his mother to give him money for a taxi. Minutes later, he said, a suicide bomber in a car exploded right next to the bus stop, which is across from the home of a high-level government official. Six people were killed.

Mr. Nafaa showed photographs of his house, which was badly damaged. "I had no insurance at that time," he said.

Then Mr. Nafaa gestured across the room at his cousin, Baseem Makadsi — the other prospective client — who still has a crease on the back of his skull from where a bullet crashed through the window of his car and grazed him while he was driving to the market with his son.

"If he had not leaned over to speak to his son, he would be dead," Mr. Nafaa said. "He lost a lot of blood."

Mr. Makadsi was not yet sold on terrorism insurance. He was thinking of taking his family out of Iraq.

But Mr. Nafaa persuaded himself. "I will buy it," he said. "There is a big probability to be killed by insurgents here. Higher than anywhere else in the world."

Congress Eyes Own Window On Iraq War (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

WASHINGTON - Marking the third anniversary of the Iraq war, President Bush said US strategy will "lead to victory."

Before recessing last week, the House easily approved $67.6 billion for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan - exactly the amount the White House had requested - and the Senate punted on a bid to censure Mr. Bush on his conduct of the war on terror.

But behind the headlines, Capitol Hill lawmakers are signaling that 2006 must be a decisive year in the Iraq war - and many of the war's vigorous defenders are looking for guidance outside the Bush administration on how to move ahead.

Exhibit A is the quiet launch of an independent, bipartisan panel to bring "fresh eyes" to the Iraq conflict. Last week, the House included $1.3 million in a defense funding bill for the panel, which will work out of the congressionally chartered US Institute for Peace here.

"The purpose of the [Iraq] study group is to come up with a compromise between an administration policy that no one believes in and just walking away," says Edward Luttwak, a senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, 1 of 4 think tanks supporting the effort. "The study-group process will be mysterious, but the outcome is predictable: They're going to come to the conclusion that the US should disengage, but not abandon Iraq."

The move to develop alternatives to Bush administrative briefings signals a growing distrust on Capitol Hill for the "closed circuit between people sitting inside the Green Zone and the 'good news' being sent back to Washington," says Mr. Luttwak. "Congress is discovering that the Bush administration is repeating its own propaganda - and believes what they are saying."

Last week, lawmakers on both sides of the aisle grilled Pentagon officials on whether Iraq is slipping into civil war - and what role remains for US troops if it does. The House passed by voice vote a Democratic amendment to block funding for a permanent US base in Iraq.

"Despite three years of the best efforts and heroic sacrifices by our military personnel, Iraq is teetering on the edge of the abyss," said Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, ranking Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee. Bush sent Iraqi leaders "the wrong message" last week when he said the process "will require patience by America," the senator said.

Like the 9/11 commission before it, the new Iraq Study Group is being asked to face forward. "We will not be visiting past debates about Iraq. We will leave that to the historians," said cochair and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, who also cochaired the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States.

"We know that the country needs help now in working through this, and we will add whatever we can by way of a constructive contribution," Mr. Hamilton said Wednesday at the launch of the Iraq Study Group in the Senate Armed Services Committee hearing room.

Other members are cochair James Baker III, former secretary of Treasury and State; former CIA director Robert Gates; former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani; and former Sen. Alan Simpson (R) of Wyoming. Democrats on the panel are Leon Panetta, former chief of staff to President Clinton; Clinton adviser Vernon Jordan; former Defense Secretary William Perry; and former Sen. Charles Robb of Virginia. One more Republican will be named to the 10-member panel.

"One of the first things we are going to have to do - and will do - is satisfy ourselves with respect to exactly what are the facts and circumstances with respect to Iraq today," said Mr. Baker, who says the administration will cooperate as panelists travel to Iraq and seek access to people and documents.

Republicans began lobbying the White House for an independent assessment of the war months ago. In September, Rep. Frank Wolf (R) of Virginia wrote in an op-ed that the American public, to stay the course, must "be able to trust that those directing the war have made an honest assessment of what has gone right and what has gone wrong."

One reason Congress is turning to an outside group is that, unlike in previous wars, public opinion on the Iraq war is polarized along party lines. While 77 percent of Republicans say the US is making progress toward establishing a democracy in Iraq, only 34 percent of Democrats are as optimistic, according to a poll last week by the Pew Research Center.

While Democrats did not rally to a motion by Sen. Russell Feingold (D) of Wisconsin to censure the president over domestic surveillance without a warrant, some senators in both parties still question the policy - and the precedent it sets for separation of powers.

"Too often, Democrats cower in the face of illegality," says Senator Feingold. "As soon as the administration raises the specter of being soft on terrorism, Democrats just hide."

"It's a political stunt that's getting in the way of a good, honest debate on checks and balances in a time of war," Sen. Lindsey Graham (R) of South Carolina said last week of the Feingold resolution.

But he adds: "It's an area where the law is very unsettled. I hope we'll vote on it."

Father No Longer Out For Revenge In Iraq (AP-Y2)

By Charles J. Hanley

In the desert chill, on the lonely nighttime roads of Iraq, Joe Johnson looks out over his machine gun and thinks of Justin. It was on Easter morning 2004 that a chaplain and a colonel appeared on Joe and Jan Johnson's Georgia doorstep with the news. Justin, the boy Joe had fished and hunted with, the soldier son who'd gone off to Iraq a month earlier, was suddenly dead at 22, killed by a roadside bomb planted in a Baghdad slum.

Today it's Joe who mans the M-240 atop a Humvee, warily watching the sides of the road, an unlikely Army corporal at 48, a father who came here for revenge, a Christian missionary on a crusade against Islam, and a man who, after six months at war, is ready to go home.

"I shouldn't even have come," he now says. And if he leaves bloody Iraq with no blood on his hands, he says, that's fine, too.

The Johnson family story is unique, even strange. But in a war where soldiers have heard an ever-changing medley of reasons for fighting, Joe Johnson's may be as simple and direct as any — and to many, as troubling.

He wasn't there that day the tragic news arrived in Rome, Ga. Instead, the self-employed house-builder was in Fort Lewis, Wash., trying to qualify for a place in a Washington National Guard unit ticketed for Iraq.

With six years of long-ago Army and Navy service, Johnson had joined the National Guard in 2003, wanting to serve his country again, this time in combat, and to go to Iraq while his son was there. A year with both husband and son at war would be easier on Jan than two years separately, he reasoned.

The death of Justin, a 1st Cavalry Division machine gunner, stunned his parents with a shock that lingers still.

"What were the odds, of thousands of people here, that somebody in my family would get killed?" the grieving father asked.

At that point, Johnson said, "I decided it was too soon to leave home." Jan was too distraught.

But last April 11, a year and a day after his son was killed, Johnson told his Iraq-bound Georgia National Guard unit, the 48th Infantry Brigade, he was ready to join them. They ended up at this dustblown base in Iraq's far west, pulling escort duty for fuel convoys on the bomb-pocked desert highways from Jordan.

Why did he do it? The wiry lean Georgian, an easy-talking man with a boyish, sunburned face, tried to answer the question that won't go away.

"It's a lot of things combined," he said. "One, a sense of duty. I was pissed off at the terrorists for 9/11 and other atrocities. Second, I'd only trained. I wanted combat." And then, he said, "there's some revenge involved. I'd be lying if I said there wasn't."

But there was more on the mind of this man who has done Church of God missionary work as far afield as Peru and the Arctic.

"I don't really have love for Muslim people," Johnson said. "I'm sure there are good Muslims. I try not to be racist." Although he hasn't read the Quran, or spoken with Muslims, he has "heard" the Islamic holy book "teaches to kill Jews and infidels. And it's hard to love people who hate you."

He could love Iraqi children, though, and said he'd hoped "to see them grow up to know right and wrong."

Somewhere along the way, however, the righteous passion cooled, as the over-aged corporal, like tens of thousands of other American soldiers here, faced the reality of Iraq.

Was it last Christmas morning, when roadside bombs rocked his convoy one after another, and Johnson thought he was next? Or was it when speeding civilian cars passed the Americans' Humvees and Johnson failed to level his gun and open fire, which "I think anyone else," fearing car bombs, "would have done."

"I really don't want to kill innocent people," he now says. "I don't want to live with that the rest of my life."

Most of all, it might have been the telephone calls home to Jan, who was dealing not only with depression and other health problems, but also with the prospect that their elder soldier son, Josh, 26, might be sent to Iraq or Afghanistan.

"I don't like that Joe's there," Jan Johnson said when called by satellite telephone from al-Asad. "But it's something he felt he had to do. People heal in different ways. This is how he heals after Justin's death."

He will. His battalion exits Iraq in early May, when Johnson's own enlistment term, coincidentally, expires. "That's it," he said, no re-enlistment for him.

But what about revenge?

"If I go home and didn't kill a terrorist, it's not going to ruin my life," he said. "Maybe I'd just as soon not. I don't know what it would do to my head."

Once back home among the northwest Georgia pines, he has one last ceremonial act in mind, removing the silver-toned bracelet he's worn on his right wrist throughout his deployment, bearing Justin's name and date of death. Joe Johnson's mission will have been accomplished.

Whatever it was, he said, "I got it out of my system."

AFP, March 20, 2006

The United States said it was watching closely the trial of an Afghan man who could face death for converting to Christianity in a test of religious freedom for the key US ally.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack urged the Afghan authorities to deal with the proceedings against Abdul Rahman transparently and according to the rule of law.

"It's a case that we're following very closely," McCormack said of Rahman's week-old trial on charges of violating Islamic Sharia law.

"Our view certainly ... is that tolerance, freedom of worship, is an important element of any democracy," he said. "These are issues, as Afghan democracy matures, that they are going to have to deal with increasingly."

Rahman was detained two weeks ago after his relatives reported his conversion to Christianity to the police. A Supreme Court judge said he could be executed if he refused to return to Islam.

If sentenced, the defendant will be the first Afghan punished for conversion since US-backed forces ousted the hardline Taliban regime at the end of 2001 in reprisal for the September 11 terror attacks on the United States.

McCormack said Afghanistan, which has become a major ally in Washington's war on the Al-Qaeda terrorist network, was debating varying constitutional interpretations of religious freedom.

"These issues rightfully should get resolved through the court system," he said. "But they need to be resolved in a transparent (manner) and according to the rule of law."

Off Course In Afghanistan (WP)

By Chris Van Hollen

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

When President Bush touched down briefly in Afghanistan on his way to India, he was probably the closest he will ever get to the man who masterminded the Sept. 11 attacks on the United States: Osama bin Laden, who is believed to be hiding in Pakistan along the rugged Afghan-Pakistani border. It was a stark reminder that we have not accomplished our mission of destroying bin Laden and al-Qaeda. Fulfilling that mission and preventing a resurgence of the Taliban will depend on the actions we take in Afghanistan. This is no time to reduce our commitment there.

While the president was in Afghanistan, the director of the U.S. Defense Intelligence Agency, Gen. Michael Maples, was testifying before Congress that the Taliban insurgency is growing and will increase this spring, presenting a greater threat to the Afghan central government's expansion of authority than at any point since late 2001. Under these circumstances, the current plan to replace the 2,500 U.S. troops in southern Afghanistan this spring with contingents of Canadian, Dutch, British, Romanian and Australian troops is a mistake. Given the intensifying Taliban insurgency, these allied forces should augment, not displace, U.S. forces. We should also reassess the administration's proposal to turn over the command of most U.S. troops in Afghanistan to NATO by early next year.

While Gen. James Jones, NATO's supreme allied commander, has tried to play down Maples's grim assessment, it is hard to ignore the fact that the Taliban has stepped up its operations. Last year, attacks by the Taliban and other anti-government groups jumped by 20 percent. Suicide bombings increased almost fourfold, and strikes with improvised explosive devices, a tactic imported from Iraq, doubled. The main battlegrounds in this insurgency are the provinces of Kandahar, Uruzgan, Helmand and Zabul, the Pashtun areas that formed the Taliban stronghold.

As recently as Jan. 10, Mullah Mohammad Omar, the Taliban leader who was born in southern Afghanistan and forged a close bond with bin Laden -- rejected a call to reconcile with the government of President Hamid Karzai and publicly exhorted his followers to fight on. It appears that his followers are listening. James Kunder, assistant administrator of the U.S. Agency for International Development, told Congress that in January: a school headmaster was shot in Helmand; 200 schools in Kandahar and 165 schools in Helmand closed for security reasons; and in Zabul, where a campaign of intimidation had already closed all but five of 170 schools, a high school teacher was beheaded. February was also deadly: In a 14-day period, 24 violent incidents and 37 deaths were reported in the media.

Stopping this violence requires forceful action. Until now, NATO forces have been stationed in relatively quiet areas and their role has been limited primarily to peacekeeping, rather than combat, operations. There are real questions about whether NATO will be able to engage the Taliban as aggressively as U.S. forces.

The withdrawal of U.S. forces from southern Afghanistan will also weaken our ability to demand that Pakistan move more forcefully to prevent the Taliban from using Pakistan as a base of operations. Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence Agency has had a cozy relationship with the Taliban, and many in the Afghan government doubt Pakistan's commitment to denying sanctuary to Taliban fighters. If U.S. troops won't pursue them, why should Pakistan's?

Afghanistan's stability depends on strengthening the central government, developing the economy and limiting the booming opium trade. Progress on these fronts requires that the Taliban be neutralized and that security be improved. The anticipated withdrawal of U.S. forces has reportedly already caused some local leaders to hedge their bets with respect to the Taliban. Economic development has been slowed because, as Kunder testified, "our contractors are being targeted, and a number of them have been killed, making it more difficult for USAID to recruit appropriately qualified staff." And the lack of security in southern Afghanistan makes it more difficult to eradicate the drug trade in places such as Helmand, which produced more opium last year than any other province, representing about 20 percent of the world's supply of heroin.

We should never forget that the Taliban came to power in the chaos that followed the Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan and the subsequent U.S. disengagement from the region. With the Bush administration and political Washington focused on Iraq, many Afghan leaders worry that the reduction of U.S. forces is a sign that we will again lose sight of Afghanistan. We do so at our peril. Let us not forget that the Sept. 11 plot was launched from Afghanistan, and not from Iraq.

2 Years After Soldier's Death, Family's Battle Is With Army (NYT)

By Monica Davey And Eric Schmitt

DOJ_NMG_0019682

SAN JOSE, Calif. — Patrick K. Tillman stood outside his law office here, staring intently at a yellow house across the street, just over 70 yards away. That, he recalled, is how far away his eldest son, Pat, who gave up a successful N.F.L. career to become an Army Ranger, was standing from his fellow Rangers when they shot him dead in Afghanistan almost two years ago.

"I could hit that house with a rock," Mr. Tillman said. "You can see every last detail on that place, everything, and you're telling me they couldn't see Pat?"

Mr. Tillman, 51, is a grieving father who has refused to give up on his son. While fiercely shunning the public spotlight that has followed Cpl. Pat Tillman's death, Mr. Tillman has spent untold hours considering the Army's measurements, like the 70 yards.

He has drafted long, sometimes raw, letters to military leaders, demanding answers about the shooting. And he has studied — and challenged — Army PowerPoint presentations meant to explain how his son, who had called out his own name and waved his arms, wound up dead anyway, shot three times in the head by his own unit, which said it had mistaken him for the enemy.

"All I asked for is what happened to my son, and it has been lie after lie after lie," said Mr. Tillman, explaining that he believed the matter should remain "between me and the military" but that he had grown too troubled to keep silent.

As the second anniversary of the death of Corporal Tillman, once a popular safety for the Arizona Cardinals, approaches, Mr. Tillman, his former wife, Mary, and other family members remain frustrated by the Army's handling of the killing but for the first time may be close to getting some of the answers they so desperately seek.

After repeated complaints from the Tillmans and members of Congress contacted by them, the Army is immersed in a highly unusual criminal investigation of the killing, and the Defense Department's inspector general, which called for the criminal investigation this month, is looking separately into the Army's conduct in its aftermath.

Senior military officials said Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld had expressed outrage to top aides that the Army was having to conduct yet another inquiry into the shooting, prolonging the family's anguish and underscoring the failure of the Army's investigative processes to bring resolution.

Gary Comerford, a spokesman for the inspector general, said the Army Criminal Investigation Command was "dealing with events leading up to the death, and we're looking at anything after that." Though Mr. Comerford did not say so, that could include the possibility of a cover-up, the Tillmans said they had been told by the inspector general's office.

No one wants answers more than the Tillmans. But by now, they said, they have lost patience and faith that any Army entity, even the Criminal Investigation Command, can be trusted to find the truth.

"I am sitting here on my own, going over and over and over this for two years," Ms. Tillman, 50, said in a telephone interview. "The whole thing is such a debacle. I am beyond tears. It's killing me."

Like her former husband, she has spent days reading the files, researching the episode, calling members of Congress, even trying to contact some of the soldiers involved. She criticized the military, as well as the news media, for failing to get to the bottom of what occurred, leaving her family, in essence, to figure it out themselves.

All of it, her former husband said, has even left him suspicious of the military's central finding in their son's case so far: that the killing was a terrible but unintentional accident.

"There is so much nonstandard conduct, both before and after Pat was killed, that you have to start to wonder," Mr. Tillman said. "How much effort would you put into hiding an accident? Why do you need to hide an accident?"

An examination by The New York Times of more than 2,000 pages of documents from three previous Army administrative reviews reveals shifting testimony, the destruction of obvious evidence in the case and a series of contradictions about the distances, the lighting conditions and other details surrounding the shooting.

Seven Rangers have received administrative disciplines — a pay cut, a loss of rank or a return to the rank-and-file Army — but the criminal inquiry is for the first time examining whether the soldiers broke military law when they failed to identify their targets before firing on Corporal Tillman's position. The earlier reviews found that a chain of circumstances and errors had led to the deaths of Corporal Tillman and an Afghan soldier fighting alongside the Americans.

A senior Pentagon official briefed on the criminal investigation, who was granted anonymity because he was not permitted to speak publicly while the new investigation was under way, said it would delve into highly sensitive areas.

"The balance that investigators now have to wrestle with is how much of a crime-scene approach they can take — nearly two years after the fact — into the fog of war, where soldiers were making decisions in milliseconds," the Pentagon official said.

Mr. Tillman spoke bluntly and angrily one afternoon here as he waded once more through the Army reports, the charts, even the details in his son's autopsy. He knows the smallest of details by heart — where his son was supposed to be standing, which way the sun was setting, what the Ranger ducking beside his son heard him call out last — and ticked them off unemotionally as he flipped through the worn reports.

Mr. Tillman's small office, though, belies his hardened shell. His trash can, pasted with orange and green paper, was a grade school project of Pat Tillman. So was the wooden pencil holder nearby, shakily carved with the letters N.F.L. A blurry photograph in a frame showed Pat Tillman at age 2, marching off toward a lake with his signature confident stride.

"At this point I don't believe that the facts of this case are going to come out without the serious threat of jail time hanging over some folks," Mr. Tillman said.

The Tillman family's first glimmers of distrust began in the month after Corporal Tillman was killed, at the age of 27, on April 22, 2004.

Within hours, military officers came to the family home here, the same house where Corporal Tillman had grown up. No one mentioned, though, that the shooting had been at the hands of his colleagues. Even Corporal Tillman's younger brother Kevin, who served in the same Ranger unit and was in a vehicle far behind the shooting and did not see what had happened, did not learn the truth for more than a month.

Instead, eight days after Corporal Tillman's death, Army officials awarded a Silver Star and issued a news release that seemed to suggest that he had been killed by enemy fire during an ambush.

At the end of May, as the rest of Corporal Tillman's unit was returning to the United States, the Army notified the family of what it believed really happened. In the months that followed, in private briefings for the family, the Army assured the Tillmans that a thorough investigation would be made and that those responsible would be disciplined.

"They said they'd take care of it, and I believed them," Mr. Tillman said.

Corporal Tillman's platoon of the Second Battalion, 75th Ranger Regiment, began the day that he died dealing with a minor annoyance in the southeastern part of Afghanistan where the soldiers were conducting sweeps, the Army records show: one vehicle would not start.

The platoon split into two parts so that half the team, including Corporal Tillman, could go on to the next town for sweeps while the second half could tow the disabled vehicle to a drop-off spot.

But both groups ended up in the same twisting canyon, along the same road, without radio communication. And after the sounds of an enemy ambush, three Rangers in the second group wound up firing at members of the first group — at an Afghan soldier who was fighting alongside Corporal Tillman, and then at Corporal Tillman.

The Army's administrative reviews that followed, parts of which have been described previously in other newspapers, including The Washington Post and The San Francisco Chronicle, have left the Tillman family with more questions than answers, they say. Some of those involved in the shooting have provided shifting accounts of what happened, the records show.

The decision to split the unit into two convoys, for example, was a crucial, and perhaps fatal, one. Brig. Gen. Gary M. Jones, who led the most recent of the three Army reviews, concluded that the decision was a result of "miscommunication" among several officers.

But at least one Army officer, the records show, changed his sworn statements about which supervisor had actually ordered the split and what conversations had occurred before the order was given.

Even the soldier who conducted the military's first review of Corporal Tillman's death — in the hours and days immediately afterward — expressed concern about the changes in the accounts.

That soldier, whose name, like many others, was redacted from the Army files provided to The Times by Mr. Tillman, said he believed Rangers had changed their versions of what happened and were not receiving the "due just punishment" for what he concluded was "gross negligence."

The stories, he said in a sworn statement as part of General Jones's subsequent review, "have changed to, I think, help some individuals."

"The other difficult thing, though, was watching some of these guys getting off with what I thought was a lesser of a punishment than what they should've received," the soldier who conducted the first inquiry said.

Among a number of conflicts in the descriptions of what happened, some Rangers said that in the dusk they could see nothing more than "shapes" and "muzzle flashes" even as Corporal Tillman tried to tell his colleagues who he was, waving his arms, setting off a smoke grenade signal and calling out. Others said they had seen and aimed for the Afghan fighter, his "dark face" and his AK-47.

After the shooting, the Rangers destroyed evidence that would be considered critical in any criminal case, the records show. They burned Corporal Tillman's uniform and his body armor.

Months later, the Rangers involved said they did not intend to destroy evidence. "It was a hygiene issue," one soldier wrote. "They were starting to stink."

Another soldier involved offered a slightly different take, saying "the uniform and equipment had blood on them and it would stir emotion" that needed to be suppressed until the Rangers finished their work overseas.

"How could they do that?" Mr. Tillman said. "That makes no sense."

The family still wants to know, he said, what became of Corporal Tillman's diary. It was never returned to the family, he said.

Ms. Tillman said her family could not rest until they knew what really happened. All of it, Ms. Tillman said, has left her wondering what other families who have lost service members in Iraq and Afghanistan may really know about the circumstances. In addition to Corporal Tillman, at least 16 service members have died in Afghanistan and Iraq as a result of shootings or bombings by fellow Americans, and none of the deaths, so far, have led to criminal convictions.

"This is how they treat a family of a high-profile individual," she said. "How are they treating others?"

Col. Joseph Curtin, an Army spokesman, said the Tillmans deserved answers.

"We deeply regret their loss," Colonel Curtin said, "and will continue to answer their questions in a truthful and forthright manner."

Lucky Strikes Again!

Every time Selwa "Lucky " Roosevelt chairs a huge benefit, she swears she's never doing it again. The Reagan White House protocol chief said the Folger's 60th-anniversary party in 1992 was her last. Then there was the party 10 years ago welcoming Placido Domingo to Washington. Then the Domingo Millennium in 2000. CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Conviction Of Ex-Star Banker Tossed Out (WP)

By Brooke A. Masters

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

NEW YORK, March 20 -- A federal appeals court tossed out the obstruction-of-justice conviction of once high-flying investment banker Frank P. Quattrone, in a blow to the government's effort to prosecute and deter white-collar crime.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 2nd Circuit held unanimously that the trial judge's instructions to the jury included such a "glaring deficiency" that Quattrone did not get a fair trial on charges that he encouraged subordinates to destroy documents sought by a federal grand jury.

The court also took the unusual step of reassigning the case to a new trial judge, writing that "certain comments" made by U.S. District Judge Richard Owen "could be viewed as rising beyond mere impatience and annoyance."

"It's the first time in this case that justice has been done," said Quattrone's trial attorney, John W. Keker. "I'm just glad that Judge Owen didn't win."

But the decision was not a total vindication for Quattrone. The 61-page opinion by Judge Richard C. Wesley dwelt at length on the strength of the evidence against the former Credit Suisse First Boston LLC banker and held that it was more than sufficient for conviction on charges of obstruction and attempted witness-tampering.

The ruling raises the possibility that Quattrone, still the best-known investment banker in Silicon Valley, will face a third trial more than five years after he first sent an e-mail encouraging hundreds of CSFB subordinates to "clean up those files." His first trial ended in a hung jury, and his 2004 conviction has now been overturned.

The reversal in the Quattrone case comes as the overall record for the Justice Department's attack on high-profile, white-collar crime is mixed. The Supreme Court overturned the obstruction verdict against accounting firm Arthur Andersen LLP, and HealthSouth Corp. founder Richard M. Scrushy was acquitted. The 2nd Circuit upheld domestic entrepreneur Martha Stewart's conviction and is still considering former WorldCom chief executive Bernard J. Ebbers's appeal of his conviction and 25-year-sentence. Former Enron Corp. leaders Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling are on trial in Houston

"It's really too bad. Even if the prosecution wins the next go-around, people are going to think, all I need is a good lawyer, and I'll have a good shot at not going to jail," University of Texas law professor Henry T. C. Hu said of the Quattrone reversal. "This kind of thing will undermine the deterrence idea of white-collar crime prosecution."

Once famous for helping bring hundreds of technology firms public during the dot-com boom, Quattrone, 50, had faced an 18-month prison sentence but remained free pending his appeal. "For over three years during this difficult ordeal, I have held my head high, knowing I was innocent and never intended to obstruct justice," he said in a statement that also thanked his supporters and legal team.

The Quattrone case marks the second time in less than a year that a major white-collar obstruction case has been overturned based on faulty jury instructions. Last May, the Supreme Court tossed out the guilty verdict against Arthur Andersen, holding that the jury should have been required to find that Andersen acted with criminal intent.

The Quattrone decision was based on a separate but somewhat similar problem. The three-judge panel found that Owen botched jury instructions on the need to find a "nexus" between Quattrone's "clean up" e-mail and a grand jury probe into the way CSFB doled out shares in hot new stocks, known as initial public offerings.

The appeals court found that Owen's instructions improperly failed to make clear that the jury needed to find that Quattrone knew that grand jury and Securities and Exchange Commission subpoenas specifically called for the documents that would be destroyed.

New York University law professor Jennifer Arlen said the Quattrone and Andersen decisions make clear that "obstruction may not be such an easy way to establish criminality . . . given that businesses often destroy documents all the time for many reasons."

The government may think twice about retrying Quattrone again, some outside lawyers said. While Quattrone, who made $120 million in his most profitable year at CSFB, still has ample resources to fight back, the two government lawyers who handled the case have left for private practice.

"A lot of resources were wasted because of a legal mistake," said Samuel Buell, who was the lead prosecutor in the Andersen cases and now teaches law in Texas. "At some point, do you just cut your losses?" The Justice Department declined to retry Andersen in part because the once-mighty accounting firm had all but disappeared by the time of the Supreme Court decision.

Quattrone's appeal attorney, Mark F. Pomerantz, predicted that his client would fare much better in a third round. "Having a different judge and a different jury and trying this case in a different climate will really give this trial a different character," he said.

A spokeswoman for U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said, "We are reviewing the opinion and considering our options."

Appeals Court Overturns Conviction Of Ex-Banking Star (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

A federals appeals court in New York this afternoon overturned the conviction of Frank P. Quattrone, the former star banker who had been found guilty of obstruction of justice, and granted him a new trial.

The ruling, a rare reversal of a jury verdict, is a big defeat for the government, which had sought to portray Mr. Quattrone as a symbol of Wall Street's excesses and the dot-com bust.

Mr. Quattrone, who led the initial public offerings of companies like Amazon.com and Cisco Systems as a banker at Credit Suisse First Boston in the 1990's, had been convicted of obstruction of justice as a result of endorsing a colleague's e-mail message in December 2000 that urged his staff to "clean up those files." At the time, the government was investigating whether the bank was soliciting kickbacks from preferred investors for hot initial public offerings, but it never led to any criminal charges.

Mr. Quattrone, 50, had faced 18 months in prison, though he has remained free pending the outcome of the appeal.

The reversal by a three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit comes almost a year after the Supreme Court also struck down the conviction of Arthur Anderson, the accounting firm involved in the Enron scandal that had also been found of guilty of obstruction of justice.

The appeals panel found that the judge in the case, Richard Owen, a Nixon appointee known for being pro-prosecution, gave erroneous jury instructions on what was required for the jury to find Mr. Quattrone guilty. The panel also said that "in the interest of justice," the case should be reassigned to another judge on the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York.

The prosecutors in the case, Steven R. Peiken and David Anders — both of whom have since left the United States attorney's office for private practice — were also singled out by the appellate panel for unfairly trying to prejudice the jury during their questioning of Mr. Quattrone.

Still, the appeals court found that there was sufficient evidence to retry Mr. Quattrone. And despite finding that Judge Owen had given flawed jury instructions, the panel said it agreed with many of his rulings, including his decision to restrict the introduction of mountains of evidence that defense lawyers contended would have led to a not guilty verdict.

Legal experts said the ruling was not about sending a message to lower courts about how to try future cases, but about the specific failure of the judge in this case to provide the necessary instructions for the jury to have found that Mr. Quattrone intended to obstruct justice.

"In a prosecution in which, by all accounts, the alleged criminal act occurred in a matter of seconds, this was always a case almost entirely about intent — did Quattrone try to destroy documents that he knew the government had already subpoenaed?" said Robert A. Mintz, a former prosecutor and now a partner at McCarter & English. "What this ruling really means is that the jury instructions never asked the right question. By failing to put a finer point on the issue of intent, the facts that could have formed the basis for a conviction were never determined by the jury."

It remained unclear late this afternoon whether the government would pursue a third trial against Mr. Quattrone. He has already been tried twice; his first trial ended in a mistrial after a jury deadlock. The case has long been viewed by the legal community as perhaps the government's weakest white-collar case in the raft of corporate criminal cases that were brought in 2002 and 2003 against people like Bernard Ebbers of WorldCom and Martha Stewart, both of whom were found guilty.

In writing for the court, Judge Richard C. Wesley said Judge Owen's instructions to jurors were wrong because jurors were not required to determine that Mr. Quattrone knew the documents he was asking associates to destroy were the same ones being sought by investigators.

Establishing liability is not sufficient to convict defendants of obstructing of justice or tampering charges, legal experts say. Juries must determine that defendants had intended to change the course of an investigation or legal proceeding to find them guilty of those crimes.

"It's very clear for a retrial," said Jonathan Halpern, a former federal prosecutor who is now a litigation partner at Winston & Strawn in New York. "The Second Circuit said it would be sufficient to show that the defendant knew his conduct was likely to affect the proceedings."

Court Decides For Quattrone, Reversing Verdict (WSJ)

By Randall Smith

DOJ_NMG_0019688

A federal appeals court reversed the May 2004 criminal obstruction-of-justice conviction of former star investment banker Frank Quattrone, citing faulty jury instructions and other errors by the trial judge.

The decision returns the case to federal prosecutors who must now decide whether to try the banker a third time. The first attempt ended in a hung jury in October 2003. (Court's decision1 and Highlights2)

While prosecutors issued a short statement saying only "we are reviewing the opinion and considering our options," the Quattrone defense team hailed the ruling as "a significant victory."

Mr. Quattrone himself said in a statement, "For over three years during this difficult ordeal, I have held my head high knowing I was innocent and never intended to obstruct justice."

The appeals court also ordered the case reassigned to another judge, saying some antidefense comments by Judge Richard Owen "could be viewed as rising beyond mere impatience or annoyance."

Mr. Quattrone, 50 years old, was convicted of two counts of obstruction and one count of witness tampering based on his forwarding of an email in December 2000 urging employees to "clean up" their files just after being told about an investigation of allocations of initial public offerings at his firm.

Despite only circumstantial evidence of Mr. Quattrone's intent, James Comey, then the U.S. attorney in Manhattan, said in April 2003 that the charges were needed to send a message against any interference with government subpoenas.

The decision was the latest to come in the wake of a tough regulatory environment that prevailed after the stock-market bubble burst in 2001 and 2002. Last May, an obstruction verdict against former accounting giant Arthur Andersen LLP was voided by the Supreme Court. And two weeks ago Wall Street executive Ken Langone defeated regulatory charges that his firm improperly collected oversize commissions in return for hot initial-public-stock offerings.

"This could be further evidence of a pendulum swing," said Timothy J. Coleman, a white-collar defense attorney at Dewey Ballantine LLP who worked in the Manhattan federal prosecutors' office until 2003 but wasn't involved in the case. The intensity of "the public outcry about corruption on Wall Street" has abated, he said.

At the peak of the stock-market bubble Mr. Quattrone was one of the most powerful bankers on Wall Street, earning more than $120 million in one year at what was then called Credit Suisse First Boston, which led the most Internet stock IPOs in 1999 and 2000. Before joining CSFB, he had led landmark IPOs of Netscape Communications Corp. and Amazon.com Inc. (The former CSFB is now named Credit Suisse and remains a unit of Credit Suisse Group.)

But in 2003 he was personally charged with "spinning," or steering hot IPOs to clients to win investment-banking business, by the National Association of Securities Dealers. Mr. Quattrone denied those charges, which remain pending. But after he left CSFB, his firm settled civil charges, without admitting or denying wrongdoing, of spinning and biased research based partly on actions by Mr. Quattrone's group.

Even with the reversal yesterday, Mr. Quattrone remains subject to a lifetime ban from the securities business by the NASD for failure to testify in the spinning case. Mr. Quattrone declined to testify, citing a desire to avoid possible self-incrimination that could affect his criminal case, and yesterday he said the reversal bolsters his pending appeal of the lifetime ban.

The Quattrone appeal was based partly on the Supreme Court decision voiding the Arthur Andersen conviction for shredding documents during an investigation of client Enron Corp. The high court said the Andersen jurors were told erroneously they could convict on witness tampering even if Andersen employees believed their conduct was lawful.

The three-judge appeals-court panel cited the Andersen decision, noting that jury instructions by Judge Owen similarly failed to require a connection -- that Mr. Quattrone intended to obstruct the probe when he sent the email urging the file cleanup. The banker's appeal argued that the instructions misled the jury into concluding they could convict even if he was unaware that his action would affect the IPO probes.

Although the Andersen ruling applied most clearly to the judge's instructions for the third count of witness tampering, the appeals panel ruled that jury instructions for the two counts of obstruction were also deficient.

When Judge Owen summarized the requirements for counts one and two, he said jurors could vote guilty if Mr. Quattrone merely "directed the destruction of documents that were called for" by the subpoenas from the grand jury and the Securities and Exchange Commission. Such a summary "eviscerated" the requirement to find Mr. Quattrone connected the email with the investigation, the panel said.

The panel also ruled that Judge Owen erred in other areas. He restricted Mr. Quattrone's answers to "yes" and "no" during cross-examination, denying him room for explanation. The judge also improperly allowed prosecutors to suggest that Mr. Quattrone violated securities rules in attempting to collect a fee from Research In Motion Ltd. Prosecutors focused on that email because it was written just after the file-cleanup email.

In addition, the judge also denied Mr. Quattrone the ability to elaborate on why he told CSFB's general counsel in January 2003 that he was unaware of the original IPO probe when he forwarded the email -- namely that he was never charged or questioned in the case.

Judge Owen had sentenced Mr. Quattrone to 18 months in jail in September 2004 but allowed him to remain free pending the appeal. However, the appeals panel ruled, "the evidence is sufficient to support Quattrone's conviction on each count." And the panel ruled that "a rational juror" could have concluded that Mr. Quattrone "was aware that the grand jury sought documents" in the possession of his group members.

And the panel endorsed some of Judge Owen's rulings, such as allowing Mr. Quattrone's pay into evidence or excluding defense evidence of a debate among CSFB lawyers about the firm's document-retention policy.

Mark Zauderer, a New York commercial-trial lawyer uninvolved with the trial, said the decision was "by no means a rejection of the strength and quality of the evidence presented by the government." He said reversals based on faulty jury instructions are "among the most common technical grounds."

Other defense lawyers contended that the case shouldn't have been brought, and reflected the vindictive spirit of the era. Gerald B. Lefcourt, a New York defense attorney unconnected to the trial, said the case "was more about who he was and Wall Street at the time."

Quattrone Conviction Thrown Out (FT)

By Ben White

Financial Times, March 21, 2006

A US federal appeals court on Monday threw out the 2004 obstruction of justice conviction of former star technology investment banker Frank Quattrone, saying the judge in the case had given erroneous instructions to the jury. The appeals court sent the case back for retrial and demanded it be heard by a different judge.

The ruling dealt a blow to the federal government's efforts to crack down on alleged white-collar crime. It followed a similar ruling by the Supreme Court last year voiding the criminal conviction of now defunct accounting firm Arthur Andersen.

A retrial would mark the third time Mr Quattrone, who emerged as the top technology banker of the 1990s, has faced a federal jury. The first trial ended with no decision after a jury was unable to reach a verdict.

In the second trial, a jury convicted Mr Quattrone of two counts of obstructing justice and one count of witness tampering. He was sentenced to 18 months in prison, but remained free pending his appeal.

The Department of Justice on Monday said prosecutors were reviewing the appeals court ruling and assessing their options.

Mr Quattrone sent the e-mail after learning of federal inquiries into the awarding of shares in hot initial public offerings being handled by his former firm, then known as Credit Suisse First Boston. Federal prosecutors said the e-mail constituted a knowing effort to thwart the investigations.

In the previous trial Mr Quattrone responded that he did not know the extent of government requests for documents when he sent the e-mail.

In its ruling on Monday, the appeals panel ruled that US district judge Richard Owen, the federal judge who presided over Mr Quattrone's second trial, erred when he told jurors they could convict if they found that Mr Quattrone called for the destruction of documents requested by the government even if he did not know exactly which documents were covered by the request.

"Clearly, that instruction is not a correct formulation of the law," the appeals court wrote. "Under the charge, as given, any defendant who urges the destruction of documents might run afoul of [the law] without any proof that the defendant knew the documents were subject to a subpoena."

The appeals panel based its ruling in part on the 2005 Supreme Court decision invalidating the Andersen conviction.

In that ruling, the court said that the instructions in the case wrongly allowed the jury to convict without finding that Andersen employees acted with criminal intent when they tampered with documents relating to Enron, the energy trader. The exact wording of jury instructions is expected to be a major issue in the criminal trials of former Enron chief executives Jeffrey Skilling and Ken Lay.

Quattrone's Obstruction Conviction Thrown Out (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

NEW YORK — A federal appeals court here threw out the conviction of former investment banking star Frank Quattrone, opening the door for yet another retrial in the government's obstruction case unless prosecutors decide to drop the matter once and for all.

In a unanimous decision, the appellate panel ruled that the jury instructions given in the case two years ago by U.S. District Judge Richard Owen were flawed. The panel also acknowledged that Owen's comments during the trial, which rose "beyond mere impatience or annoyance" with the defense, justified Quattrone's request that the matter be reassigned to a new judge.

"We were of course delighted" with the decision, "although I wasn't really surprised with the result," said Mark Pomerantz, the attorney who handled Quattrone's appeal.

The charges against the former Credit Suisse First Boston banker and onetime Silicon Valley rainmaker grew out of a federal investigation into the allocation of red-hot technology IPOs during the dot-com bubble. In December 2000, after being informed that a grand jury was investigating the matter, Quattrone endorsed and circulated a colleague's e-mail reminding subordinates to clean up their files, including paperwork from the IPOs in question.

Prosecutors said Quattrone's sending of the e-mail amounted to obstruction. In his first trial in the fall of 2003 the jury deadlocked, partly because some jurors didn't find Quattrone credible on the stand. His spring 2004 retrial resulted in a conviction.

In their appeal, Quattrone's lawyers argued that Owen's instruction allowed the jury to convict the banker without first determining whether Quattrone knew he was obstructing a federal investigation. Citing the Supreme Court's decision to overturn a guilty verdict against Arthur Andersen last year, the appellate court agreed, writing, "Under the charge, the jury was allowed to convict Quattrone of obstruction regardless of whether he intended such."

John Keker, the Quattrone attorney who clashed frequently with Owen during the two trials, said, "Justice has finally been done."

Asked whether there would be a third trial, a spokeswoman for Michael Garcia, the U.S. Attorney in Manhattan, said, "We are reviewing the opinion and considering our options."

Legal experts note that the government still has a strong case. "The circuit court didn't find the evidence unpersuasive," said New York attorney Mark Zauderer. "Instructions can be cured, whereas presentation of evidence can't be cured."

Appeals Court Overturns Quattrone's Conviction (LAT)

By Jesus Sanchez

The Los Angeles Times, March 21, 2006

A New York federal appeals court today threw out the conviction of former Silicon Valley investment banker Frank Quattrone on obstruction of justice charges, setting the stage for the financier's third trial.

The U.S. 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals sided with Quattrone and ordered a new trial before a different judge after finding that the instructions the jurors received in his second trial were "erroneous."

Quattrone helped bring an array of high-profile technology companies public, including Amazon.com and Cisco Systems. He was convicted in May 2004 of obstructing federal investigations into alleged kickbacks from initial public offerings by urging staff members through e-mails to purge documents from their files.

An initial trial in late 2003 ended in a hung jury.

Quattrone's case revolved around an e-mail he wrote to his staff at Credit Suisse First Boston's technology group in Palo Alto in December 2000. The brief message encouraged his subordinates to comply with an e-mail sent by another banker telling them to "clean up" their files.

Prosecutors said the intent of Quattrone's e-mail was to destroy documents sought in federal probes into whether the investment bank forced customers to pay kickbacks for shares of hugely profitable IPOs in the late-1990s bull market.

Quattrone had argued that he thought the investigations centered on other units of his company. He also was unaware that a grand jury subpoena called for documents from his technology banking group, his attorneys claimed.

In appealing his conviction, Quattrone's attorneys had argued that jurors should have been told that they could convict his client only if it was proved that Quattrone knew that the grand jury subpoena sought documents from his banking group and that he intentionally sought to thwart the probe by sending his e-mail.

Since jurors were not so instructed, the lawyers said, they could not have found criminal intent.

Federal prosecutors countered by saying that Quattrone was well aware of the government investigations and found out about the grand jury subpoena only two days before he encouraged his staff to "clean up" their files.

The three-member appeals panel found that Quattrone's defense about the government inquiry into his unit "was eliminated from the jury's consideration" and final instructions.

March 20 (Bloomberg) -- Frank Quattrone, who made $120 million in 2000 as Credit Suisse's top technology banker, won a new trial today, after a federal appeals court in New York threw out his conviction for obstructing justice.

Quattrone, 50, faces a third trial before a new judge on charges he urged fellow bankers to destroy records. The U.S. 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals in New York today tossed out Quattrone's conviction for obstructing justice and witness tampering and ordered a new trial, ``because the jury instructions were erroneous," the justices said.

``The presumption is that there is a new trial unless the government decides not to retry the case," said Jacob Frenkel, a former federal prosecutor and now a lawyer in Rockville, Maryland, who's not involved in the case. ``The government could walk away altogether."

It's now up to federal prosecutors to decide whether to re- try the former investment banker. Today's reversal may also lead the government and Quattrone to open plea negotiations. Quattrone was convicted in May 2004 after his first trial ended in a hung jury in October 2003.

Quattrone's lawyers had argued that U.S. District Judge Richard Owen, who presided over the first two trials, was biased against him. While the appeals court rejected that claim, the justices decided it was best to have a different judge hear the case.

``Ultimately we believe that the interest and appearance of justice are better served by reassignment" to a new judge, the appeals court said. The justices called Owen ``a dedicated jurist" and said remarks the defense had objected to arose from ``mere impatience or annoyance."

Owen sentenced Quattrone, who's been free pending the outcome of the appeal, to 18 months in prison.

Quattrone's spokesman, Robert Chlopak, and his lawyer, Mark Pomerantz, didn't immediately return calls seeking comment. Bridget Kelly, a spokeswoman for U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia, didn't have an immediate comment.

Quattrone was convicted of hindering probes into how Credit Suisse allocated shares in initial public stock offerings. The conviction ended the career of a banker who took dozens of companies public, including Amazon.com Inc. in 1997.

The case hinged on a December 2000 e-mail written by a colleague urging Credit Suisse employees to ``clean up'' their files and discard documents. Quattrone forwarded the message after learning that a grand jury was investigating how Credit Suisse distributed IPO shares.

`Rife With Error'

Quattrone endorsed the e-mail before passing it on, noting that he'd been a witness in a securities-fraud lawsuit. He said the experience led him to ``strongly advise'' Credit Suisse employees to follow the bank's document retention policy, which called for routine purging of some records.

Pomerantz told the appeals court in July that the trial ``was rife with error.'' He said that while Quattrone knew prosecutors had subpoenaed Credit Suisse, Owen never told jurors that they had to find that the government wanted documents from Quattrone's Palo Alto, California-based division, in order to convict him.

The appeals court agreed, citing ``a glaring deficiency'' in Owen's instruction to the jury. Under the law, the panel had to find that Quattrone knew that the government wanted the documents he ordered destroyed, the court said. Owen failed to deliver such an instruction, the court said.

At the trial, Quattrone never disputed that he knew the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission were investigating Credit Suisse. He said he thought the investigations related to other areas of the bank.

Quattrone Conviction Reversed By 2nd Circuit (LAW)

By Mark Hamblett, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, March 21, 2006

The conviction of former Credit Suisse First Boston star investment banker Frank Quattrone was reversed Monday by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Citing flawed jury instructions, the 2nd Circuit vacated guilty verdicts against Quattrone for obstruction of justice, obstructing an agency proceeding and witness tampering.

The 2nd Circuit also took the rare step of taking the case away from Southern District Judge Richard Owen -- which made Monday's 61-page ruling a sweeping victory for Quattrone and his legal team. Lawyers for Quattrone argued that several remarks and rulings by Judge Owen gave the appearance that the judge was biased against their client. The 2nd Circuit said it could find no evidence of such bias, but it nonetheless found that the "interest and appearance of justice are better served by reassignment."

The appeal in U.S. v. Quattrone, 04-5007-cr, was decided by 2nd Circuit Judges Richard Wesley and Peter Hall, and Northern District Chief Judge Frederick Scullin, sitting by designation. Judge Wesley wrote for the court.

U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia now must decide whether to retry Quattrone. If Garcia decides to go ahead, it would be the third trial for the former head of Credit Suisse's Global Technology Group, which was accused of obstructing two investigations into the allocation of shares in red-hot initial public offerings during the height of the high-tech boom.

While Quattrone's first trial ended with a deadlocked jury, he was convicted on the government's second attempt in 2004.

The heart of the trial concerned Quattrone's communications with members of the technology group while information on the IPO allocation process was being sought in parallel investigations by the National Association of Securities Dealers and the Securities and Exchange Commission. A federal grand jury was empaneled in fall 2000 and, on Nov. 21, 2000, it issued subpoenas to Credit Suisse and eight of its officers.

Quattrone learned that the grand jury had joined the IPO investigation on Dec. 3, 2000. That same day he had several exchanges with David Brodsky, then general counsel for the Americas at Credit Suisse, including one e-mail in which Brodsky said there had been "recent developments that are of extreme concern."

Brodsky noted in another e-mail that no one, as yet, had been accused of any criminal activity, but he warned Quattrone "do not, under any circumstances discuss these facts with anyone" and closed by saying he needed to speak with Quattrone personally.

On Dec. 4, 2000, Richard Char, a banker with the technology group, sent Quattrone a draft e-mail warning employees that the "securities litigation bar is mounting an all-out assault on broken tech IPOs," and urged the employees to abide by the firm's "document retention policy." Under the policy, employees of completed IPOs are supposed to destroy any nonessential documents.

Char told employees to "catch up on file cleanup," and closed by saying, "Today, it's administrative housekeeping. In January, it could be improper destruction of evidence." Quattrone first warned Char that he "shouldn't make jokes like that on email!"

But that same day, he began to draft what was called by prosecutors the "endorsement email." The following day, within hours of learning from Brodsky that he should retain a lawyer and it was likely he would be called as a witness, Quattrone completed and transmitted the following e-mail to employees: "having been a key witness in a securities litigation case in south texas (sic) I strongly advise you to follow these procedures."

Some employees began to clean up, or continued cleaning up their files until the company's legal compliance division sent out notice to stop the editing process.

Quattrone testified in his own defense at both trials, insisting that he lacked the intent to obstruct justice and that he did not know about the SEC subpoena and knew very little about the grand jury subpoena on documents -- a subpoena that covered documents for hundreds of transactions.

DEFICIENT JURY INSTRUCTIONS

On the appeal, Judge Wesley said the evidence was sufficient to support Quattrone's conviction on each count. The court agreed with the government that a jury could reasonably conclude that he acted with intent to obstruct and that the jury was "free to reject Quattrone's explanation that he thought the investigation focused on a separate business area of the bank." And the evidence on witness tampering, Wesley said, was "clearly sufficient."

But Judge Owen erred by giving "deficient" jury instructions on charges one and two, the obstruction counts, Wesley said.

"Under the charge, the jury was allowed to convict Quattrone of obstruction regardless of whether he intended such," he said. "Quattrone's defense of lack of knowledge of the specific focus of the investigation of Tech Group IPO activities was eliminated from the jury's consideration." On the witness tampering charge, he said "there was a failure to charge an essential element of the crime," the appellate judge concluded.

"The court informed the jury that a prerequisite to criminal liability -- some nexus between the effort to tamper with or withhold documents pertaining to the relevant proceeding and awareness that such conduct was likely to affect the proceeding -- was inapplicable," Wesley said. "Given this error, the disputed evidence of Quattrone's awareness as to whether the investigations called for documents to be culled as a result of his endorsement email, and the inadequacy of the nexus charges on counts one and two," the court could not be confident that a "properly instructed," jury would have convicted Quattrone on witness tampering.

LIMITS ON TESTIMONY

Quattrone challenged limits placed on his testimony by Judge Owen and other rulings by the judge. He complained that the judge was sharp and dismissive of Quattrone and his attorneys and gave the impression to the jury that he did not believe Quattrone.

Among several claims made by Quattrone was that Owen, sua sponte, ordered him to answer "yes," or "no" to certain questions -- and the government was able to contend in summation that he was evasive in answering the questions.

His arguments resonated with the circuit. "In this circuit, a defendant's right to a fair trial is infringed when a judge's questions and comments convey to the jury that the judge disbelieves the defendant's testimony," Judge Wesley said. But, at the same time, he noted, judges have trial-management authority that includes the discretion "to place reasonable limits on the presentation of evidence." "The exercise of that discretion, however, must remain tethered in some way to the facts and circumstances of the case presented," Wesley said. "Accordingly, when confronted with an evasive witness, trial judges must be careful to safeguard the witness's ability to answer questions, particularly in the case of a criminal defendant-witness."

In such cases, Wesley said, "a trial judge should allow for complete answers by the defendant ... "

A 'DEDICATED JURIST'

The circuit went on to reject several challenges Quattrone made to other rulings by Judge Owen before it turned to a delicate explanation of its reason for reassigning the case to another judge.

While Quattrone claimed that Owen was no longer impartial in the case, the government said the standard for remanding to another judge had not been met. It argued Quattrone's complaints were based on a media campaign by his handlers to discredit the judge.

Calling Owen a "dedicated jurist," the circuit said "in our view, the contentions of the parties in this difficult and complex matter have taken a toll on all involved."

"While we have considered the government's arguments and do not find evidence that the trial judge made any inappropriate statements leading us to seriously doubt his impartiality, portions of the transcript raise the concern that certain comments could be viewed as rising beyond mere impatience or annoyance," Wesley said. "Ultimately, we believe that the interest and appearance of justice are better served by reassignment."

The government said it was reviewing the decision and weighing its options.

Quattrone was represented by John Keker of Keker & Van Nest in San Francisco at trial. His lead attorney on appeal was Mark Pomerantz of Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison. He was also represented by attorneys with Mayer, Brown, Rowe & Maw.

In a statement, Pomerantz described his client as "an innocent man who was wrongly convicted in a trial that denied him his most fundamental right to fairness." The statement pointed out that the circuit's decision will affect Quattrone's appeal of an NASD order barring him for life from the securities industry.

Assistant U.S. Attorneys David Anders, who tried the case, and Jessica Mordas and Harry Sandick represented the government. Then-U.S. Attorney David Kelley was on the brief.

Quattrone's Fate Turns On Mundane Detail (WSJ)

By Paul Davies And Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

At the end of any jury trial, the judge's instructions to the jurors can be the most boring part of the proceedings.

They can also be the most important. Just ask Frank Quattrone.

A federal appeals court Monday overturned the 2004 conviction of Mr. Quattrone, a former investment banker, due to "erroneous" jury instructions. (Court's decision1)

"In the lawyer movies they don't have the climatic scene on jury instructions," says John Carroll, a former federal prosecutor. "It is something that seems kind of technical and is outside of the consciousness of the reader-public, but it is important."

A jury convicted Mr. Quattrone of two obstruction-of-justice counts and one witness-tampering count for his actions during an investigation of alleged kickbacks involving initial public offerings of stock, including emailing colleagues at then-named Credit Suisse First Boston, a unit of Credit Suisse Group, that it was "time to clean up those files."

The court ruled that U.S. District Judge Richard Owen's instructions to jurors wrongly allowed them to convict him of obstruction for urging the destruction of documents without determining "that the defendant knew the documents were subject to a subpoena [or document request]." The panel said that "the jury was allowed to convict Quattrone of obstruction of justice regardless of whether he intended such."

The witness-tampering conviction was overturned because, after Mr. Quattrone's conviction, the Supreme Court -- in a similar case against the accounting firm of Arthur Andersen -- ruled that jurors should have been told that a conviction requires a link between the defendant urging the destruction of documents and "a particular proceeding." The judge in the Quattrone case didn't include such an instruction.

Appeals in white-collar cases almost routinely include one of the judge's jury instructions. Unlike in a case involving a murder, it isn't always clear to a jury what violates the technical requirements in finding somebody guilty of violating securities or obstruction-of-justice laws.

While judges start from a standard set of instructions, they tailor them to fit each case, and both sides often hotly contest exactly what the jury should be told, because jurors usually pay close attention. "If you don't get reasonable instructions you could be put out of the case," attorney Gerald B. Lefcourt said.

Lawyers for former WorldCom Inc. Chief Executive Bernard Ebbers based the pending appeal of his fraud conviction in part on the instructions U.S. District Judge Barbara Jones gave to the jury.

In that case, the question centered on whether the judge should have instructed that it could find Mr. Ebbers guilty if he consciously avoided knowing about the fraud. Judge Jones initially agreed with the defense that argued against including such an instruction, but she later added it after Mr. Ebbers testified that he didn't know about the crime. In her instructions, Judge Jones said jurors could find Mr. Ebbers guilty if they thought he strongly suspected a fraud -- but intentionally avoided finding out about it. Mr. Ebbers's attorney, Reid Weingarten, said he worried some jurors may have concluded that Mr. Ebbers should be convicted if they found simply that he should have known about the fraud.

The appeals court in the Quattrone case said that, given the way the judge framed other instructions, he improperly included a "conscious avoidance" instruction, but it said one might be appropriate in a retrial.

Such an instruction could become an issue in the continuing federal criminal trial of former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay and former CEO Jeffrey Skilling. Even if the prosecutors don't seek to include that instruction, how the judge instructs the jury will likely be debated.

Conscious-avoidance instructions are "always fertile ground for appellate issues because the line between conscious avoidance on the one side and recklessness and negligence on the other is difficult to enunciate," said Paul Shechtman, a defense lawyer with Stillman & Friedman. "I could spend the rest of my life trying to understand the law of conscious avoidance in a conspiracy case and still not get it."

Mr. Lefcourt said jury instructions are a key part of any appeal. "Judges do get it wrong," he said. "Reversals are often caused by improper jury instructions."

There is a movement by some state bar associations to have jury instructions written in plain English. In 2003, the California state bar association adopted new plain English jury instructions for civil cases eliminating phrases like "preponderance of evidence" with words jurors could understand better. Other movements are afoot in making the language less legal boilerplate in favor of words and concepts that nonlawyers could understand.

Judges often are loath to stray from the standard instructions because they risk being overturned. "The irony is as you stray from the script and try to make it clearer, you run a risk of making an error," Mr. Shechtman said.

Order To Assign New Judge Is Unusual (WSJ)

By Robin Sidel And Peter Lattman

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

Judge Richard Owen presided over two of Frank Quattrone's obstruction-of-justice trials. He won't be around for the third.

In reversing the conviction of the former star technology-industry investment banker, a federal appeals court yesterday assigned a new judge to the case, saying that "the interests of all involved would best be served by another judge." The appeals court didn't name the judge who would take the case.

"We are confident that the new judge will exercise the appropriate discretion in balancing the competing interests of an orderly presentation of evidence and defendant's right to raise a defense," according to the 61-page ruling issued by the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Manhattan. In remanding the case, the appeals panel determined that jury instructions were "erroneous."

Judge Owen, 83 years old, couldn't immediately be reached for comment.

Lawyers who aren't involved in the case said it is rare for an appeals court to assign a new judge when sending a case back to the lower court for a new trial.

"It is highly unusual for the court of appeals to reverse a case with instructions that it be assigned to a new trial judge because it implies that the appellate court believes that the original judge may have been partial to one side or the other," said former prosecutor Marc Mukasey, now of Bracewell & Giuliani in New York. "In this case, however, the court of appeals stressed that it didn't question Judge Owen's impartiality."

Judge Owen's conduct was one of several issues raised in Mr. Quattrone's appeal after he was convicted of obstructing a federal investigation into initial public offerings of stock. The conviction came in a retrial following a 2003 mistrial. The former banker at Credit Suisse Group's then-named Credit Suisse First Boston had been sentenced to 18 months in prison, but remained free during the appeals process.

Over the course of the retrial, Mr. Quattrone's lawyer, John Keker, complained several times about Judge Owen's rulings and body language. In one instance, the judge wouldn't let Mr. Keker introduce evidence. Judge Owen, for his part, threatened to find Mr. Keker in contempt of court.

The appeal challenged several of Judge Owen's rulings, including limitations that were placed on Mr. Quattrone's testimony. The appeal filed by Mr. Quattrone, 50, contended the court's interference with his testimony "crossed the line beyond legitimate trial management" and deprived him of a fair trial. The government defended Judge Owen's actions.

In yesterday's ruling, the appeals court didn't determine that Judge Owen infringed on Mr. Quattrone's rights to a fair trial, but noted that "a trial judge should allow for complete answers by a defendant."

Daniel Richman, a law professor at Fordham University, said "It's clear that the panel took pains not to suggest that they were buying the arguments Quattrone's lawyers were making about Judge Owen's bias...but clearly they were aware of the complicated dynamics between the defense lawyers and the judge in the case."

Despite the decision yesterday, it isn't clear if a new judge will get to hear Mr. Quattrone's case. "We are reviewing the opinion and considering our options," said a spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office, which prosecuted the case.

Enron Former Auditors Testify On Charges, Reserve Accounts (WSJ)

By Gary McWilliams And John R. Emshwiller

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

HOUSTON -- Two former partners of Enron Corp.'s outside auditor, Arthur Andersen LLP, took the witness stand to help prosecutors link former top company executives Kenneth Lay1 and Jeffrey Skilling2 to the alleged manipulation of the energy firm's reported financial results.

The auditors' testimony at the beginning of the eighth week of the conspiracy and fraud trial touched on two main areas: the alleged downward manipulation of charges for goodwill expenses and the alleged misuse of reserve accounts to bump up reported earnings.

In the case of goodwill, prosecutors contend that Mr. Lay, Enron's former chairman, misled Andersen and the public in October 2001 about the company's plans for its big water-distribution unit in order to avoid a hefty charge to earnings. On the reserve issue, the government contends Enron improperly tapped a reserve account to meet the desire by Mr. Skilling, the former company president, to beat analysts' earnings estimates.

The goodwill issue arose because of a new accounting rule in 2001 that required the write-down of an asset if it didn't meet certain criteria, which in the case of the Enron water unit included whether the company had an expensive growth plan, testified John R. Sult, one of the former Andersen partners. Without such a growth strategy, said Mr. Sult, Enron likely would have been forced to recognize an "impairment," or write-down, which prosecutors have said could have totaled hundreds of millions of dollars.

Enron officials at the time claimed that they were planning to spend well over $1 billion to expand the water business, said Mr. Sult. He said he was surprised to hear that because the company had previously indicated that the water operation was a noncore business likely to be sold.

The other government witness, former Andersen partner Thomas Bauer, testified to attending a meeting on Oct. 12, 2001, in which Mr. Lay told Andersen that "water was the commodity of the 21st century." Mr. Lay "talked of building the water business" and "expanding it from its current state," said Mr. Bauer. Prosecutors contend that such assurances were false and aimed at avoiding a costly write-down, and have presented emails from other Enron officials to support that argument.

Mr. Sult, the first witness, also said that later in October, Mr. Lay misled analysts during a conference call about the status of Andersen's review of the water issue. Mr. Lay said that Andersen had concluded that an impairment on the water business wasn't necessary. At the time, Andersen's review of the issue was still "preliminary and incomplete," Mr. Sult said.

After a month of review, Mr. Sult added, "I was unable to find any evidence" that Enron did have a growth strategy for the water business. By that point in mid-November 2001, Enron was deep into a financial crisis that would push it into bankruptcy proceedings a few weeks later.

On reserve accounts, Mr. Bauer said they shouldn't be used to meet an earnings target. He said he was "quite surprised" when federal investigators showed him company emails indicating reserve accounts had been used for that purpose. He added that he was unaware that one particular account in 2000 had been drained of about $14 million. However, in cross-examination, a Skilling attorney showed emails indicating other Andersen officials had been apprised of that reduction.

Mr. Bauer also said that during his years auditing Enron he had never seen a handwritten list, known as the "Global Galactic" memo, written by former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow3. Prosecutors claim the memo lays out various secret Enron deals to illegally manipulate financial results. The defense contends that there were no such secret side deals.

By Jeremiah Marquez

AP, March 21, 2006

LOS ANGELES - A federal judge found former Gemstar-TV Guide CEO Henry C. Yuen liable for securities fraud, according to a ruling unsealed Monday in a federal regulatory lawsuit that claimed Yuen inflated the company's revenue by $248 million to boost its stock.

U.S. District Judge Mariana R. Pfaelzer also found Yuen liable for misrepresenting facts to Gemstar's auditors and falsifying its books.

The Securities and Exchange Commission will now submit a proposed penalty.

Yuen's attorney, Stanley Arkin, said an appeal was being considered.

Gemstar, meanwhile, said in a statement that it was pleased by the decision to hold Yuen "accountable for his wrongful and inappropriate actions."

Pfaelzer's findings came almost three years after the SEC filed the lawsuit against Yuen and Elsie Leung, Gemstar's ex-finance chief, in an alleged scheme to inflate company revenue to meet certain financial targets.

Regulators contend that Yuen's actions contributed to a windfall between 2000 and 2002 - at least $18.8 million in salary and bonuses, $14.6 million in exercised stock options, and more than $63.6 million in Gemstar stock sales.

"After nearly three years of litigation, the court categorically rejected Henry Yuen's finger pointing and attempts to blame others for the massive fraud at Gemstar," said Randall Lee, the SEC's regional director.

Since November 2002, Gemstar has restated or reversed certain license and ad revenues by $357 million, with more than $230 million stemming from transactions in the case, according to the ruling.

Yuen knew but didn't disclose that a good portion of licensing revenue for 2000 and 2001 came from expired and disputed licensing agreements, the judge said. What's more, he misled investors when Gemstar recorded non-monetary payments as ad revenue, and booked revenue from so-called round trip transactions in which Gemstar paid money to a third party only to receive it back again, she said.

The goal, regulators said, was to make the company look healthier than it otherwise might have been in hopes of buoying its stock price.

In an August 2000 e-mail, Yuen appeared to scold another executive over certain internal revenue forecasts.

DOJ_NMG_0019698

"This is completely unacceptable," Yuen wrote, according to court transcripts unsealed Monday that focused on the e-mail exchange. "The street ... expects some sort of explosive growth.

"We are shooting for the Moon, and I am confident we can do it."

Besides the civil lawsuit, Yuen remains under criminal investigation by the Justice Department following a federal judge's rejection of a plea deal in the case. Under the now-defunct agreement, Yuen was to plead guilty to one felony charge of obstruction of justice for deleting computer files subpoenaed in the SEC's investigation.

Testifying during the civil trial in December, Yuen conceded "there's no doubt" the deleted information was sought by regulators, according to court transcripts.

After leaving his post as chief executive, Yuen worked in another position with Gemstar. He was fired in April 2003 but continues to receive a yearly salary of $2 million plus benefits from the company, said Eileen M. Murphy, a Gemstar spokeswoman. Yuen is challenging his termination and will have to repay the money should he lose.

Leung settled with the SEC last month, agreeing to return $600,000 and pay $750,000 in civil penalties, regulators said.

Gemstar shares closed down 2 cents, 0.67 percent, at $2.96 in trading Monday on the Nasdaq.

Movie Musical 'Chicago' Prompts A Suit Over Profits (NYT)

By Anemona Hartocollis

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

The producer of "Chicago," the Oscar-winning 2002 movie, is charging that Miramax has cheated him out of millions of dollars of profit from it by using deceptive accounting to understate revenue.

The producer, Martin Richards, sold Miramax an option to the movie rights to the musical in 1994. In papers filed in State Supreme Court in Manhattan yesterday, he said that he has been cheated by a Hollywood system of contingency payments to participants in moviemaking like producers, actors and writers that gives studios an incentive to underreport revenues.

Under that system, the court papers say, "the worse a movie performs financially, the better off the studio is."

Emily Bear, a spokeswoman for Miramax, declined to comment yesterday, saying company officials had not yet seen the court papers. Mr. Richards's lawsuit says that he does not know precisely how much he is owed, but it seeks at least $10 million, which he estimates is his share of the movie's profits.

"This picture has been touched by some sort of God," Mr. Richards said in an interview after the suit was filed. "Everything that's happened to it has been great. But it would be nice to be paid for your work."

Mr. Richards declined to say how much he had been paid for the movie upfront, although the court papers said that his contract called for him to be paid several fees, including $500,000 after the movie reached its initial break-even point.

Mr. Richards claimed that most of that money was reimbursement for his expenses. The profits he is seeking would have come after those payments, and, he said, "I have never seen a nickel of the profits."

Mr. Richards, who is 74, produced the musical "Chicago" on Broadway in 1975, and then began a 27-year quest to make a movie out of it, he said in the suit.

The film, which opened in December 2002, starred Richard Gere, Catherine Zeta-Jones and Renée Zellweger, and won six Academy Awards, including one for best picture. The court papers said that the film was budgeted at $47 million and went over budget by about $10 million, though, they contend, Miramax never consulted the producer to approve cost overruns.

The lawsuit is sprinkled with celebrity names —Louise Ciccone, better known as Madonna, appears as a witness to the signatures on Mr. Richards's deal with Miramax described in the suit. It claims that "Chicago" was the highest-grossing film ever released by the studio. The lawsuit said the movie generated gross receipts of about $300 million, including $170 million during its initial domestic release, and many millions more from DVD, video and foreign distribution.

Mr. Richards, as the head of the Producer Circle Company, was the producer of the movie, and Bob and Harvey Weinstein, the founders of Miramax, were the co-executive producers. The Weinsteins are not named as defendants.

"There are two issues," Thomas P. Puccio, Mr. Richards's lawyer, said. "One is how much money is in the pot that Marty shares in, and the second is what are the expenses, and those are two areas that they in this case certainly shortchanged him on."

The suit offers something of an exegesis on accounting practices in the film industry, including the observation that there are at least two forms of accounting used by major studios, financial accounting and contingent compensation. Financial accounting, the papers say, somewhat archly, "tends to be rather run of the mill, reflecting the mundane efforts of Hollywood's C.P.A.'s to match movie revenue with movie costs."

Contingency accounting, the lawsuit says, is "reined in only by the avarice of the studios and the leverage they hold over the talent they hire, is opaque, confusing and leads to patently absurd results."

Studios support creative accounting, the lawsuit says, because so many people involved in the production of a movie are under contracts that award contingent compensation, often including actors, the director, the producer and the writer. The most powerful independent contractors — like major stars — can negotiate contracts known as "gross deals," in which their compensation is based on gross receipts for the movie, with minimal deductions for expenses, the lawsuit says. The less powerful, the papers say, receive "net profit deals," in which, the lawsuit says, "studios typically decrease revenue and increase costs and expenses attributable to the movie."

The suit quotes the actor Eddie Murphy as referring to net deals as "monkey points," meaning, according to the court papers, that "only a monkey would expect them to actually result in any payment to the talent."

Mr. Richards, his lawsuit says, had negotiated what is called a "gross after break-even deal," a contract that is somewhere in between a gross deal and a net deal.

But the lawsuit charges that without Mr. Richards's permission, Miramax turned this into a net deal, and even then, understated its revenues.

Over the past two decades, Miramax has been involved in the production of movies including "The Crying Game," "The Piano, "Pulp Fiction," "The English Patient," "Shakespeare in Love," and "The Cider House Rules."

The Producer Circle Company, which Mr. Richards has headed since its founding in 1975, has been involved in several successful Broadway plays besides Chicago, including "On the Twentieth Century," which opened in 1978 and "La Cage aux Folles," in 1983. Mr. Richards has also been involved with movies like "The Boys from Brazil," in 1978, "The Shining" in 1980 and "Fort Apache the Bronx" in 1981.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Witness In Detectives' Trial Tells Of Pressure To Cooperate (NYT)

By Alan Feuer

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

The federal trial of Louis J. Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa veered today from Brooklyn murder and Las Vegas lunacy to the high-stakes poker game played by government agents and gangland turncoats as the trial's star witness told the jury of the immense "pressure" placed on him to "crack" and cooperate against the two retired detectives in the case.

It was a brief, but fascinating, window into the tactics used by federal agents once a criminal falls into their hands. Under cross-examination by defense lawyers, the witness, Burton Kaplan, testified that, after he was arrested in 1996 on marijuana and tax-evasion charges, "the government was willing to go to any length" to have him "crack" and come "on board to provide information" against Mr. Eppolito, 57, and Mr. Caracappa, 64.

The two men are accused of working under Mr. Kaplan's aegis to commit at least eight gangland murders — seven for Anthony Casso, the second-in-command of the Luchese crime family.

In his fourth day on the stand, Mr. Kaplan, 72, described how, on the night of his arrest, he languished at the Manhattan office of the Drug Enforcement Administration as a parade of 20 to 25 investigators lined up to court his cooperation. Two police inspectors told him, he said, that he could "go home tonight" if he coughed up what he knew about "two dirty cops."

This scene, described in Mr. Kaplan's patented placid manner, was only the start of an almost eight-year-long attempt to get him — a career criminal whose schemes included peddling drugs and selling stolen watches — to testify against the two retired detectives, who, at that point, had already left New York and settled in Las Vegas.

There, Mr. Kaplan testified last week, Mr. Eppolito was playing "bit parts" in movies while writing scripts in his garage and Mr. Caracappa was having a house built while trying his hand at business deals like peddling a George Foreman punching-bag machine to the QVC home-shopping channel.

'Mafia Cops' Witness: Never Shown Photos (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 21, 2006

On his last day on the witness stand yesterday, a key government witness testified that he wasn't aware of any surveillance photos that show him meeting over the years with the alleged "Mafia Cops."

Burton Kaplan, a former garment executive and drug dealer, admitted under cross examination that he has never been shown any surveillance of him with ex-NYPD detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa during clandestine meetings he allegedly had with them in a Staten Island cemetery.

Kaplan, 72, had testified earlier that for a period of about six years he met with both men face-to-face as part of a corrupt arrangement in which the detectives passed him confidential law enforcement information and took part in gangland murders in exchange for cash. Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, are on trial in Brooklyn federal court on racketeering charges, which accuse them of being hit men for the Luchese crime family in the late 1980s and into the early 1990s.

Questioned by Eppolito's lawyer, Bruce Cutler, Kaplan, who is serving a 27-year sentence for marijuana trafficking, said he began meeting with the defendants after a mobster who had been serving as an intermediary was killed in September 1987. That mobster was Frank Santoro Jr., a cousin of Eppolito.

During two full days of cross examination, Kaplan didn't appear to waver or change his story about his dealings with the detectives, whom he has implicated in a dozen mob homicides, including eight charged in the indictment that led to the current trial. Kaplan was a key associate of former acting Luchese boss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso and told the jury yesterday under Cutler's questioning that he had been the subject of video surveillance at his clothing business on Staten Island in the 1990s but insisted he wasn't observed committing any crimes.

The defense is likely to use Kaplan's admission that he wasn't shown surveillance photos to undermine his claim that he met Eppolito and Caracappa during the six-year period.

To deter the possibility of surveillance by law enforcement, Kaplan said he used the code name "Marko" when he called the two detectives and insisted that any telephone calls be made from pay phones. Meetings were held in a Staten Island cemetery, Kaplan explained, to make sure no one was spying on them.

Gangland Gambit On Witness Stand (NYDN)

As in Gotti's trial, lawyer's word key in 'mob cop' case

The star witness in the so-called Mafia cops trial will soon have his own corroborating witness - his former lawyer.

Federal prosecutors plan to call Judd Burstein, the ex-mouthpiece of Burton Kaplan, to the witness stand today, the Daily News has learned.

Burstein is expected to testify that Kaplan told him back in 1994 about his role as a middleman between former NYPD Detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa and gangster Anthony (Gaspipe) Casso.

Contacted last night, Burstein acknowledged to The News that he had volunteered to share what he knew with prosecutors.

To be used as a witness, Kaplan had to waive his attorney-client privilege - which he did.

"I thought it was my obligation as a citizen to come forward," Burstein said. "This is the right thing to do."

The surprise witness echoes a successful gambit this month in the racketeering trial of John A. (Junior) Gotti, whose defense team had lawyer Ron Kuby testify that Gotti told him in 1998 that he had left the mob because he was sick of that life.

Gotti's trial ended in a hung jury, the second mistrial for him in six months.

But in this case, it's the feds who are calling the lawyer to the stand.

Kaplan was asked on cross-examination yesterday about an affidavit he filed alleging the feds turned a blind eye to fabricated evidence - just to win the case and pressure Kaplan to cooperate against the reputed Mafia cops after Casso became unusable as a witness.

"Is that what you're doing now?" Eppolito lawyer Bruce Cutler asked Kaplan, who is serving a 27-year sentence.

"No," Kaplan answered, and stuck to his story that he decided to cooperate mainly because he thought Eppolito and Caracappa were going to turn against him first.

Kaplan acknowledged he's hoping for a sentence reduction.

"Mr. Cutler, I've been before judges before and I've never been very lucky," he said.

Kaplan, 72, a crafty career criminal who made millions in the garment business while also participating in criminal schemes - including murder - for the Luchese crime family, deftly handled cross-examination by Cutler and lawyer Edward Hayes, who represents Caracappa.

Brooklyn Federal Judge Jack Weinstein ended Cutler's cross-examination for the second time during the trial after Cutler asked a question in violation of a pretrial order about a lie-detector test administered to Kaplan.

Outside court, Cutler seemed unconcerned.

"Judge Weinstein knows better than I do when I'm finished," he said.

By Greg Risling, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, March 21, 2006

LOS ANGELES – Imprisoned private investigator Anthony Pellicano said Monday he wants to act as his own lawyer in a case charging that he orchestrated an illegal wiretapping scheme targeting Hollywood celebrities and executives.

During a court hearing, Pellicano spoke at length for the first time since he was indicted last month. He said he wanted to know the results of the government's 3½-year investigation into his activities.

“I have a lot of questions to see what they have been doing all this time,” Pellicano told U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer. “I'm best suited to represent myself.”

Pellicano was shackled and wore a prison-issued green windbreaker and blue pants. He previously pleaded not guilty.

Prosecutors contend that Pellicano illegally wiretapped the phones of Hollywood stars such as Sylvester Stallone and bribed police officers to run the names of more than 60 people, including comedians Garry Shandling and Kevin Nealon, through government databases.

Pellicano allegedly sought damaging information on his clients' rivals. He then used the details for threats, blackmail and in some cases to secure an advantage in court for his clients, according to a 112-count indictment.

A total of 13 people have been charged in the case. Four have pleaded guilty to a variety of charges, including wire fraud and conspiracy.

Pellicano said he doesn't have any problems with his attorney, Steven Gruel. Outside court, Gruel said his client simply “wants to go to trial as soon as possible.”

Gruel will continue to be Pellicano's attorney until the judge decides whether the shamus is competent to represent himself.

Meanwhile, federal prosecutors provided the judge with snippets of their case scheduled to go to trial next month. The proceedings could be delayed.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Saunders said another indictment would be handed down in early April. He didn't say whether the indictment would name more defendants or only add allegations.

Saunders also said he had given some defense attorneys more than 2,000 pages of evidence as well as dozens of digital audio files as part of the discovery process.

He also revealed the government has evidence of some 15,000 computer “runs” by former Los Angeles police Sgt. Mark Arneson, who has pleaded not guilty to charges related to using confidential police databases to search for information for Pellicano.

“They contain some kind of personal information,” Saunders said of the computer inquiries.

Prosecutors are seeking a protective order to prevent key evidence from becoming public before trial. Fischer didn't sign an order Monday but said there would be a protective order of some kind.

Saunders said three search warrant affidavits connected to raids on Pellicano's offices in 2002 would be unsealed later this week. FBI agents found illegal explosives and seized documents and computers during the searches, authorities said.

Pellicano served a 2½-year sentence on explosive-related charges and is awaiting trial in a separate case for allegedly hiring a man to threaten a former Los Angeles Times reporter working on a story about actor Steven Seagal and possible links to the Mafia.

Gruel filed a motion Monday revisiting the legality of the search warrants. Pellicano has maintained that his Fourth Amendment rights were violated because the search was allegedly a ruse to get into his office to look for other suspected wrongdoing. The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled 2-1 in June that the search was legitimate and FBI agents acted in good faith.

“The Pellicano defense seeks discovery that will show that the FBI knew and expected to find a lot more than what they represented to or sought from the magistrate judge,” according to the motion.

Pellicano's Attorney Fights Basis Of Search (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian And Henry Weinstein, Times Staff Writers

Anthony Pellicano's attorney on Monday challenged the federal government's search of the indicted private eye's office, claiming that authorities misled the courts about their reasons for going after the investigator's records.

In obtaining a warrant to search Pellicano's Sunset Strip offices four years ago — a search which yielded tape recordings and thousands of pages of computerized records — FBI agents stated that they were investigating Pellicano's alleged links to a threat against Los Angeles Times reporter Anita Busch.

But Steven Gruel, Pellicano's attorney, said in a nine-page motion filed after a status conference in the widening probe that the government's story was a "subterfuge and ruse to get into Mr. Pellicano's office in order to search the premises for other suspected wrongdoing."

Gruel said the government's interest in Pellicano predated the threat against the reporter and may have originated in 2001 with the FBI investigating whether one of its agents had been overheard by Pellicano using an illegal wiretap placed on behalf of clients in an unrelated matter.

In the motion, Gruel also questioned whether the U.S. attorney's office and the FBI may have violated Pellicano's rights at a time when he was acting as his own attorney by seeking information from a former girlfriend after her visits to Pellicano in prison.

The accusations by Gruel, a former federal prosecutor from San Francisco, represent the most dramatic attack to date on the government's case, which so far has resulted in a dozen people being charged with hiring — or helping — Pellicano uncover embarrassing information on others.

Four people have pleaded guilty in the case. The others, including Pellicano, have denied wrongdoing.

"If we can suppress the initial search for evidence, then the whole apple cart gets turned over," Gruel said in an interview after filing his motion. "It could have a domino effect on the entire case."

Describing Gruel's motion as "the initial shot across the bow," Loyola Law professor Laurie Levenson said it suggests the attorney "will play hard ball, that he will show the court and the world that this was a dirty prosecution."

However, Levenson said the search of Pellicano's offices had already been upheld on a 2-1 vote of the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeal after a challenge on different legal grounds by Pellicano's previous attorneys.

In his motion, Gruel said FBI Agent Stan Ornellas stated in a search warrant affidavit that authorities wanted to seize Pellicano's office computers, suggesting a far broader investigation than the threat against Busch.

Gruel noted that long before the search of Pellicano's offices, the FBI had become aware of allegations that one of its own agents had illegally wiretapped while investigating a dispute over control of a $40-million Internet business. Two brothers involved in that dispute have now been charged with benefiting from Pellicano's use of illegal wiretaps.

In questioning the role Pellicano's former girlfriend played in the case, Gruel said it may have been improper for a "cooperating" government witness to be visiting Pellicano in prison at a time when he was representing himself.

Her attorney, Peter Knecht, disputed that Carradine had ever been asked by the government to visit Pellicano in prison for the purpose of obtaining information.

"The government is not stupid," he said. "They were always aware there could be misconduct allegations … so they made it very clear to her that if she wished to visit [Pellicano] in prison, it was on her own terms and they were not interested in anything that pertained to his case and how it would be defended."

Federal prosecutors declined to comment Monday on Gruel's claims, saying instead that they would present their responses in writing to the court.

Gruel filed his motion after a hearing in which Pellicano told U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer that he wanted to represent himself in the case to rapidly move it to trial.

"I don't want to disrupt the court … but it has been almost four years now," Pellicano said, referring to the time he spent imprisoned, first on an explosives conviction and now on wiretap and racketeering charges. "What have [authorities] been doing all this time?"

But Pellicano backed away from his request after the judge made it clear the trial was not going to start anytime soon because prosecutors and defense attorneys need additional time to review the evidence amassed to date. Fischer also said she would not accept a proposal allowing Gruel to sign legal papers on behalf of Pellicano if Pellicano serves as his own attorney.

Federal prosecutors Dan Saunders and Kevin Lally told the packed courtroom that they already have turned over 2,000 pages of documents and 25 hours of audio files to defense attorneys in the case. At the same time, they said they have plenty of confidential information to pore over before it could be shared with defense attorneys or their clients, most of whom are accused of illegally accessing police records or conspiring to wiretap others.

With eight defendants awaiting trial, Saunders has said he expected to file another indictment before the middle of next month.

During the hearing, government prosecutors and defense attorneys spent considerable time discussing a proposed protective order that would cover the dissemination of confidential information, including phone numbers, addresses and Social Security numbers.

Fischer put off a decision on the order as both sides hammer out its wording.

Witness Describes Deal With Officers (BSUN)

By Matthew Dolan, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, March 21, 2006

Addict-turned-informant testifies he resold drugs confiscated by police

Almost daily on cell phones and regularly in person at Pete's Place Bar & Lounge on North Franklintown Road, an odd couple commiserated. The police officer sometimes joked about his love life; the informant lamented about his heroin addiction and a daughter who was running into trouble with the law in New York.

But in hours of secretly recorded conversations by federal agents, prosecutors say, one topic of conversation dominated the relationship between Detective William A. King and his informant, Antonio Mosby: selling illegal drugs for mutual profit.

A federal jury heard more than a dozen recorded phone calls Monday that prosecutors say show how King and his partner, Detective Antonio L. Murray, shook down drug dealers pointed out by Mosby at open-air drug markets across Baltimore.

Monday's testimony from Mosby, who struck a deal with prosecutors in hopes of a lighter prison sentence, marked the fourth day in the police corruption trial. The proceeding is the culmination of the FBI's seven-month wiretap probe into misconduct in the Baltimore Police Department that ended with the May 2005 arrests of King and Murray.

In a 33-count indictment in U.S. District Court, they are accused of conspiring to rob and extort cocaine, heroin and marijuana -- as well as drug-related proceeds -- from suspects they pursued.

Now imprisoned, Mosby, 40, spent most of Monday morning on the witness stand explaining how he bought and sold heroin in West Baltimore for some 25 years before his arrest last year by federal agents.

He told jurors he first met King and Murray in the spring of 2003 when Mosby was arrested with five gel capsules of heroin.

"They were pretty much asking me what could I help them with," Mosby said.

Mosby was not charged and instead registered as a confidential informant, making him eligible for payments from the Police Department. Hanging over his head, Mosby said, was the possibility that King and Murray would charge him with drug possession if he didn't cooperate.

"They had the pills," he explained Monday. "So I felt obligated" to call the officers with tips about drug activity.

At first, Mosby said, he thought he would just be providing lawful information to King and Murray. Soon, he said, "I became aware."

His awareness was of the illegal drug business set up by King and Murray, according to prosecutors. Mosby provided information about which "hitters" were carrying drugs; King and Murray would "catch and release" the dealers, stripping them of their money and drugs. Then, according to prosecutors and trial testimony, the officers would illegally sell the drugs to Mosby at a discount. He in turn, he said, resold the drugs back out on the streets.

They called it "grinding," Mosby told the jury.

Among the targets, Mosby said, were "old heads," or older drug dealers and users. King told Mosby that the officers didn't want information about juveniles, who would require a lengthy arrest booking process, or young people who would be apt to run from the detectives and require a chase.

Attorneys for King and Murray centered their questioning Monday on whether the officers had attempted to use Mosby and other informants to crack large-scale drug dealers.

Under cross-examination, Mosby told King's attorney Edward Smith Jr. that he was a longtime heroin addict who needed five hits of the drug a day to keep from being "sick." He sold the drug to family and friends, delivering heroin to their workplaces at lunchtime.

"You didn't see anything wrong with that? You felt you were doing them a service?" Smith asked Mosby.

"In a sense, yes," Mosby said.

The number of Bakersfield-area people indicted in a scheme that bilked thousands of dollars from an American Red Cross fund designated for Hurricane Katrina victims has risen to 61, federal authorities said.

Eight people were indicted last week in federal court in Fresno on charges of wire fraud and filing fake claims to the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

During the aftermath of Katrina, the Red Cross rushed to set up call centers across the country that provided qualifying victims with a personal identification number they then presented to receive aid funds from Western Union, prosecutor Stanley A. Boone said.

The Bakersfield center was the largest center and handled calls from across the country. The Red Cross contacted the FBI after it performed an audit and discovered an unusually high number of claims were being paid out at Western Union outlets in the Bakersfield area, even though not many evacuees had moved there.

Those recently charged were Ronika Danyell Spears, 21; Cherri Lynn Brown, 29; Ulysses Jack Perkins, 23; Kathy Ann Hollis, 38; Richard Eugene Raymond, 35; Phillip Anthony Wyatt, 31; Atiffa Guadalupe Dunbar, 26; and Cheryl L. Tateveasay, 53.

Since the Justice Department began its investigations, 25 people charged from the Bakersfield center have pleaded guilty to felony charges.

Across the country, others have returned money, according to a Justice Department report released last month. FEMA and the Red Cross reported receiving more than $8 million in returned funds, along with confession letters and requests for payment plans to pay back the money, the report said.

The fraud charges carry a maximum 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine. The false claims to FEMA carry a maximum sentence of five years and $250,000 fine.

City Hall Hiring On FBI's Radar In '97 (CHIT)

By Michael Higgins And Todd Lighty, Tribune Staff Reporters

Court hearing reveals interest in hirings

As far back as 1997, federal authorities were investigating the hiring practices in Mayor Richard Daley's administration—obtaining backup tapes from the city's mainframe computer system and questioning a top Daley aide about how some people got their city jobs.

The disclosures of the government's earlier interest in City Hall hiring came Monday during a routine court hearing for Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich, who is under indictment along with three others.

Sorich and his co-defendants were charged in September with rigging city hiring in order to reward the mayor's political allies with government jobs.

Sorich's lawyer, Thomas Anthony Durkin, said FBI agents had interviewed his client in August 1997 as part of the earlier City Hall corruption investigation known as Operation Silver Shovel. Durkin said in court that at the time agents specifically asked Sorich about hiring practices.

Silver Shovel, a 1990s federal investigation that focused on payoffs for illegal dumping, ultimately led to the convictions of six aldermen and 12 others, but Sorich was never accused of any wrongdoing in that probe.

Federal authorities also have computer tapes they obtained as part of the Silver Shovel investigation, Durkin said. He believes the old computer records may contain the same information that the government seized from Sorich's portable laptop computer only last year—a 1997 list of people that Daley's office had recommended for city jobs.

"We consider that ... to be extremely exculpatory," Durkin said. "Something they considered to be a smoking gun in 2005 was in their possession in 1997."

Prosecutors acknowledged Monday that they have 15 backup computer tapes from the city's mainframe computer, but they did not say whether anyone from the government had ever been able to access the information or even looked at it.

"It seems to me either it can be opened or can't be opened," Durkin said. "The question is can you open it and if so, what's on it?"

Assistant U.S. Attorneys Patrick Collins and Barry Miller did not concede that information in the 1997 records would be helpful to the defense. They said they were trying to obtain software needed to read the records.

Miller suggested that as far as prosecutors know, the 1997 records are not the same as those being used in the case against Sorich. He also said the government does not believe information contained on Sorich's personal laptop would be on the mainframe computer tapes.

Jodi Kawada, speaking for the city's Law Department, said reading the tapes requires a program that is no longer in use.

"In 1997, in response to a federal grand jury subpoena, we turned over a computer to the U.S. attorney's office," Kawada said. "We understand that this computer is now relevant to an ongoing criminal investigation by the U.S. attorney's office. For that reason, it would not be appropriate for us to comment on the content of the computer."

The Sorich case currently is scheduled for trial in early May before U.S. District Judge David Coar. But both defense lawyers and prosecutors said that the trial could be postponed, in part, depending on how soon authorities are able to read the tapes.

The hiring scandal broke with a midnight raid on April 30 when federal agents searched the mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs on the fourth floor of City Hall. Authorities say IGA was at the center of a "massive fraud" that spanned 12 years and involved hiring in some of the biggest City Hall departments, including Water Management, Streets and Sanitation and Transportation.

Along with Sorich, a grand jury indicted Timothy McCarthy, who worked in IGA under Sorich, and former Streets and Sanitation officials John Sullivan and Patrick Slattery.

All four were accused of mail fraud. Sullivan also was charged with lying to federal agents investigating the allegations.

A fifth defendant, former Streets and Sanitation official Daniel Katalinic, pleaded guilty and is cooperating with the ongoing investigation. He secretly recorded conversations with Sorich and has admitted leading a pro-Daley political group whose members were rewarded with city jobs and promotions.

Sorich, McCarthy and Slattery are from Daley's native Bridgeport neighborhood and have ties to the Daley family's 11th Ward Democratic Organization.

The indictment also described the involvement of a "co-schemer" in the hiring fraud, identified as former top Daley aide Victor Reyes. Reyes, who has not been charged and denies wrongdoing, directed IGA for five years and is the leader of the Hispanic Democratic Organization, the largest pro-Daley patronage army.

I Must Rebut Campbell Lawyers An Army Of Feds Spent Millions On Probe? Not True (AJC)

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, March 21, 2006

Last week The Atlanta Journal-Constitution published an opinion piece by Michael Coleman, Bill Campbell's attorney and a defense witness in the trial that ended with Campbell's conviction for three felony tax crimes ("End effort to tar, feather Campbell," @issue, March 16).

Like his client, Coleman claims that the government's investigation targeted Campbell, lasted for eight years and cost "millions of dollars in resources and manpower." That is not true.

Following Justice Department policy and court rules, we said little publicly until the Campbell trial was over. But now we may speak more freely and set the record straight.

In truth, the investigation began almost six years after Campbell took office, in late 1999, when we first received multiple, specific allegations of corruption throughout City Hall. Less than five years later, in August 2004, Campbell was indicted. During those five years, we charged and convicted 11 other city officials and contractors, including the chief operating officer, deputy COO and chief administrative officer. Campbell's trial was repeatedly delayed by his motions and other requests.

While Campbell was mayor, we encountered remarkable resistance from the city attorney's office on requests for city documents and interviews with city employees. At one point, the City Council had to pass a resolution directing the city attorney to stop interceding in interviews. The city was the victim of any corruption, and this interference by its lawyers was unprecedented in our long experience in public corruption cases throughout Georgia. It stopped as soon as Mayor Shirley Franklin took office.

Even considering the delays caused by this resistance, our investigation did not involve millions of dollars or a government "army," [the term used by Campbell's lead defense attorney Billy Martin during closing arguments]. In fact, the financial and tax investigation that was key to convicting Campbell and other officials and contractors was conducted almost entirely by one IRS agent, who also worked on unrelated cases.

The "army" from the FBI and U.S. attorney's office consisted of one or two agents and two prosecutors who focused on the overall City Hall investigation. It increased to three prosecutors shortly before Campbell's indictment and to five agents only in the months just before and during his trial. Those prosecutors were also handling other major cases, including the Eric Rudolph bombing case and the Fulton County and Linda Schrenko corruption cases.

This was no "army" wasting taxpayer money. It was a small but talented group of public servants dedicated to finding the truth and bringing lawbreakers to justice. But in essence the mayor's lawyer's argument is that, if someone concocts a criminal scheme that is complicated and difficult to uncover, and obstructs and delays efforts to do so, we should ignore the crimes rather than invest the time and resources needed to bring them to court.

Our goal in this case, and all our cases, is to follow the evidence wherever it leads, and if we uncover substantial evidence of crimes (as we did with Campbell), to present it in court to a jury representing the community. We respect the jury's verdict in the Campbell case, which we expect will soon lead to Campbell's being sent to prison.

I agree with Coleman on two points: Some good things did happen in Atlanta during Campbell's administration, and it is now time to move forward. I can only hope that the exposure of corruption and crime by Campbell and his cronies, and the penalties that they pay, will deter future public officials from undermining the trust of Atlanta residents and the reputation of this great city.

So Hard To Say, 'It's Time To Resign' (PHI)

By Michael Currie Schaffer And John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 21, 2006

Many members of City Council hope Rick Mariano will resign following his federal corruption conviction last week. It's just that they don't want to call on him to step down.

The legislators' semantic two-step came as city solicitor Romulo L. Diaz Jr. issued an opinion confirming that the state ban on felons in elected office won't kick in until Mariano's sentencing, which Judge Lawrence F. Stengel yesterday set for July 6.

Convicted on Friday of 18 counts of fraud, bribery, and money-laundering, Mariano remained in detention yesterday. Stengel cited the suicide scare that followed Mariano's trip to the top of City Hall tower last fall when he ordered the councilman's bail revoked pending a psychiatric exam.

That exam has been scheduled for tomorrow, said Mariano's attorney, Nino V. Tinari.

Tinari said he visited his client at the Federal Detention Center yesterday. He said Mariano had been placed in a cell by himself but was not in a psychiatric ward. Mariano has not yet been allowed to see his wife or sons.

"Rick is doing extremely well," Tinari said after the two-hour visit. "He had the usual concerns: How's the family? How's the office?"

A spokeswoman for the federal Bureau of Prisons, Carla Wilson, said she could not comment on an individual case. But speaking generally, she said new inmates are unlikely to be permitted visitors other than lawyers until they complete the intake process, which can last several days.

Even with Mariano incommunicado, there has been considerable debate over his short-term future.

Minutes after the verdict Friday, Mayor Street issued a statement calling on Mariano to quit.

"We politely but firmly disagree," replied Mariano's chief of staff, Jay McCalla. He said the councilman would continue to attend meetings, propose legislation - and draw his $102,000 annual salary - as long as permitted by law.

Also citing the law, Council President Anna C. Verna said she would not push Mariano one way or the other although, she said, she doubted he would appear in Council even if he was let out on bail.

"It's his decision," she said. "That's the law."

In interviews yesterday, most of her colleagues seemed to agree.

DOJ_NMG_0019708

"I think he should step down, but he's got the right under law to stay on under sentencing," said Councilman Juan Ramos.

"I'm not calling on him. I'm not doing what Mayor Street did," said Councilman James F. Kenney. "If he asked my opinion, I think the best thing for him and everybody is to leave."

"He can stay on and there's nothing we can do," said Councilman Jack Kelly. "But for his own interest, for his family and this Council, it would be better for him to step down. I'm not calling on him to do it. It's just my advice."

Of 14 members interviewed, only one - Councilman Michael Nutter - said he would definitely vote for a resolution asking Mariano to quit. Such a resolution, which would not be binding, has not been introduced.

"Out of respect for City Council as an institution, Councilman Mariano should resign from City Council, given all that has happened," Nutter said. "The citizens of Philadelphia deserve that action from him."

Asked about a resolution, Nutter said: "I would hope that we would not have to go to that point, but if there were a resolution offered, then, yes, I would vote for it."

Several members said they specifically would not ask Mariano to quit, either formally or informally.

"I'll call on him to follow the law," said Donna Reed Miller. Asked if she would feel uncomfortable making laws alongside a felon until Mariano's legally mandated July 6 departure, Miller said: "I work with ex-offenders all the time."

When Mariano does depart Council, it will be put to Verna to decide whether to call a special election or allow the seat to remain vacant until the next general election in 2007.

Citing due-process issues and his desire not to see Council's membership fall to 15, Councilman W. Wilson Goode Jr. said he would "have no problem if Councilman Mariano continues to serve until his sentence."

"I have known Rick Mariano as a colleague for over six years," Goode said. "My opinion of him hasn't changed because of the verdict."

And just what is that opinion?

"No comment," Goode said.

Council Poll: Rick Can Work (PHI)

By Chris Brennan & Mark Mcdonald

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 21, 2006

CITY COUNCILMAN Rick Mariano, convicted Friday on corruption charges, is going to lose his job.

But should he step down before he is forced from office?

A wide majority of his colleagues said "no" yesterday when asked about Mariano's plan to keep attending Council hearings and sessions right up to the end.

Only four Council members - Donna Reed Miller, Michael Nutter, Juan Ramos and Jack Kelly - echoed Mayor Street's call from last week for Mariano to resign immediately.

The rest are content to let state law take its course.

Mariano's post will automatically become vacant and his pay will end when he is sentenced in federal court. That has not been set and could be months away.

For now, the question of Mariano's showing up in City Hall is theoretical, since he is locked up in the Federal Detention Center.

U.S. District Judge Lawrence Stengel revoked Mariano's bail, citing a concern that he might be a danger to himself or others after he was convicted on 18 counts of conspiracy, honest-services fraud, money laundering, bribery and filing a false tax return.

A psychiatric evaluation has been scheduled for tomorrow, and Stengel will hold a hearing to consider its results and Mariano's bail sometime after that.

A poll of Council members by the Daily News found no support for a resolution to call on Mariano to step down now. A resolution would not have the power to force that action if approved.

Council President Anna Verna isn't worried about Mariano's showing up in Council.

"I doubt that he'd come," she said. "I really do. He may go up to his office, but I doubt that he'd come to Council."

But Mariano's chief of staff, Jay McCalla, said that is exactly what the councilman plans to do.

"It is his intention to stay until sentencing, and it is his intention to attend Council sessions," said McCalla, who was glad to hear there was no support for an official call for Mariano to step down. "Coming into a room that's not against him will be helpful."

Councilman Brian O'Neill, the minority leader, said he would offer an opinion if Mariano asked if he should step down. O'Neill doesn't expect that to happen and says any attempt at a resolution would be "grandstanding."

"He's made it pretty clear that he wants to stay on Council's payroll until the end," O'Neill said.

Councilman Frank DiCicco said Council should set a policy to stop paying members when they have been convicted of crimes.

Having a convicted felon in Council is "basically a slap in the face to the citizens of Philadelphia," DiCicco said.

Councilman Jim Kenney said Mariano should step down from committee assignments but he doesn't mind if Mariano continues to collect a city paycheck for now.

"His office should function, and it's a couple of months and he'll be gone," Kenney said. "He's lost everything. He's lost his income and pension and his political infrastructure and his former friends. I can't see where piling on can be helpful to anyone."

The Council members who called on Mariano to step down did so in soft, caring tones.

"I think Rick will make the right decision," Miller said. "I think he's a big man, and he knows... to do the right thing."

Nutter and Ramos also spoke of Mariano doing the right thing.

"This is about the institution," Nutter said. "It's not about any one person. It's an unfortunate situation for him and his family, but Council is bigger than all of us."

Ramos worries that Mariano will face "more and more controversy" by keeping his job.

"For the good of the city and the good of the district, he should make a decision very soon, and that is do the right thing and step down and save his family aggravation," Ramos said. "I am very saddened by it, but nevertheless we need to move on."

Kelly agreed that "it's in the best interests" of Mariano and his family, Council and his district for him to step down now. "However, that's going to be his decision and his decision alone."

Councilwoman Blondell Reynolds Brown and other members cited an opinion from the city solicitor that Mariano can hold his office until sentenced.

"Rick should let his conscience be his guide," Brown added.

Only Councilman Frank Rizzo said he had not decided if Mariano should step down.

Council members Jannie Blackwell, Marian Tasco, Darrell Clarke and W. Wilson Goode Jr. said they had no problem with Mariano keeping his job and coming to work until he is sentenced.

"We know he's a man of no means and I think we can wait that long, 30 to 90 days, and let the process take its course," Blackwell said. "If the law allows him to come and participate, then who are we?"

Why Mariano Pal Changed His Plea (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 21, 2006

A new federal-court filing yesterday offered a broad clue as to why a key figure in the Rick Mariano bribery-and-corruption case abruptly agreed to change his plea to guilty in late February.

On Feb. 28 - the day after businessman Reinaldo Pastrana had his surprising change of heart - FBI and IRS agents raided the office of Pastrana's accountant and seized copies of false tax returns filed on behalf of Pastrana; his mother, Ada, and sister Debbie.

Pastrana is one of five businessmen indicted last October in connection with bribing Mariano, who was convicted by a jury Friday of federal corruption charges. Pastrana initially pleaded not guilty.

Now in state prison for violating parole in connection with a state tax conviction, Pastrana has agreed to enter a guilty plea on Thursday to three counts of bribery.

As part of the plea deal, he also has agreed to sell property he owns on North American Street and to fork over at least $250,000 of the proceeds to the IRS before sentencing, the court filing yesterday by federal prosecutors said.

The feds say the payment will resolve outstanding tax issues related to false tax returns filed for the Pastranas in tax years 2001 through 2004.

Pastrana likely faces a sentence of 30 to 37 months under sentencing guidelines. He also must pay whatever fine is meted out by U.S. District Judge Lawrence F. Stengel when he is sentenced.

Pastrana, 46, is the third businessman to plead guilty in the Mariano corruption case. Two others - Philip and Louis Chartock - have pleaded not guilty and are scheduled to stand trial April 24.

Federal prosecutors alleged that Pastrana, a developer and friend of Mariano's, paid $5,400 for three years of Mariano's membership dues at the swanky Sporting Club at the Bellevue in exchange for Mariano's help with acquiring some city property in 2002.

Pastrana sought Mariano's help to buy the property on North American Street near West Somerset, which he wanted to develop as a shopping center.

The property had been appraised at $400,000, and Pastrana wanted Mariano's help to convince the city to sell the land to his company for $100,000.

Mayor Street signed the bill into law Dec. 3, 2002. Just 16 days later, the feds said, Pastrana paid Mariano's annual Sporting Club membership fee of $1,812.60.

Pastrana paid two more years of Mariano's Sporting Club dues in January 2004 and December 2004.

The sale of the property to Pastrana's company was finalized last March 30.

Eight Former Southwest Employees Charged In Ticket Scheme (SAEN)

By Guillermo Contreras, Express-News Staff Writer

San Antonio Express-News, March 21, 2006

Eight former Southwest Airlines employees have been charged with wire fraud over allegations they stole more than $1 million from the Dallas-based carrier by using used tickets to issue new ones and pocketing some of the proceeds.

Seven of the suspects were in federal custody on Monday. The eighth remained at large.

The scheme lasted from March 2000 through January 2003, and involved "hundreds to thousands" of tickets, according to a 25-count federal indictment and the FBI.

Southwest spokeswoman Brandy King said Southwest has since tightened its controls on the tickets utilized in the scheme. She said no customers were stranded as a result of it.

"This was an instance that took place three years ago," King said. "The employees have not been employees here for a while..... We began that investigation in the fall of 2002, and since that time we've completely revamped our procedures and controls on exchanges."

Special agent Andrea Simmons, a spokeswoman for the FBI in El Paso, said the probe took a while to come to fruition because the case involved "hundreds to thousands of tickets" that needed to be compared.

The fraud scheme involved intercepting used tickets as they flowed through the airline's internal processing, then using the tickets to issue new ones to customers who wished to purchase paper tickets at the counter, the indictment said.

The suspects pocketed a cut from the sales - generally the value of the used, intercepted ticket -- up to almost $230 per transaction, the indictment said.

"They were documenting them as exchanges instead of purchases," King said of the former employees.

Charged with wire-fraud conspiracy are Richard De La Paz Jr., Michelle Christine Torres, Oscar Enrique Ortiz, Melissa Renee Lampton, Denise Nuñez and Barbara Ann Wilson. They were also charged with wire fraud, as were Salena De La Torre and Guillermo Enriquez, the indictment shows. The FBI was still looking for Lampton on Monday.

King pointed out that the case is not related to an investigation in San Antonio of another former employee, Althea Jackson, who is a target of an investigation alleging thousands of "goodwill" tickets were taken from the airline.

"They're different kinds of tickets," King said.

In that case, Jackson is married to former court bailiff James Jackson, who resigned from the Bexar County Sheriff's Office amid the probe. The Jacksons' lawyer has confirmed they are under investigation.

An identitfy-theft task force led by the Secret Service is looking at more than 4,000 tickets, many of which were sold or given to judges, prosecutors, lawyers, current and former bailiffs and other public officials at the Bexar County courthouse. No one has been charged. gcontreras@express-news.net

Ex-Southwest Employees Charged In Scam (AP)

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, March 21, 2006

EL PASO, Texas -- Eight former employees of Southwest Airlines Co. have been charged with wire fraud after allegedly stealing more than $1 million from the company in a scheme involving used tickets.

The workers would issue already-used tickets to customers who paid cash, giving the traveler a ticket that should have been voided in Southwest's systems, according to a federal grand jury indictment, returned last week.

Investigators said the Southwest workers, employed at El Paso International Airport, collected cash on transactions from March 2000 through January 2003.

Brandy King, a spokeswoman for Dallas-based Southwest, said no passengers were stuck with worthless tickets from the scheme. She said the agents recorded cash ticket purchases as exchanges and pocketed the money. Southwest had since changed its controls to prevent similar abuse.

The workers were dismissed in March 2003, King said.

The Associated Press was unable to reach the former workers, and court records did not list attorneys for them.

Six of the defendants also face conspiracy charges. If convicted, all face at least five years in federal prison and a fine of up to $250,000 for each count.

The case took years to reach a grand jury because "hundreds to thousands of tickets" had to be compared to detect the fraud, an FBI spokeswoman in El Paso, Andrea Simmons, told the San Antonio Express-News for a story Monday.

Prison Term For Developer Who Defrauded Investors (SFC)

By Henry K. Lee, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, March 18, 2006

S.F. man ordered to pay $17.4 million in restitution as well

A San Francisco real estate developer will spend eight years in prison and pay more than $17 million in restitution and fines for defrauding more than 700 investors, a judge has ruled.

U.S. District Judge William Alsup sentenced John A. Hickey, 49, on Thursday to 97 months in prison and ordered him to pay a $15,000 fine and $17.4 million in restitution. The judge told Hickey to begin serving his sentence July 7.

Hickey was convicted by a federal jury in November on two counts of securities fraud and eight counts of mail fraud after a three-week trial in U.S. District Court in San Francisco.

Hickey declined to discuss the case Friday. His attorney, David Cohen of San Francisco, said the conviction was "unwarranted" and that his client will "vigorously pursue his appeal."

Federal prosecutors said Hickey raised about $20 million from 724 investors through his company, Continental Capital Financial Group, by offering shares in two limited partnerships. The partnerships were created to develop real estate in Napa and Sonoma, among other locations.

Hickey lied about his net worth, the properties that would be developed by the partnerships and the use of the funds raised from the investors. In September 1994, a court-appointed receiver took over Continental Capital and the limited partnerships.

The investors lost most of their money. "As a result, many of the investors have suffered significant non-monetary harms, such as anger, anxiety, fear, guilt, grief, nightmares, depression, sleeplessness and mistrust of others," Assistant U.S. Attorney Christopher Steskal wrote in court papers. Steskal had urged the judge to sentence Hickey to more than 12 years in prison because of "multiple lies."

"The defendant lied to everyone involved in the investments, including the accountant, the lawyers, the appraiser, the sale representatives, the broker/dealers and (finally) the investors," Steskal wrote, adding that Hickey had many chances to tell the truth, "but at every turn, he chose to lie. And he lied for the most crass of reasons: greed."

"Over 700 investors, a number of them retirees, were defrauded by this scheme," Kevin Ryan, U.S. attorney in San Francisco, said in a statement. "Significant sentences send a strong message to those who would consider committing securities fraud."

A federal grand jury in San Francisco indicted Hickey and his business partner, Mamie Tang, in 1997. Tang is serving a five-year sentence imposed in March 2003 after she pleaded guilty to mail fraud in the same scheme.

Tang failed to tell potential investors that some of the properties she claimed to own had already been lost in foreclosure, authorities said.

The Securities and Exchange Commission filed a civil suit against both Hickey and Tang in 1994 for violations of federal security laws. The SEC ordered him to pay $1.3 million, but he failed to make payments, court records show. He ultimately paid the money in full.

St. Mary's Co. Man Sentenced In Child Porn Case (BSUN)

By A Sun Reporter

A 33-year-old St. Mary's County man was sentenced today in federal court to six years in prison for transmitting child pornography files over the Internet, the U.S. attorney's office said.

Joshua M. Marsh of Great Mills was also ordered to register as a sex offender and forfeit the computer equipment that authorities seized at his home. He will also be forbidden from accessing the Internet during his three years of supervised release after his prison sentence.

Marsh pleaded guilty to the charges Oct. 31. According to a statement of facts at the plea, Marsh admitted to allowing users to download child pornography from his personal computer, as well as to facilitating the transmission of pornographic files between users.

When the FBI conducted a search warrant in 2004, they found more than 1,000 files of child pornography on Marsh's computer.

United Press International, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 20 (UPI) -- A senior Defense Department employee managing the Pentagon's transition to a new Internet system was arrested for child pornography, DOD announced last week.

Charles Lamont Lynch, 44, of Clifton, Virginia, was operating a peer-to-peer file sharing program on his comuter at the Defense Information Systems Agency, according to the United States Attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia.

FBI Agents on March 8 seized a computer and more than 1,000 CD-Rom disks during a search of Lynch's office. Child pornography was found in computer file folders titled "Young," according to the Justice Department.

Lynch is now on leave without pay while his case is pending in court. If convicted, he could spend up to 10 years in jail.

Lynch was the chief of the Internet Protocol Version 6 (Ipv6) Transition Office. He was managing the Defense Department's transition to the new Internet address system, which will dramatically expand the number of IP addresses available globally.

The current 32-bit Ipv4 address system allows for only 4.3 billion discreet Internet addresses worldwide. As the population grows and as populous Asian countries move more into the online world, more addresses are needed. Expanding that address line to 128 bits dramatically increases the number of available Internet addresses to 3.4 X 10 to the 38th power. China, India and Japan are investing heavily in Ipv6 technology.

IP addresses are the digits that correspond to e-mail address or web site names, which are simply a human-friendly mnemonic device for the multi-digit numerical addresses.

The relatively limited number of IP addresses under the current Ipv4 means many large organizations -- particularly governments -- use single network addresses for all their traffic, and then routes them to sub-addresses within the organization, a process that can slow the delivery of e-mail messages or the speed of connection.

During the multi-year transition, DISA and other organizations will have to ensure that computers running with Ipv6 addresses can communicate with computers running Ipv4 addresses.

Ex-East St. Louis Police Chief Sentenced (AP)

By JIM SUHR, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 21, 2006

EAST ST. LOUIS, Ill. (AP) - The city's former police chief was sentenced Monday to more than two years in federal prison for attempting to shield a politically connected businessman from a criminal probe.

Ronald Matthews, 56, had faced up to five years behind bars for conspiracy to obstruct justice, attempted obstruction of justice and perjury before a grand jury. He was convicted Dec. 21.

Matthews professed his innocence and said he would appeal. But he also told the judge he preferred to begin his prison term immediately.

``I'd rather just go ahead and be done with it," he said. Federal marshals obliged and led him away.

The case stems from a traffic stop during which Ayoub ``Dave" Qattoum, an auxiliary policeman and businessman, was found with a .38-caliber handgun. Under federal law, Qattoum was not entitled to have a gun as a convicted felon.

Prosecutors described Qattoum as well-connected, quick to give loans or kickbacks to local elected officials to curry favor as the owner of a convenience store.

Authorities accused Matthews of commandeering the local investigation of Qattoum's arrest after the Jordanian national expressed fear that U.S. immigration officials had learned of his legal troubles and might deport him.

Prosecutors also alleged Matthews refused to submit the case to local prosecutors for review, and hid from grand jurors and immigration officials the gun seized from Qattoum, falsely claiming the weapon was lost or stolen. Matthews resigned after being indicted in 2005.

Qattoum, 41, was sentenced in August to more than a year in prison. He faces deportation after serving his sentence.

Former Police Chief Sentenced For Obstruction (BVND)

By George Pawlaczyk

The Belleville News Democrat, March 21, 2006

Former East St. Louis Police Chief Ron Matthews was sentenced Monday to 33 months in prison by a federal judge, who said his "exemplary" record deserved leniency.

U.S. District Judge G. Patrick Murphy said he would "bet my children's trust fund" that Matthews would never again commit another crime.

Matthews was sentenced on his three convictions for obstruction of justice regarding a scheme to dispose of an illegal pistol once possessed by an auxiliary police officer who was a convicted felon. Matthews denied his guilt and blamed others for getting him ensnared in the scheme.

Although Murphy offered him the opportunity to remain free until being ordered to report to prison, Matthews opted to be taken immediately into custody.

Two federal marshals asked him to remove any personal items, including a driver's license and a comb, which he gave to family members, and then he was escorted into a backroom.

Illegal Alien Pleads Guilty To Hit Man Plot (WT)

By Gary Emerling

The Washington Times, March 21, 2006

An illegal alien from Guatemala pleaded guilty in federal court yesterday to charges that he tried to arrange the killing of a D.C. jail inmate last year.

DOJ_NMG_0019714

Victor Moscoso Espana, 20, of Hyattsville, admitted in D.C. District Court that he attempted to have inmate Alvaro Garcia-Hernandez -- a fellow Guatemalan in jail on drug charges -- killed for $15,000, which would have been paid in monthly installments.

According to court documents, Moscoso tried to arrange the hit because he "did not like" Garcia-Hernandez and wanted to "take over" his drug sources and "make money."

Agents with the federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) began investigating Moscoso in September after receiving information about a conspiracy to import cocaine and heroin from Guatemala through various U.S. entry points, including Washington Dulles International Airport.

Court documents show that the hit man plot began when Moscoso arranged to meet another person -- who was cooperating with investigating agents -- at a Hess gasoline station in the 1900 block of New Jersey Avenue Northwest in October.

The two discussed having Garcia-Hernandez killed, and Moscoso gave the witness visiting days for Garcia-Hernandez, as well as his jail identification number.

When the two met in Hyattsville Oct. 18, Moscoso agreed to pay the $15,000 in installments.

When the two met again three days later, agents recorded their discussion and Moscoso gave the witness a down payment of $100 for the killing. Moscoso was arrested the next day.

Moscoso faces up to 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine when he is scheduled to be sentenced June 16.

After serving his time, Moscoso will be turned over to ICE and placed in removal proceedings.

"He may very well go from the jail to his country, because he's not here legally," ICE spokeswoman Ernestine Fobbs said. "I see no reason why he shouldn't be [deported]."

Court documents show that Garcia-Hernandez was sentenced Oct. 11 to 37 months in prison for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute.

The documents also show that Garcia-Hernandez came to the U.S. in 1994 from Guatemala, received a work permit from Immigration and Naturalization Service and worked as a roofer and a mechanic.

AP, March 21, 2006

The Supreme Court refused Monday to give Jonathan Pollard, now serving a life sentence for spying for Israel, access to records that could bolster his case for a presidential clemency.

Pollard's lawyers wanted the justices to reopen his case, so that they could pursue secret documents the government submitted to the judge who sentenced Pollard in 1987.

Pollard sold military secrets to Israel while he worked at the Defense Department's Pentagon headquarters. He was arrested in 1985 and pleaded guilty. The Supreme Court had already refused to let the former Navy intelligence analyst withdraw the guilty plea.

The latest Supreme Court case was not about spying, but about government authority to keep records used in court sealed from the public.

A federal appeals court said last summer that it had no authority to review requests for the documents which Pollard contends will help his bid for presidential clemency.

One of his attorneys, Eliot Lauer, told justices in a filing that the Justice Department, which opposes clemency, has been "given the unfettered power to decide who may or may not have access to those docket materials."

"The DOJ is not neutral and is not an arm of the judiciary," Lauer wrote in the appeal.

Pollard's case has been a sticking point in U.S.-Israeli relations. The Israeli government granted Pollard citizenship and repeatedly has pressed for his release.

The case is Pollard v. United States of America, 05-1013.

Justices Weigh In On Use Of Tapes And Transcripts (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 20 — A crime victim's emergency call to 911, when introduced in court, can provide powerful evidence of the attacker's identity and the circumstances of the crime.

Perhaps too powerful — or so most Supreme Court justices seemed to conclude during an argument Monday on whether the prosecution could use such evidence without violating defendants' constitutional rights to face their accusers in the courtroom.

The constitutional problem arises when the victim fails to appear in court and is therefore not available for cross-examination.

In domestic violence cases, the scenario is common; in one study cited to the Supreme Court, as many as 90 percent of victims of domestic violence fail to cooperate with the prosecution because of fear of or misplaced loyalty to their abusive partners.

Rather than abandon such cases, a growing number of states have begun to relax their evidentiary rules and permit juries to hear 911 tapes or read transcripts of police interviews with victims.

Two years ago, however, the Supreme Court issued an unmistakable warning that these efforts were likely to collide with the Sixth Amendment's Confrontation Clause, which guarantees to a criminal defendant the right "to be confronted with the witnesses against him."

In Crawford v. Washington, the court laid down a new rule: a "testimonial" statement made out of court cannot be used at trial unless the person who made the statement is available for cross-examination.

Now the question is whether the justices meant what they said, even in situations with strong policy arguments for bending the rules. Based on their responses in the courtroom on Monday, they did.

The Crawford case barred the admission of a woman's tape-recorded eyewitness account of a fight in which her husband stabbed another man. But the court stopped short of defining the various types of "testimonial" statements to which the newly empowered Confrontation Clause would now apply. Defense lawyers around the country soon began to argue that the decision should bar the admission of 911 calls and of statements given to police officers who respond to a crime scene.

Two cases were argued to the court on Monday, one of each type. Both have drawn wide attention from organizations concerned with domestic violence. In Davis v. Washington, No. 05-5224, the Washington Supreme Court rejected a defense argument that a 911 call from a woman who said her former boyfriend had violated a no-contact order and was beating her constituted a testimonial.

The incident took place, and the man, Adrian M. Davis, was convicted, before the Crawford decision. The victim, Michelle McCottry, was subpoenaed but failed to appear in court.

After the Crawford decision, Mr. Davis's lawyers argued on appeal that the admission of the 911 tape violated his right to confrontation, but the Washington Supreme Court said the call was not testimonial. It was, the court said, a request for "help to be rescued from peril."

In the second case, Hammon v. Indiana, No. 05-5705, the Indiana Supreme Court likewise upheld a conviction for domestic battery, ruling that a wife's statement to the police officer who arrived to investigate a report of a disturbance could be used as evidence against her husband, Herschel Hammon. The wife, Amy Hammon, failed to appear in court. Her statement to the investigating officer was not testimonial, the Indiana court ruled, because her "motivation was to convey basic facts" rather than provide evidence for later use at trial.

In the Supreme Court on Monday, Jeffrey L. Fisher, representing the defendant in the 911 case, said that during the call, Ms. McCottry "knowingly told a government agent associated with law enforcement that someone had committed a crime." That made the call clearly testimonial, as was "any accusatory statement to a law enforcement agent," he said.

Mr. Fisher, a Seattle lawyer who successfully argued the Crawford case, said the purpose of the Confrontation Clause was "to bring the accuser and accused face to face and require the accuser to deliver the accusation in court."

But the 911 call was "not just a call," Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg objected. It was also "a cry for help." Was it not a "practical reality," she asked Mr. Fisher, "that many women in this situation are scared to death?" She added, "Your neat legal categories don't conform to real lives."

Mr. Fisher responded carefully. "I don't mean to be insensitive," he said. He offered a solution: under a rule known as the "forfeiture doctrine," he observed, a defendant who intimidated a witness lost the right to object to the use of that witness's out-of-court statements.

The other justices undoubtedly took his point, a reminder that he was the author of the Crawford decision, and that he had persuaded six of his colleagues in that case, including Justice Ginsburg, that the Confrontation Clause should be interpreted literally.

As Justice Scalia made clear on Monday when the prosecution's turn came to argue, he was not about to advocate its suspension under these or any other circumstances.

When James M. Whisman, Seattle's senior deputy prosecuting attorney, described 911 calls as "powerful evidence" that should be regarded as constitutionally permissible, Justice Scalia responded, "You know, 'powerful' is part of the problem." He said that "the voice on the phone makes it an even more damaging violation if it is impermissible."

Mr. Whisman was joined on the state's side of the argument by Michael R. Dreeben, a deputy solicitor general, who said that a "panic-stricken call for help" had "unique probative value" and did not present the risk of government abuse that the framers had in mind when they added the Confrontation Clause to the Constitution. The risk was that the government could manipulate a witness behind closed doors, Mr. Whisman said.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy asked whether a 911 call reporting that "he beat me two minutes ago and now he's running down the block" would qualify as a nontestimonial emergency report under Mr. Dreeben's analysis.

Yes, Mr. Dreeben replied, because the attacker might return and the caller still faced an "imminent threat."

Suppose, Justice Kennedy asked, that the call was "he's taken my diamond necklace and is running down the block."

"That would not be an emergency threat under our rule," Mr. Dreeben said.

Mr. Friedman, a professor at the University of Michigan Law School who is an acknowledged expert on the Confrontation Clause, declared that "there is no domestic-violence exception for confrontation rights."

If the court made it clear that prosecutors could not use out-of-court statements, he said, states would have an incentive to protect victims of domestic violence and make them feel safe enough to testify.

"I don't know why that necessarily follows," Justice Ginsburg said. "It wasn't so long ago that police didn't bother with these cases."

Mr. Friedman responded, "I think we now recognize how serious a crime domestic violence is."

Tobacco Award Is Upheld

WASHINGTON, March 20 (AP) — The Supreme Court refused Monday to consider tossing out a $50 million damage award to the family of a two-pack-a-day smoker who died of cancer.

Philip Morris USA, which controls about half the American cigarette market, had asked the justices to declare the award unconstitutionally excessive and to rule that the company should have been shielded from some of the smoker's claims. The court declined without comment.

The smoker, Richard Boeken, was 57 when he died in 2002, a year after a California jury found Philip Morris guilty of negligence, misrepresentation, fraud and selling a defective product.

The court also refused to consider an appeal from a former Arkansas governor who wanted to withdraw his 1998 guilty plea to tax conspiracy. It was the last remaining appeal in the Whitewater case.

The tax case involving the ex-governor, Jim Guy Tucker, arose during the investigation of Bill Clinton and Hillary Rodham Clinton. An independent counsel spent more than six years investigating the business dealings of the Clintons. In all, 14 people were convicted. Mr. Tucker resigned in 1996 after pleading guilty.

In bringing an appeal to the Supreme Court, Mr. Tucker's lawyer, Jeffrey M. Rosenzweig, said that an appeals court had wrongly denied his client a new hearing on whether his plea was voluntary.

The justices did not comment in refusing to hear the appeal.

Court Debates Use Of Victims' Statements As Evidence (LAT)

By David G. Savage

WASHINGTON — Eight of the nine Supreme Court justices — all but Ruth Bader Ginsburg — sounded today as though they would vote to bar prosecutors from using in court the words of crime victims who spoke to authorities but refused to testify.

Such a ruling would greatly strengthen the constitutional rights of defendants to "be confronted with the witnesses against" them. It would be a major setback for prosecutions in domestic violence and sexual assault cases because frightened victims often refuse to testify against their abusers.

Two years ago, the high court ruled that crime witnesses' sworn statements at a police station could not be used at trial against defendants if the witnesses did not appear in court to be cross-examined.

The court debated today whether to extend that ruling to cover emergency calls to a 911 operator and a victim's statements at a crime scene. The justices heard the appeals of two men who were convicted not on the court testimony of their accusers but on their own words as recorded by a 911 operator and a police officer at the scene.

"The practical reality is many women are scared to death" to testify against a spouse or partner who abuses them, said Ginsburg, the only woman on the court. In other instances, "they are so desperate financially" that they decide against testifying, she said.

She questioned whether the Constitution should be interpreted as barring prosecutors from using their calls to a 911 line. "This is not just a call. It is a cry for help," Ginsburg said.

Justice Antonin Scalia countered that the use of such statements in place of a witness' testimony in court violated the principle set forth in the 6th Amendment.

"I think the founders believed in a system where the accused had a right to confront his accusers in court," Scalia said. "I can't see why it makes any sense" to allow a taped 911 call to replace a witness' testimony, he said, because defendants then lose the right to contest the statements of their accusers.

In their questions and comments, most of the justices sounded as though they leaned toward Scalia's view. Several said they did not see how they could make a special exception for emergency calls where domestic violence was at issue.

In the first case, Adrian Davis was convicted of violating a restraining order based on an ex-girlfriend's call to a 911 operator near Seattle. She failed to appear at the trial, but the prosecutor played the 911 tape to the jury.

In the second, Hershel Hammon was convicted of domestic battery of his wife Amy based on her initial statement to a police officer who came to their house. She did not testify.

Their lawyers argued that "accusatory statements" to authorities should be barred from trial unless the witness testified. Prosecutors said "emergency" statements to authorities should be allowed, even if the witness did not testify.

Regardless of what the court decides, police officers will remain free to testify about what they see at a crime scene. For example, if police officers observe an apparent crime victim who has been bruised or bloodied, they can testify as a witness to what they have seen.

The justices will vote privately this week on the cases of Davis vs. Washington and Hammon vs. Indiana and issue a ruling by the end of June.

Justices Weigh If Accusers Must Testify In Court (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

Michelle McCottry and Amy Hammon were both alleged victims of domestic violence. McCottry called 911 to report a beating that her boyfriend had just administered; Hammon gave an account of a fresh attack by her husband to police who came to her home.

McCottry and Hammon did not testify at the men's trials; the state won convictions anyway, based in part on the women's previous statements.

But did those convictions violate the Constitution, which guarantees a defendant the right to confront his accuser in court?

That was the question before the Supreme Court yesterday, as the justices heard oral arguments in two of the most significant criminal cases of this term.

At stake are the rules of evidence that will govern not only many domestic violence prosecutions but also any criminal case in which prosecutors seek to introduce past accusations by people who, whether out of fear or any other reason, cannot or will not repeat their charges in open court.

On one side are McCottry's boyfriend, Adrian Davis of Washington state, and Hammon's husband, Hershel Hammon of Indiana, who say that the Sixth Amendment requires the state to bring its witnesses to court, put them under oath and allow them to be cross-examined. They are supported by briefs from the American Civil Liberties Union, the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers and the D.C. Public Defender Service.

On the other side are the states of Indiana and Washington, supported by the Bush administration, 27 other states including Maryland, the National Network to End Domestic Violence and the National District Attorneys Association. Though their arguments vary in emphasis, these parties agree that statements made in the moments surrounding a criminal attack are not testimony and therefore are not covered by the Sixth Amendment.

The cases arise largely because the Supreme Court changed its rules in a 2004 decision. In an opinion written by Justice Antonin Scalia, it barred a statement to police by a wife who would not testify against her husband regarding an alleged assault on a third person. The Sixth Amendment was intended to keep out any previous testimony from a witness unavailable to testify, the court ruled, unless that witness had previously been subject to cross-examination.

Before that, the court had said that an unavailable witness's out-of-court statement could be admissible if a judge found that it fell into one of the exceptions to the rule against hearsay or was otherwise clearly trustworthy.

Yet federal and state courts have struggled to apply Scalia's ruling in practice, and the court agreed to hear the Washington and Indiana cases to clarify its scope.

The 2004 ruling enjoyed the support of the entire court except Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who are no longer sitting.

Still, during the course of an intense two-hour discussion of the two cases, Davis v. Washington , No. 05-5224, and Hammon v. Indiana , No. 05-5705, at least some of the justices seemed concerned about how far to extend the new rule.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, in particular, seemed worried about the implications for other cases in which women tell police about abuse but then are reluctant to risk a court appearance.

"The practical reality is that many women are scared to death of what will happen to them," she told Davis's attorney, Jeffrey L. Fisher. "So neat legal categories don't really fit the realities of this situation."

Ginsburg repeatedly suggested that the court consider a rule proposed by the Bush administration: that statements made to authorities during "emergencies" be admissible.

But Fisher replied that although he did not want to appear "insensitive," the "Sixth Amendment applies across the board."

The court's newest member, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., a former prosecutor, also seemed to lean in favor of the states. He asked lawyers for the defendants questions that implied they were asking for too broad a rule.

"If someone calls and says 'I just saw a blue Toyota with Ohio plates do a hit-and-run,' is that testimony?" he asked at one point.

"Yes," replied Hammon's lawyer, Richard D. Friedman.

But Scalia noted that "it seems to me that there are better ways to solve the problem than to design our whole confrontation-clause jurisprudence based on what happens in spousal abuse cases." The confrontation clause is the part of the Sixth Amendment that guarantees the defendant's right "to be confronted with the witnesses against him."

Decisions in the two cases are expected by July.

Supreme Court Justices Debate Admissibility Of Statements To 911 Operators (AP)

By Toni Locy, The Associated Press

The Supreme Court considered Monday whether statements made by victims to 911 operators and police officers at crime scenes should be barred as evidence because they were not made under oath or subjected to cross-examination by a defendant.

In cases from Washington and Indiana, the justices focused on whether the rights of Adrian Davis and Hershel Hammon were violated because their accusers did not testify at their trials.

The issue is significant because the high court's ruling could affect the ability of prosecutors to bring criminal charges -- particularly in domestic violence cases -- when victims or key witnesses are not willing or not available to testify.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg pointed out that "many women in these situations are scared to death" and don't want to testify.

Ginsburg also recalled that "it wasn't so long ago" that police wouldn't bother trying to gather evidence to prosecute cases of domestic abuse.

She worried aloud that if the justices issue a ruling that police consider more trouble than their efforts are worth, officers might wonder why they should bother pursuing domestic violence cases.

Lawyers on all sides of the cases -- as well as the Bush administration -- want the justices to clarify a 2004 decision that barred prosecutors' use of statements from victims or witnesses if a defendant did not have a chance to question them in court.

Scalia worried about what would happen to defendants who were charged with crimes based on "false" statements from witnesses who never testified. And he wondered whether 911 operators, by asking so many questions of victims, aren't being used by police as "a prosecutorial device."

James M. Whisman, senior prosecuting attorney in Seattle, conceded the 911 tape was "powerful" evidence of the abuse victim Michelle McCottry said she endured at Davis' hands.

"Powerful is part of the problem," Scalia said. "To hear her voice on the phone ... it makes it an even more damaging violation" of the defendant's right to confront his accuser.

At Davis' trial, a judge allowed the tape of McCottry's February 2001 emergency call to be admitted into evidence but barred police testimony about what McCottry had said to officers. She disappeared before trial and did not testify despite a subpoena.

In the other case out of Peru, Ind., Amy Hammon also did not testify. But a judge allowed a police officer to testify that she had told him that her husband, Hershel, had thrown her into the glass panel of a gas heater.

Chief Justice John Roberts appeared to give prosecutors and police the benefit of the doubt in both cases.

Roberts was skeptical when Davis' lawyer suggested that prosecutors, armed with powerful 911 tapes, might keep "bad" witnesses off the stand to win their cases.

And the chief justice said police officers have mixed motives in trying to protect victims and build criminal cases.

Jeffrey L. Fisher, who represents Davis, told the justices it's not always easy to determine when police officers stop protecting victims and when they begin gathering evidence to support criminal charges.

Ex-Philippine Leader Say U.S. Bugged Phone (NSDY/AP)

By Jim Gomez, Associated Press Writer

MANILA, Philippines -- Former President Joseph Estrada said Tuesday he has been notified by an American court that U.S. authorities bugged his telephone conversations with an FBI analyst accused of revealing U.S. government secrets.

The New Jersey court indicated it had authorized the wiretapping as part of an investigation into Leandro Aragoncillo last year, Estrada said, adding that there was no suggestion he was under investigation.

Estrada, who was toppled by a popular revolt in 2001, previously acknowledged receiving American government assessments of Philippine political events from Aragoncillo, a 21-year Marine veteran who became an FBI intelligence analyst in 2004.

"The notice said that my telephone calls with Aragoncillo were wiretapped," Estrada told The Associated Press in a telephone interview. "The wiretapping was authorized by the court."

Aragoncillo was arrested in the United States last year. He has been charged with conspiring to reveal government secrets, acting as a foreign agent and improperly using FBI computers. Those charges carry a maximum sentence of 25 years.

He has not been charged with espionage, which carries a maximum penalty of capital punishment.

Michael Drewniak, spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Newark, N.J., has refused to comment on the alleged wiretapping, which was first reported by the Philippine Daily Inquirer, citing government sources.

"Even if that were so, I would not comment on it," Drewniak said last week.

Estrada is under house arrest while on trial for corruption charges.

He has acknowledged speaking by phone with Aragoncillo and receiving U.S. government documents on the political situation in the Philippines. But he has played down their value, saying the assessments were similar to those being reported by Philippine newspapers.

Asked about the wiretapping, Estrada said: "My reaction is nothing, because even before this, I have admitted that I've talked with him ... (and) that those details were nothing more than newspaper accounts of what's happening in the country."

Estrada has insisted that Aragoncillo passed on information to the Philippines not in exchange for money but out of his concern for his impoverished homeland.

Aragoncillo became a naturalized U.S. citizen in 1991. He worked at the White House on the security detail for vice presidents Al Gore and Dick Cheney in 1999-2002 before joining the FBI as a civilian intelligence analyst at Fort Monmouth, N.J.

Estrada said he met Aragoncillo when he visited the United States while he was still president and was introduced to him and other White House staffers of Filipino descent. Their friendship blossomed, with Aragoncillo visiting him at the Malacanang presidential palace and in a hospital where Estrada was once confined.

Washington has invoked its Mutual Legal Assistance Treaty with Manila to get files on a number of Filipinos who might have received information from him, a Philippine investigator has said.

Civil Trial In Sex Assault Likely To Be Ugly (LAT)

By Christopher Goffard, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 21, 2006

The suit over the O.C. attack targets the three guilty men, the father of one, two investigators and a lawyer who vows victim will 'rue the day.'

Now that a judge has imposed a prison term on the attackers, the sordid, painful four-year-long case involving Gregory Haidl and two co-defendants — and the woman who says they destroyed her — shifts to the civil courtroom, which may prove the ugliest show yet.

The victim, now 20 and known publicly as Jane Doe, has sued the three young men convicted of sexually assaulting her while a video camera rolled and she lay unconscious on a pool table one July night in 2002. And she is suing Haidl's father, a rich former Orange County assistant sheriff, alleging that he should have known of the drug- and alcohol-fueled parties raging in his Corona del Mar home, where the attack occurred.

But, as part of her $26-million lawsuit, Jane Doe is also targeting others who, she says, subjected her to years of "harassment, intimidation and torture" after the attack itself.

In a rare legal move, her suit names Haidl defense attorney Joseph G. Cavallo and two defense investigators, John Warren and Shawn Smigel. She says the defense staked out her Rancho Cucamonga house, went through her trash, stalked her, improperly obtained her medical records, broadcast her identity and once cornered her in a parking lot while snapping pictures.

"We're taking these people to task about what they did," said Jane Doe's attorney, Sheldon Lodmer. "They crossed the line in terms of appropriate legal defense."

Cavallo said he did nothing improper in trying to defend a client who could have faced life in prison, and characterized the lawsuit as "revenge" for his zealous representation.

DOJ_NMG_0019721

"If they think what I did in the criminal case was aggressive, they're attacking me personally now," Cavallo said. "By the time I get done with Jane Doe, the case won't be worth $10. I know more about Jane Doe than her lawyer and her family."

During the criminal trial, Cavallo and other defense attorneys cast her as a would-be porn star who merely faked unconsciousness on the tape, cross-examining her relentlessly and underscoring her earlier sexual behavior. Cavallo, planning to represent himself in the civil trial, said he would question her even more thoroughly, unencumbered by the rape shield law that limits inquiry into her past during a criminal trial.

"Only 10 to 20% of what we had on Jane Doe and her family came out during the criminal case," Cavallo said. "They're going to rue the day they brought me into this case."

Doe's attorney, Lodmer, said he anticipated that Cavallo would attack his client.

"I'm sure he will use this opportunity, and she's ready to stand up to it," Lodmer said. "He can try and do what he wants. He made life miserable for everyone else in this case."

Jane Doe was 16 at the time of the attack, and the three defendants — Haidl, Kyle Nachreiner and Keith Spann — all 17. The videotape, with Haidl running the camera, depicts the boys violating her limp body with a host of objects, including a pool cue, a lighted cigarette and a Snapple bottle. The first trial ended in a deadlock, with jurors leaning toward acquittal. A second jury convicted them of sexual assault, but not rape, and on March 10 a Superior Court Judge sentenced them all to six-year prison terms.

During the sentencing hearing, Jane Doe spoke in detail about how the attack, and its aftermath, caused her life to unravel.

"Before July 5, 2002, I was a normal 16-year-old teenager," she said. "I was outgoing, cheerful, loving, compassionate and trusting." She said she was a straight-A student who was on her high school's volleyball, track and cross-country teams and added she had "an extremely close relationship with my parents."

She said she found out about the attack, which she did not remember, after Newport Beach police informed her father. After Haidl and his co-defendants were arrested, fliers materialized in Jane Doe's neighborhood identifying her as the accuser. She said she fled to another high school, seeking anonymity but said defense investigators tracked her there, stood in the parking lot and screamed out her name.

Now, she said, she possessed "very little self-esteem and I trust no one." Ultimately, according to her lawyer, the trauma of the case drove her to methamphetamine abuse.

The defense has sharply disputed her depiction of the attack's effect on her life, saying she had serious emotional problems long before that summer night in 2002 and a strained relationship with her parents, who viewed her as an "out of control" teenager who left the house without saying where she was going and stayed out all night.

Jane Doe "has been unaffected to a substantial degree as a result of that evening," Cavallo said.

Cavallo said defense investigators did not scream out Jane Doe's name at her new school, as alleged. "Everyone knew who Jane Doe was anyway," Cavallo said. He said investigators were forced to stake out her parents to serve them with court subpoenas.

William Kopeny, an attorney working for Cavallo, said his client's behavior was protected under the doctrine of "litigation privilege," which holds that a lawyer's actions in connection with a court case cannot form the basis of a lawsuit.

"It's a very wide-ranging privilege," Kopeny said.

The criminal convictions of Haidl, Nachreiner and Spann provide a built-in advantage for Jane Doe in the civil arena, at least in the case against them. In civil court, plaintiffs must prove their case by a "preponderance of the evidence," a much lighter burden than the "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard already met in the criminal case.

"The case against the three defendants who were convicted should not be too difficult," said Lodmer, adding that he expected depositions in the case to begin in the next two months. He acknowledged that the case against Cavallo involved far less trodden legal terrain.

"We're not suing [Cavallo] for anything he did or said inside that courtroom," Lodmer said. "We're suing him for what he authorized outside that courtroom."

States Allow Deadly Self-defense (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0019722

By Richard Willing

A year after Florida became the first state to allow citizens to use deadly force against muggers, carjackers and other attackers, the idea is spreading. South Dakota has enacted a similar law, Indiana Gov. Mitch Daniels plans to sign such a measure today, and 15 other states are considering such proposals.

Dubbed "Stand Your Ground" bills by supporters such as the National Rifle Association, the measures generally grant immunity from prosecution and lawsuits to those who use deadly force to combat any unlawful entry or attack. Several states allow people to use deadly force in their homes against intruders; the new measures represent an expansion of self-defense rights to crimes committed in public.

The NRA and other supporters say the bills are needed in many states that require people under attack in public places to withdraw from the situation, rather than retaliate, unless they can show their lives are in danger. "For someone attacked by criminals to be victimized a second time by a second-guessing legal system is wrong," the NRA's Wayne LaPierre says.

Critics, including the Brady Campaign To Prevent Gun Violence, say the bills encourage vigilantism and would make it more likely that confrontations would turn deadly. Zach Ragbourn of the Brady group says the proposals "are more accurately called 'Shoot First' laws. They allow a person who just feels something bad is going to happen to open fire in public."

The idea that people should use deadly force only to defend their lives is rooted in English common law, author Richard Maxwell Brown says in No Duty To Retreat: Violence and Values in American History and Society. Another common law principle, the "duty to retreat," requires people to avoid potentially deadly confrontations. The principles apply in most states. The duty to retreat generally doesn't apply in a person's home.

LaPierre says the NRA is targeting 29 duty-to-retreat states where people can be prosecuted, sued or both if they don't retreat from criminal attacks.

Ragbourn says the proposals aim to "fix a system that isn't broken. People aren't being thrown into jail for legitimate self-defense. There's no crisis here."

Florida's law could be facing its first test. Donald Montanez, owner of a Tampa towing company, is charged with murder in the shooting of a man whose car was impounded. Prosecutors say Montanez fired as the man drove off without paying a fee. Montanez's attorney, Roger Rigau, says the new law should protect Montanez, who feared being hit by the driver.

CIVIL LAW:

Google's Half Victory (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

Google won a partial victory against the Justice Department late Friday night when a federal judge ruled that the company would not be compelled to hand over a sample of users' search queries.

As Judge James Ware noted in his 21-page opinion, search strings like "Jessica Simpson" or "nudity" would not, by themselves, impinge on users' privacy. But a random sampling of searches could well pull up less generic queries. To borrow the judge's example, "[user name] third trimester abortion san jose" might well raise privacy concerns -- not to mention the embarrassment from the publication of the "vanity searches" that Google users have been known to perform, every half hour or so, on themselves.

Judge Ware did grant Justice's request for a random sampling of 50,000 of the sites Google indexes for its searches, so both sides ended up with something. But as the judge also noted, the government remains decidedly vague on how it intends to use the data it was seeking from the major search engines in the underlying case, which concerns the 1998 Child Online Protection Act. Justice says the goal is to "assess the amount of harmful material available to minors" on the Internet. But it doesn't take a genius -- or a subpoena -- to figure out that there's lots of that if you look for it.

The real question is whether criminalizing whole categories of speech on the basis of vaguely worded "community standards" is the least restrictive way of protecting children. Friday's ruling doesn't address that, as the underlying case is being adjudicated in a different court. But it did establish some limits on what the government can demand from private corporations in seeking to defend this law against a First Amendment challenge. Justice's initial request was for every indexed Web address and two months' worth of search queries. By comparison, what the government will now get looks reasonable indeed.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Judge Gives Maximum 10-year Sentences To 2 Cuban Smugglers (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, March 21, 2006

Two Cuban immigrants who captained a smuggling mission that ended with the drowning of a young boy received the maximum prison sentence on Monday -- 10 years.

U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore hammered the two men after concluding a six-year term proposed under federal sentencing guidelines was not enough punishment for the child's death in the Oct. 13 illegal crossing of the Florida Straits.

A lawyer for both Alexander Gil Rodriguez, 25, and Luis Manuel Taboada-Cabrera, 28, whose relatives sobbed outside the courtroom, said they will appeal the judge's sentences for their alien-smuggling convictions. Attorney Steven Amster said the two Miami men, who were not charged or convicted of causing the death of 6-year-old Julian Villasuso, still faced up to the maximum prison term because his drowning was a factor in the judge's sentencing under advisory guidelines.

"They understand their actions led to this death," Amster said, acknowledging the two men sped off in their go-fast boat when the U.S. Coast Guard tried to stop them. ``But their actions were not so egregious to go above what the sentencing guidelines say."

The two men had reached plea deals in November, expecting to receive lighter sentences. They pleaded guilty to a conspiracy to smuggle 29 Cubans in a 33-foot speedboat that overturned and claimed the life of the boy, who got trapped beneath the capsized vessel.

But Assistant U.S. Attorney Dana Washington said he didn't have enough evidence to charge them with the death of Julian Villasuso.

The boy's death was factored into the sentencing guidelines, doubling the initially proposed prison term from three to six years. But Moore, who as a federal judge has the authority to go higher than those advisory guidelines, didn't believe that penalty was sufficient.

"The question is whether the guidelines adequately take into account the death they caused," Moore said at a hearing in January.

Moore has greater leeway to go above the federal sentencing guidelines. Those guidelines had been mandatory until last year, when the U.S. Supreme Court made them advisory to maintain their constitutionality.

The reason: In 2001, Jorge "Bombino" Aleman was arrested on charges that he organized five smuggling runs between late 1999 and 2001 that ferried more than 100 Cubans to Florida. A January 2001 voyage resulted in the death of Cira Rodriguez, a Cuban who is believed to have died on a small Bahamian cay after smugglers dumped her and the other passengers on the island without food and water.

The following year, U.S. District Judge James Lawrence King sentenced the defendant to life in prison plus five years, overriding the federal sentencing guidelines that called for fewer than 13 years.

Then in 2004, the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Atlanta threw out what was the longest prison term in an alien-smuggling case, ordering that Aleman be sentenced within the federal guidelines.

That ruling came down, however, when the guidelines were still mandatory.

At Monday's sentencing hearing, Taboada-Cabrera apologized to the judge, community and others. "I wish to say I'm really repentant about what happened," he told the judge.

Rodriguez did not say anything in court.

Their attorney said the tragic smuggling trip was not for profit but was rather to bring over their families. Amster said Rodriguez had three family members, including his wife, aboard the speedboat, and that Taboada-Cabrera was supposed to bring his wife and a daughter on the voyage.

Amster also said the U.S. Coast Guard may have played a role in the capsizing of their speedboat that led to the boy's death. Coast Guard officials strongly disagreed.

The alien-smuggling attempt occurred during the early morning of Oct. 13, when Coast Guard officials tracked down a Florida-registered speedboat, carrying the 29 Cubans, about 52 miles south of Key West.

A chase ensued, as the Coast Guard crew deployed an "entangling device" -- or net -- in front of the speedboat, according to court papers. Finally, the vessel came to a stop. Then, numerous people stood up on board and someone threw an object into the ocean.

"Water immediately began to flow into the stern of the vessel, due to the shift in weight and the excess amount of individuals on board," according to an Immigration and Customs Enforcement affidavit, causing the boat to capsize and the passengers to fall overboard.

Authorities discovered the boy beneath the boat after rescuers pulled to safety the other passengers, including the boy's parents and the smugglers.

Julian's parents and a third passenger with health problems were allowed into the United States. The rest were repatriated to Cuba.

Smugglers Get 10 Years For Child's Death (AP)

By CURT ANDERSON, Associated Press Writer

MIAMI — Two men were sentenced Monday to 10 years in prison _ well above federal sentencing guidelines _ for organizing a Cuban immigrant smuggling trip that ended when their speedboat capsized and a 6-year-old boy drowned.

U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore said he was imposing the long sentence because of a marked increase in dangerous pursuits between U.S. authorities and smugglers on the open ocean. Moore also said the two men should pay an extra penalty for playing a role in the boy's death.

Sentences imposed under federal guidelines are "not providing an adequate deterrent for this kind of criminal conduct," Moore said.

Alexander Gil Rodriguez, 25, and Luis Manuel Taboada Cabrera, 28, had faced a maximum of just under six years in prison under the advisory guidelines, which included an enhancement of 2 1/2 years for the death of 6-year-old Julian Villasuso on Oct. 12, about 45 miles south of Key West.

Their boat carried 29 migrants, including Julian and his parents, and the two smugglers who pleaded guilty in November to migrant smuggling conspiracy charges.

Their attorney, Steven Amster, argued that the lower penalty was sufficient punishment, in part because the smuggling trip was not organized for profit.

Taboada apologized to the judge and accepted responsibility for his actions.

"I want to say that I'm really repentant about what happened," Taboada said in Spanish through an interpreter. Gil did not address the court.

Amster said he would appeal the sentence.

The boy was buried in Florida and his parents were permitted to enter the United States, while the other migrants were returned to Cuba. Under U.S. immigration policy, most Cubans who reach U.S. soil are allowed to remain while those intercepted at sea are normally returned to their homeland.

2 Smugglers Get 10 Years Each In Drowning Death Of 6-year-old Cuban (FLSUNSEN)

By Vanessa Blum, Sun-sentinel.com

DOJ_NMG_0019725

MIAMI -- A federal judge on Monday imposed the harshest possible sentence on two men whose effort to smuggle Cubans into the United States last year ended in the drowning of a young boy.

U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore sentenced Alexander Gil-Rodriguez and Luis Manuel Taboada Cabrera to 10 years each in prison, the longest terms possible under federal law.

Moore said he was departing from advisory sentencing guidelines, which called for more modest prison terms of 57 to 71 months, because he felt the guidelines did not reflect the severity of the offense and would not deter similar crimes.

Gil Rodriguez, 25, and Taboada Cabrera, 28, pleaded guilty in November 2005 to illegally attempting to bring migrants into the United States.

Their speedboat was detected by the U.S. Coast Guard and capsized in the Florida Straits on Oct. 13, 2005, as the men allegedly tried to evade capture. Julian Villasuso Jr., 6, who was on the boat with his parents, was trapped under the overturned boat and drowned. There were 31 people aboard the 33-foot-long go-fast boat.

Defense attorney Steven Amster argued that the lower penalty was sufficient punishment, in part because the smuggling trip was not organized for profit. In remarks to the judge, Taboada apologized and took responsibility for his actions.

``I want to say that I'm really repentant about what happened," Taboada said in Spanish through an interpreter. Gil did not address the court.

Amster also suggested that the Coast Guard played a role in the boy's death by casting a net over their boat's engines, causing water to rush over the stern and precipitating the boat's capsizing. There also was a delay in the attempt to rescue Julian after it was realized he was still under the boat.

``The boat had come to a stop. They had given up," Amster said.

But Moore said the smugglers should not expect leniency by attempting to shift blame to the Coast Guard and noted that other migrants on the boat had pleaded with the two smugglers to stop once the chase began.

``It's all too easy while we sit in a courtroom, in a very antiseptic environment, to ignore the dangers and risks these Coast Guard officers take every day," Moore said.

U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta said the strict sentence ``is a reflection of the seriousness of the crime and our resolve to help end this tragic human saga."

The commander of the 7th Coast Guard District, Rear Adm. D. Brian Peterman, said Moore's decision ``sends a clear signal that we will not tolerate smuggling of illegal migrants into the United States."

Amster said he would appeal the sentence, calling it far too harsh for the facts of the case.

The boy was buried in Florida and his parents permitted to enter the United States, while the other migrants were returned to Cuba. Under U.S. immigration policy, most Cubans who reach U.S. soil are allowed to remain while those intercepted at sea are normally returned to their homeland.

Attorney Accuses Bay County Of Cover-up In Boot Camp Death (AP)

By BRENT KALLESTAD, Associated Press Writer

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. - Bay County authorities are covering up their role in the death of a boy who was punched and kicked by guards at a boot camp, and his relatives want any trial in the case moved to another area to ensure a fair proceeding, the family's attorney said Monday.

Bay County sheriff's spokeswoman Ruth Sasser declined to comment on the cover-up allegations, but said seven drill instructors involved in the altercation and a nurse who witnessed it will be among about 20 people who lose their jobs when the camp closes next month. The closure plans had already been announced.

Ben Crump, the attorney for Martin Lee Anderson's parents, said they were "outraged" because medical examiner Dr. Charles Siebert last week defended his findings that the 14-year-old died from complications of sickle cell trait, a usually harmless blood disorder.

"How could he deny that the beating of Martin did not play some role in his death," Crump told reporters. "How can you say it didn't play a role? It's almost less than intelligent. It's an insult to the family."

Investigators re-examining the death with a second autopsy said last week that Anderson didn't die of natural causes.

Anderson died Jan. 6 after the confrontation at the boot camp in Panama City run by Bay County sheriff's officials. He had been struck, kicked and dragged to the ground by several guards during a half-hour ordeal that was recorded on videotape.

No one has been charged with a crime, but the family has threatened to sue.

"Martin's parents have said it was a cover-up from day one," Crump said. "The law enforcement officials are doing everything they can to make sure nobody is held accountable for the death of their son."

County spokeswoman Catherine Zehner said the sheriff's department has third-party liability insurance, so she doesn't "think the county commission will get embroiled in a lawsuit."

Gov. Jeb Bush has appointed Hillsborough County State Attorney Mark Ober to investigate and he observed the second autopsy done in Tampa. The U.S. Attorney's office in Tallahassee and the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division also have opened an investigation into Anderson's death.

"No peace until justice," said Anderson's mother, Gina Jones.

California Prisons Uneasily Prepare To Desegregate Cells (WSJ)

By Miriam Jordan

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

CHINO, Calif. -- It's exercise time at the California Institution for Men, and dozens of inmates walk around the track in pairs or small groups -- blacks with blacks, whites with whites, Hispanics with Hispanics.

Prison culture dictates that inmates stick with their own kind, associating almost exclusively with other inmates from their race or ethnic group, defending them to the death if necessary. And that is why prison officials, inmates and scholars are uneasy as California's prison system prepares to introduce a formal policy desegregating its double cells, after the U.S. Supreme Court ruled last year that prisoners may not be routinely segregated in cells by race. The ruling has ramifications for state correctional systems nationwide.

In 2004, an African-American inmate challenged the California Department of Corrections' unwritten policy of assigning new prisoners and transfers to double cells only with a cellmate of the same race or ethnic group. The corrections department claimed segregated prison cells were necessary to avoid racial violence. Unswayed, the high court last year refused to strike down the inmate's challenge. California's new policy, which officials expect to implement over the next 2½ years, is the result of a settlement of that case.

California's prison population is combustible, divided roughly evenly among three groups: 38% of inmates are Hispanic, 29% are black and 27% white. Recent race-related prison violence in Southern California has focused concerns about thrusting inmates together in biracial cells. For more than a month now, clashes of black and Latino prisoners have gripped Los Angeles county jails, resulting in two deaths and more than 100 injuries. In October, a Hispanic inmate at Chino died from head injuries inflicted in a riot last summer.

Critics of the new policy say the purpose of segregated cells is to keep prisons peaceful and safe, not to discriminate. "You must give broad latitude to the prison administrator," says Joseph McNamara, former police chief of San Jose, Calif., and a research fellow at Stanford University's Hoover Institution. "If not, you let slaughtering happen."

California's prison system, at present still operating largely under the old policy, uses ethnicity as the main criteria when assigning higher-threat inmates to double cells. Racial segregation doesn't apply at mealtimes, in classes or in dormitories where low-risk felons are housed. Prisoners, however, say they live along self-imposed racial divides all day. "It's an unwritten rule," says Reginald Scott, a black inmate in Chino since 1998, who was at his job typing up inmate infractions in a small administrative room. "You don't have coffee with a white or Hispanic guy. You don't trade food, property or anything with someone of a different race."

Criminal-justice scholars say it is impossible to get a clear picture of prison-cell integration across the U.S. because practices vary widely from facility to facility. One national survey of prison wardens in 2000, led by Martha Henderson, now an assistant professor at Southern Illinois University, Carbondale, found only 30% of multiple-occupant cells were integrated. Federal prisons are forbidden under regulations to segregate based on race; California is one of the few state systems to acknowledge the practice.

Under the new California policy, new prisoners will be assigned to "the next available and appropriate cell," without regard for ethnicity. "We are not preparing [offenders] for their return to society if we continue to allow them to be segregated in our housing," said John Dovey, the corrections department's director of adult institutions who is overseeing the new policy.

Academic researchers say racial tension is usually engineered by a small group of inmates. Prisoners say when tensions explode it is almost impossible to stay neutral. "If you run away, your own people deal with you later," says Joe Rodriguez, a Hispanic inmate at the Chino prison. "Once you're in jail, everything becomes racial."

Gangs defined by race -- the Mexican Mafia, the Black Guerilla Family, the Nazi Low Riders and others -- permeate inmate life in California prisons. At Chino, a low- and medium-security facility, inmates working as gardeners and handymen sport gang acronyms tattooed to the backs of their heads.

Lt. Tim Shirlock, an official at the Chino facility who has worked in the state correctional system for 27 years, says the prison staff is "apprehensive" about the desegregation policy. Noting recent instances of racial violence on streets, schools and workplaces in Los Angeles, he says, "If they can't get along in society, you have to wonder whether they will get along here."

Prison systems in Texas and Oklahoma introduced policies to integrate cells in the 1990s. A 2002 study by two Dallas researchers found that Texas' new policy, rather than fueling violence, actually had the opposite effect. Violence in Texas prisons with integrated cells was slightly less likely than in facilities with segregated cells, researchers Chad Trulson, of the University of North Texas, and James Marquart, of the University of Texas, found.

Supporters of desegregation say it is the correctional system's responsibility to foster better relations among inmates. "You want to de-emphasize race, not give power to the instinct to use race," says Margo Schlanger, a professor of law at Washington University in St. Louis, who specializes in incarceration litigation.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, writing for the majority in the California ruling, invoked the landmark 1954 Brown v. Board of Education decision that rejected the idea of "separate but equal." "Indeed," she added, "by insisting that inmates be housed only with other inmates of the same race, it is possible that prison officials will breed further hostility among prisoners and reinforce racial and ethnic divisions."

Today, some two-thirds of Texas' prison cells house inmates of different races. "Many of us had real concern about what would happen" when cells were integrated, says Doug Dretke, Texas' director of correctional institutions. The concerns proved unfounded, he says, adding that less than 1% of Texas inmates today are "racially restricted."

California, though, faces especially high obstacles. Financial cutbacks and a fast-growing inmate population now approaching 170,000 have made it a struggle for the system to house felons and retain staff. The California Institute for Men in Chino houses 6,500 felons -- more than double its capacity. On a recent Wednesday morning, eight correctional officers were guarding about 500 inmates on the yard, a ratio that isn't unusual, says Terry Thornton, a communications official for the California corrections department.

California is creating a desegregation program using Texas as a model. It involves educating prison officers and prisoners and a screening process to weed out inmates whose criminal record or prison history would make them a bad risk for a multiracial cell. One California facility is testing a behavior-modification program that would deny privileges to inmates who undermine the program.

At least some prisoners are prepared to give co-existing a try. "California has let inmates dictate how they should live" for too long, says Franklin Porter, a 45-year-old black inmate. "If they're integrating in other states, it can work here."

Geico's Risk Criteria Challenged (WP)

By Albert B. Crenshaw And Caroline E. Mayer

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

According to an internal Geico document, the auto insurer uses drivers' levels of education and occupations in setting insurance rates.

DOJ_NMG_0019728

As a result, Consumer Federation of America argued, blue-collar workers with relatively low levels of education sometimes are charged almost twice as much as better-educated professionals, based on those criteria.

Geico said in a statement that it uses many factors in setting rates and that allegations that education and occupation are being used as the sole criterion are "absolutely untrue."

The document cited by the consumer group and a Geico competitor raises long-standing questions about which criteria insurance companies may use as proper gauges of risk and which improperly discriminate against poor people and minorities.

Insurers, consumer advocates, regulators and politicians have been struggling for years over such issues, including the use of credit scores in assessing risk. The use of credit scores is permissible in about 30 states but continues to be debated.

Yesterday, CFA called on insurance regulators to bar insurers from basing decisions on whether to sell insurance to someone and what rates to charge solely on the applicant's education and income, calling the practice "an underwriting sleight of hand" to avoid existing prohibitions on using race and other criteria.

"No single criterion is ever used to determine a customer's rate," Geico said in a statement late yesterday. "Persons of all educational levels and occupations are offered insurance at our best rate based on a variety of criteria. Income or race based criteria never has a role in underwriting or pricing. These allegations are patently false and intentionally divisive."

The consumer group was joined by New Jersey Citizens United Reciprocal Exchange, a nonprofit insurer and Geico competitor in that state. They based their call for regulatory action on an internal Geico document filed with regulators in New Jersey, which makes more documents public than other states. The document included a guide used by Geico's underwriters to decide which of the company's four subsidiary companies will insure an applicant and to determine what price an applicant will be offered.

The guide, in addition to listing factors such as driving history, age, mileage and vehicle type, includes a section dividing drivers into eight groups based on their education and occupation. Considered "more favorable" are professionals with college degrees and graduate students. "Least favorable" are "minimally skilled clerks, assistants, stock clerks and postal clerks," as well as long-haul drivers and "unskilled and semiskilled blue and gray collar workers."

"Educational attainment and occupation are directly linked to income, which cannot be used in determining insurance eligibility or rates because of its serious adverse impact on lower-income and minority consumers," said J. Robert Hunter, CFA's director of insurance and a former Texas insurance commissioner. According to the U.S. Census Bureau, 89.4 percent of non-Hispanic whites 25 and older held a high school diploma in 2003. By comparison, 80 percent of blacks and 57 percent of Hispanics were high school graduates.

CFA said it sought rate quotations from Geico's Web site for motorists in locations in all 50 states and the District, entering data for drivers who were identical except for education and occupation. The experiment produced higher rates for the blue-collar driver in all but six locations (one of which was Fairfax County).

The differences ranged from 11.12 percent in Chicago to 124.72 percent in New Orleans.

Geico, which has been vigorously advertising low prices, said, "Every criterion, including occupation and education, used by Geico reflects its actual loss experience nationwide over many decades. Geico has justified its use of these criteria with insurance regulators throughout the country for many years."

Geico, the nation's fourth-largest car insurance company, is a subsidiary of Berkshire Hathaway Inc.

Former D.C. insurance commissioner Lawrence H. Mirel, now at Wiley Rein & Fielding here, said carriers constantly seek to find ways to assess risk accurately.

"The heart of insurance is underwriting. You want to make the best prediction you can about who is going to have a claim, and if you're good about that you make money, if not you lose money," he said.

Some other carriers said they use education or occupation along with other criteria, while others said they do not.

Industry officials said that auto insurance is both tightly regulated and highly competitive, so that practices that have a pernicious impact are likely to be stopped, and in any case, with hundreds of carriers in the market, motorists have plenty of places to shop.

"Automobile insurance is a highly competitive market where consumers who don't want to deal with a company for whatever reason have lots of other companies to choose from," said David Snyder, vice president and assistant general counsel at the American Insurance Association, a trade group in the District.

State Farm, the nation's largest auto insurer, does not use occupation and education to determine rates. "We are always looking at variables so we can price our product as accurately as we can, but at the moment those two are not among the ones we are using," said company spokesman Dick Luedke. "To the extent that companies are using different variables, that's good news to the consumers."

Allstate doesn't ask prospective customers about their education, but it does consider occupational discounts in several states. Actuaries, architects, editors, legislators, mail carriers and speech therapists, for example, receive a 10 percent discount while carpenters, clergy, insurance adjusters, plumbers, police officers, teachers, and locksmiths get a 5 percent reduction in their rates.

"Our data shows that these professions incur fewer losses" and the discounts are an innovative way to provide consumers with competitively priced insurance coverage, said spokesman Mike Siemienas.

For Liberty Mutual Group, occupation is a factor in setting rates in some states, said spokesman Glenn Greenberg. "We use no single criterion to determine the price," and any data used are based on "the likelihood of risk," Greenberg said.

San Antonio Business Journal, March 21, 2006

AT&T Inc.'s plan to merge with BellSouth Corp. is seen as a development that will not work in favor of San Antonio's small-business community, according to the majority of individuals who participated in an online Business Pulse poll.

Slightly more than half of the San Antonio Business Journal readers who responded to the survey say San Antonio-based AT&T's (NYSE: T) planned $67 billion stock merger with BellSouth (NYSE: BLS) in Atlanta will lead to less competition in the marketplace, rising prices, less technological innovation and poor customer service.

(The online poll is not scientific and the results represent only a snap shot of some readers' opinions.)

AT&T officials, however, disagree with the negative assessments of the merger and have long maintained that there is sufficient competition in the marketplace as evidenced by the full slate of services offered by cable, wireless carriers and competing local phone companies.

In 1984, the courts broke up AT&T Corp. into a long-distance company and seven regional Bell operating companies: Southwestern Bell, Pacific Telesis, Ameritech, BellSouth, U.S. West, NYNEX and Bell Atlantic.

Since then, Southwestern Bell -- which changed its name to SBC Communications Inc. -- undertook an acquisition strategy to acquire fellow Bells Pacific Telesis and Ameritech and former parent company AT&T Corp. SBC officially changed its name to AT&T on Nov. 18, 2005, and is aggressively re-branding itself as the new AT&T.

By merging with BellSouth, a number of online participants of the Business Pulse survey said AT&T's plan is tantamount to the re-monopolization of the former Ma Bell.

Several survey participants attributed the overall growth in technological innovation the telecommunications industry is enjoying today to the break up of the old monopoly and the resulting competition. If AT&T is allowed to proceed with the merger, it could stifle healthy competition, one survey participant said.

The merger still needs shareholder and regulatory approval in five states and with the Justice Department and Federal Communications Commission.

About 41 percent of those who participated in the survey said the merger would be a positive development for the small-business community. Many said that AT&T's move is simply a response to the overall consolidation in the telecommunications industry.

About 8 percent of those responding to the poll were undecided.

UPDATE: Proxy Adviser Backs Boston Sci, Guidant Deal (DOW)

By Jon Kamp, Of DOW JONES NEWSWIRES

Dow Jones, March 21, 2006

Shareholders of Boston Scientific Corp. (BSX) (BSX) and Guidant Corp. (GDT) (GDT) should approve the consolidation of the two companies in votes scheduled for March 31, according to Institutional Shareholder Services, an influential proxy advisory firm.

In reports recently directed to shareholders of each company, ISS said "the acquisition of GDT will allow BSX to diversify its product offerings, adding defibrillators and pacemakers, and should ameliorate some of the concerns regarding future growth."

On Jan. 25, Boston Scientific (BSX) and Guidant (GDT) announced a merger agreement, under which Boston Scientific (BSX) will buy Guidant (GDT) for a combination of cash and stock worth about $27 billion. The deal is valued at $80 a share to Guidant (GDT)shareholders as long as Boston Scientific (BSX) shares close within a $22.62-$28.86 collar over a certain period prior to the deal's closing.

So far, Boston Scientific's (BSX) closing price has largely remained within that range. Boston Scientific (BSX) recently traded at $23.28, up 66 cents, or 2.9%.

Guidant's (GDT) shares recently traded at $78.69, up 81 cents from Friday's close, and hit a 52-week high of $78.74 earlier in the session. The stock hit its previous 52-week high of $77.95 during Friday's session.

ISS published its reports Thursday, and the two medical-device makers noted the positive reviews in a joint press release Monday.

Jim Tobin, Boston Scientific's (BSX) chief executive, repeated that the acquisition is expected to close in the first week of April. In a recent filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, Boston Scientific (BSX) said it anticipates antitrust approval for the deal that week.

Guidant (GDT) and Boston Scientific (BSX) are each holding separate shareholder meetings for a vote on the deal at 10:00 a.m. EST on March 31. Guidant (GDT) will hold its meeting at its corporate headquarters in Indianapolis, and Natick, Mass-based Boston Scientific (BSX) will hold its meeting in Boston.

ISS noted that it will take a majority vote from holders of each company to clear the deal. Boston Scientific (BSX) has a head start as major shareholders Pete Nicholas and John Abele, who founded and own roughly 30% of the company, have already entered into voting agreement with Guidant (GDT) through which they have agreed to back the deal.

Boston Scientific's (BSX) major product is its Taxus drug-coated stent, a tiny device used to prop open arteries. Though Taxus is the top-seller in the more than $5 billion market, growth in the overall segment is leveling off. Guidant (GDT)had notable troubles last year with its heart-rhythm devices, including several recalls and problems linked to multiple deaths, but the heart-rhythm segment is still expected to expand rapidly.

Larry Best, Boston Scientific's (BSX) chief financial officer, recently said the company expects to rebuild Guidant's (GDT) position in the business.

Dow Jones, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- Lucent Technologies Inc. (LU) (LU) received antitrust clearance from the Federal Trade Commission to buy the business operations of Riverstone Networks Inc. (RSTNE) (RSTNE) for $170 million in cash.

The FTC said Monday that on Friday it granted Lucent early termination of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act.

Lucent has said the acquisition would complement its broadband, data and optical-networking products. The transaction is subject to bankruptcy court approval and other conditions.

Riverstone Networks (RSTNE) said in a press release Friday it received a $178-million offer from the U.S. unit of Swedish telecommunications giant LM Ericsson (ERICY) to purchase substantially all of Riverstone's assets.

Riverstone said it was reviewing Ericsson's bid.

An auction for the sale of Riverstone's assets is scheduled for Monday. The deadline for bids was Thursday.

Riverstone, Santa Clara, Calif., makes ethernet routers for the telecommunications industry. The company filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection Feb. 7, listing assets of $98.3 million and debt of $130 million.

At that time, Riverstone agreed to sell its assets to Lucent, a telecommunications equipment manufacturer based in Murray Hill, N.J., for $170 million, subject to higher offers.

Lucent's shares recently fell 3.8% to $2.79, after a Barron's report criticized the company's dwindling business prospects.

Counter-bid Likely For Prudential (FT)

By Andrea Felsted

Financial Times, March 21, 2006

Investors were braced for a counter-bid for Prudential, Britain's second biggest life assurer, after its shares rose 5 per cent above the offer price proposed by Aviva.

Shares in Prudential rose 11 per cent to 743½p, ahead of the 706p proposed by Aviva in its all-share offer which, valuing Prudential at £16.8bn

"The share price is telling you that the market is expecting a counter-bid," said Roman Cizdyn, an analyst at Oriel Securities. "As we sit where we are now, Aviva is not likely to succeed. The price is telling you that."

However, Richard Harvey, chief executive of Aviva, said a counterbid was "unlikely" and that consequently, Aviva was not expected to make a hostile offer.

"I think it's unlikely that someone else would come in and that is why we are expecting to proceed on a recommended basis," Mr Harvey said.

France's Axa is seen as the most likely counter-bidder for Prudential, but some analysts said that it had been reluctant to become involved in contested bid situations in the past.

Mr Cizdyn said that Aviva, by showing its hand and admitting that it needed more growth opportunities, had also put itself into play.

Expectations of a counterbid come as Prudential shareholders are set to put pressure on Mark Tucker, chief executive, and Sir David Clementi, chairman, to explain why it would not enter discussions with Aviva.

"We need a robust defence case, which is quantified, as to why they are turning down a 700p-plus offer," said one Prudential shareholder.

One top-30 shareholder said he would be asking Prudential to justify why it would not enter into dialogue with Aviva, but the outcome would depend on the bigger shareholders.

Mr Harvey played down the prospects of Aviva raising its offer, or adding a cash component. "I don't think there is a lot [of sense in] moving cash out of the group that you are expecting to grow very strongly," he said.

The comments came as Prudential reaffirmed its rejection of Aviva's proposed offer.

It followed a statement from Aviva detailing its proposal. The group said that, under the terms of the proposal, Prudential shareholders would receive 82 new Aviva shares for every 100 Prudential shares held. It also expected to generate annual cost savings of £320m before tax by 2009, at a one-off cost to shareholders of £480m.

Aviva also said it would be able to boost Prudential's dividend by the combined group adopting Aviva's dividend policy.

It added that Mr Harvey would be chief executive of the combined group with the rest of the board drawn from both organisations.

However, Mr Harvey refused to comment specifically on whether there would be a role for Mr Tucker.

Aviva CEO Plans To Woo Prudential PLC Investors To Back Takeover Offer (WSJ)

By Charles Fleming

Insisting his takeover intentions remain friendly, Richard Harvey, chief executive of the United Kingdom's largest insurer, Aviva PLC, said he would take his case for a merger with fellow U.K. insurer Prudential PLC directly to shareholders, overriding Prudential managers' rejection of his unsolicited £17.1 billion (€24.63 billion or $30.04 billion) takeover offer.

"My door is open to shareholders," Mr. Harvey said in an interview. He said the two companies have many shareholders in common and that Aviva's investor-relations team is currently working the telephones to explain Aviva's position to investors. "I expect them to arrange a number of rendezvous for me [with shareholders] in the coming weeks,' Mr. Harvey said.

Prudential, which isn't related to the U.S. insurance company of the same name, repeated Monday its opposition to Aviva's proposal. Prudential Chairman David Clementi said in a statement that Prudential's potential as a stand-alone company was "tremendous and distinctive" and that a combination with Aviva would dilute the benefits of its growth. Prudential Chief Executive Mark Tucker was unavailable for comment, a Prudential spokesman said.

Aviva sent its offer to Prudential management last Thursday, suggesting a merger of the two companies in an all-share transaction valuing Prudential at 708 pence a share. Mr. Harvey said Monday that he had gone public with the terms of the offer, not as a hostile gesture but so that shareholders could assess the proposal on an informed basis. He also said the U.K. Takeover Panel would have required the information to be made public following Prudential's public statements over the weekend.

Mr. Harvey said Aviva wasn't considering raising its offer, but Prudential shares soared Monday on expectations that a higher offer would follow, either from Aviva or another as-yet undeclared bidder. Prudential shares were trading more than 12% higher at 747.50 pence in London Monday afternoon.

Mr. Harvey acknowledged as modest Aviva's estimates of £320 million in annual cost savings if the two groups merged. But he said there were stronger arguments for the transaction. He specified the need to match the global reach of Aviva's two main European rivals, AXA SA of France and Allianz AG of Germany, both of which have built up a strong U.S. presence as well as broad European operations.

"You don't just do this to save money. Look at the way the market values AXA and Allianz and their global footprint," he said, saying he was seeking to build "a must-hold world-wide company." Aviva's insurance business is focused on the U.K. and Europe, while Prudential has operations in the U.K., the U.S. and across Asia.

Aviva, shares of which were down slightly at 848.63 pence in London Monday afternoon, currently trades at 11.42 times its estimated 2006 earnings, slightly under AXA's current price-to-earnings ratio of 12.85 but above Allianz's 11.25. Prudential's current price-to-earnings ratio is 14.61 times its 2006 estimated earnings.

PARIS - Belgian Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt said Monday he plans to hold talks to seek concessions on the French government-backed plan for Gaz de France SA to acquire French utility company Suez SA.

Speaking after a meeting with President Jacques Chirac in Paris, Verhofstadt said he had told the French leader that a GDF-Suez deal should not prevent Belgium from opening its gas and electricity markets to more competition.

Verhofstadt also said the two Paris-based companies would likely have to sell assets in order to meet that requirement.

The GDF-Suez deal was announced by the French government last month just days after Italian power company Enel SPA said it might launch a takeover bid for Suez.

Verhofstadt said last week that it would be unacceptable for one company to control 90 percent of his country's electricity market. The Belgian energy regulator is also concerned about the country's nuclear plants coming under French control, according to press reports.

A final deal might have to include "a sell-off of assets in the nuclear domain," Verhofstadt said Monday, adding that his government was seeking to "open the electricity and gas markets in Belgium and to have several operators, as is already the case in telecommunications."

The CEOs of GDF and Suez, Jean-Francois Cirelli and Gerard Mestrallet, met EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes on Monday to discuss antitrust concerns over the planned deal.

Mestrallet said afterward that he and Cirelli had presented the plan at a "very constructive" first meeting, refusing to be drawn on likely concessions.

But Suez spokesman Guy Dellicour said the company does not expect the selloffs required to go beyond an existing agreement to sell three sites, effectively opening 25 percent of the Belgian power market to competition.

Verhofstadt, who will meet the GDF and Suez bosses on Tuesday and Wednesday, has already said more electricity businesses will have to be sold for the deal to go through.

Enel CEO Fulvio Conti is also set to meet Tuesday with the EU's Kroes, who cautioned earlier this month that energy deals will receive close antitrust scrutiny. The EU executive has for years been pressing stragglers in energy liberalization, including Belgium and France, to open their electricity and gas markets.

FCC Deregulates Verizon's Big-Business Market (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Verizon Communications Inc. got a boost in the big-business market as federal regulators agreed to deregulate its high-volume data lines for its largest corporate customers.

The decision by the Federal Communications Commission essentially lifts price controls and possibly reverses some conditions imposed on the New York telecommunications company last year during its acquisition of MCI Inc. It also gives Verizon pricing flexibility for lucrative high-volume services sold to major corporations, although regulations may continue to stay in effect for smaller business customers.

The action signaled the FCC's willingness to expand phone companies' control over high-speed Internet lines to cover the large corporate market as well as residential customers.

But by granting Verizon's request without guidance, the FCC prompted confusion in the industry Monday. The action could lead to legal challenges by smaller competitors, particularly companies that resell high-volume services, such as Internet access, to small businesses. Also, other phone companies are likely to file requests for similar relief with the FCC.

"It's the most lucrative market today, and this ensures Verizon remains dominant in its territory," said Jessica Zufolo, a telecom analyst for Medley Global Advisors.

Verizon Monday said in a statement it appreciated the FCC's actions. In December 2004, the company asked the FCC to ease rules on data pipes used by its enterprise customers, freeing it from common-carrier obligations, notably rules guaranteeing access at "just and reasonable" rates. The FCC lifted similar rules last year on residential high-speed Internet lines. The change frees Verizon from a variety of rules, including requirements to interconnect with other providers or contribute to the Universal Service Fund, which subsidizes phone services for low-income residents and rural communities.

FCC Chairman Kevin Martin has supported giving the Bells more control over data lines, saying it will encourage investment and the spread of high-speed Internet access. He asked the commission's other members to approve Verizon's request last month, but the effort failed after the FCC's two Democrats voted against the measure, saying it would restrict competition in the enterprise market.

"Like everyone else, it puts us at the mercy of Verizon. If we pay them enough money, I guess we'll get service," said Earl Comstock, chief executive of Comptel, an association of smaller phone companies that compete with the Bells.

The Verizon proposal went into effect Sunday night because an FCC rule grants petitions automatically if the commission doesn't respond. Commissioner Michael Copps, one of the panel's two Democrats, said the decision "erases decades of communications policy in a single stroke. In effect, we provide industry the pen and give it the go-ahead to rewrite the law."

The decision to grant Verizon's request without FCC guidance could prove problematic since the original request was somewhat broad. It is also unclear if the decision only applies to Verizon or all carriers who provide such services. AT&T Inc. said in a statement it was evaluating the decision, but believes it "should apply to all market players."

And it is unclear which obligations Verizon still has on its high-volume lines. For example, rules requiring telecom companies to cooperate with law enforcement on wiretapping and other electronic surveillance may no longer apply. Mr. Martin is already planning to circulate an order to reimpose Universal Service Fund obligations, FCC officials said Monday. The action may also effectively undo some conditions imposed on Verizon last year in its acquisition of MCI, such as requiring it to lease access to high-volume lines to competitors along with a limited price freeze on rates.

Kerzner Agrees To Buyout Offer Topping $3 Billion (WSJ)

By Peter Sanders

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

Casino operator Kerzner International Ltd. agreed to be acquired by a consortium of private-equity concerns for $3 billion in cash plus the assumption of $599 million in debt.

The consortium, including Kerzner Chairman Sol Kerzner and his son, Butch Kerzner, the company's chief executive, agreed to pay $76 a share for the Bahamas-based casino company, an 8% premium to the stock's Friday closing price. The company operates its flagship Atlantis properties in the Bahamas and soon in Dubai, as well as the ultraluxury "One&Only" hotels in exotic destinations around the world. Kerzner International also receives income from the Mohegan Sun tribal casino in Connecticut, which it developed, and has a large casino at its Atlantis property in the Bahamas.

If successful in their buyout attempt, the Kerzners would see their ownership stake rise to about 25% from about 10%, Butch Kerzner said in an interview. Kerzner officials insist they "will actively solicit superior proposals during the next 45 days," but the proposed deal represents a multiple of about 19 times last year's earnings, according to a person familiar with the situation. "On a multiple basis, this is a rich price," that person says.

Butch Kerzner, 42 years old, said that, to be completely forthright with investors, the company will entertain other offers at a higher price by conducting a "full auction" during the next 45 days. He added that "in certain circumstances, we would vote our shares in favor if there is a higher offer." But he expects the buyout to go through and "looking at the horizon, we want it not just to be an investment, but my father and I want to have a strategic stake in what we want to do."

Another person familiar with the situation said two of the four members of a special committee formed to examine the proposed deal are shareholders with a combined 14% of the stock. That person said both members have agreed to sell their positions at the proposed price.

If completed, the deal is expected to close sometime later this year. Investors reacted positively to the news, driving the stock up 13%, or $9.07, to $79.43, above the $76 offer price, in 4 p.m. composite trading yesterday on the New York Stock Exchange.

Private-equity partners in the deal include major shareholder Istithmar, a closely held entity controlled by the government of Dubai that already owns about 12.3% of the company; Colony Capital LLC; Whitehall Street Global Real Estate Ltd.; Providence Equity Partners Inc. and The Related Companies L.P.

The proposed deal is another in a frenzy of activity focused on the hotel and casino industry. Last week, casino operator Aztar Corp. agreed to be acquired by rival operator Pinnacle Entertainment Inc. for about $1.45 billion. Last month, Hilton Hotels Corp. completed its roughly $5.7 billion acquisition of its international counterpart.

And in January, Fairmont Hotels & Resorts Inc. agreed to be acquired by a Canadian company and Colony Capital for about $3.3 billion. But the proposed deal would be the first in recent memory that would see a hotel company taken private.

Mr. Kerzner insists it will be "business as usual" for his company, which competes at the high end in both the casino and hotel world with major players such as Harrah's Entertainment Inc. MGM Mirage, Starwood Hotels & Resorts Worldwide Inc., Marriott International Inc. and others.

"We're not looking at this as a typical leveraged buyout," Mr. Kerzner said. "We've grown this company over time, and we will be investing more money in the business, not stripping out cash."

In 2004, 81% of Kerzner's revenue came from its megaresort in the Bahamas. Last year, the company pushed forward with a major expansion of its Atlantis property in the Bahamas, which will compete with a newly announced project by Harrah's and

Starwood slated for a site nearby. The company is in the continuing race to secure one of two new casino licenses in Singapore, which would see the winner build a multibillion-dollar resort destination there in the coming years.

France Drafts Copyright Law To Open Up ITunes (FT)

By Tom Braithwaite

Financial Times, March 21, 2006

Apple Computer could on Tuesday be forced to open up its digital music business to competitors after a vote in the French parliament.

The owner of iTunes, the online music store, and the iPod digital music player, will have to choose between making downloaded music compatible with rival platforms or pulling out of France if, as expected, the parliament in Paris approves a draft copyright law.

Software in digital downloads from iTunes prevents music being played by any rival to the popular iPod, but the French bill seeks to impose "interoperability" on online music stores and break Apple's closed system.

"It is unacceptable that . . . the key should be controlled by a monopoly. France is against monopolies," said Martin Rogard, an adviser at the French Culture Ministry. "The consumer must be able to listen to the music they have bought on no matter what platform."

Mr Rogard said it was "desirable" that France led in this respect, but hoped that it was the start of a Europe-wide move to open up digital music.

Competitors such as Sony and Microsoft would also have to comply with the legislation, but some rivals see it as a chance to break Apple's grip on the online music market. Steve Jobs, Apple's chief executive, has said that 3m songs a day are sold on iTunes. The website has more than 70 per cent of paid digital downloads in some markets.

"The French seem to be leading the way in being a little bit more anarchic and taking a stand," said Rudy Tambala, head of Virgin Digital, a UK-based online music store. "[Apple made] a smart move. They've created the market and they've dominated it."

However, others in the IT industry said forcing Apple to admit competitors to a new market it was instrumental in creating sent the wrong signal to technology companies. CompTIA, a trade association, said the law was the latest in a series of measures in the European Union that were "punishing inventors and stifling innovation".

The draft copyright law, which implements an EU directive on intellectual property, has already been the source of controversy. Record companies and artists were enraged last year when an ad hoc coalition of MPs succeeded in pushing through a parliamentary amendment that legalised peer-to-peer file-sharing.

The government overturned the amendment but has bowed to pressure from consumers groups to open up the market for digital music. The government has also reduced the fines for illegally downloading music to a mere €38 ($46, £26).

Apple said it was waiting for the law to be passed before making any comment.

Justices Reach Out To Consider Patent Case (NYT)

By Andrew Pollack

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

For the first time in a quarter-century, the Supreme Court will hear on Tuesday a case involving the basic question of what type of discoveries and inventions can be patented.

Both sides say the case, which involves a blood test for a vitamin deficiency, could have a wide-ranging impact on the development of diagnostics, perhaps threatening many of the underlying patents for genetic and other medical tests.

But the array of companies filing supporting briefs — including American Express, Bear Stearns and I.B.M. — indicates that intellectual property in other fields might also be affected.

Some patent specialists say they think the Supreme Court agreed to hear the case, against the advice of the United States solicitor general, to rein in patenting.

DOJ_NMG_0019736

"The Supreme Court reached out and grabbed this case," said Edward R. Reines, a patent attorney at Weil, Gotshal & Manges who is not involved in the case. "These circumstances suggest that some members of the court believe there are too many patents in areas where there should be none."

At issue is whether relationships between a substance in the human body and a disease — for example, the familiar association between high cholesterol and a higher risk of heart attacks — can be the basis of a patent, or whether such relationships are unpatentable natural phenomena.

This case, LabCorp v. Metabolite Laboratories, stems from a 1990 patent awarded to scientists at the University of Colorado and Columbia University. They found that a high level in the blood of homocysteine, an amino acid, indicated a deficiency of either vitamin B12 or another B vitamin called folic acid.

Much of the patent describes a specific way to measure homocysteine, and those claims are not at issue. But the 13th claim of the patent is more general: it covers a way of determining vitamin deficiency by first testing blood or urine for homocysteine by any means and then correlating elevated levels with a vitamin deficiency.

The patent is owned by Competitive Technologies, a publicly traded patent management firm in Fairfield, Conn., and licensed to Metabolite Laboratories, a tiny company based at the University of Colorado. LabCorp, one of the biggest clinical testing companies in the nation, with 2005 revenues of $3.3 billion, sublicensed the test from Metabolite.

At first, LabCorp, whose full name is Laboratory Corporation of America Holdings, tested for homocysteine using the specific method described in the patent and paid royalties to Metabolite and Competitive Technologies. But in 1998 it switched to a newer and faster test developed by Abbott Laboratories.

Metabolite and Competitive sued, charging LabCorp with violating Claim 13 of the patent. In 2001 a federal jury in Denver ruled against LabCorp, and the company was eventually ordered to pay $7.8 million in damages and attorneys' fees. The appeals court that handles patent cases affirmed the lower court decision in 2004.

In asking the Supreme Court to overturn the lower court decisions, LabCorp is arguing that Claim 13, because it does not specify how testing is to be done, patents nothing more than the natural relationship between homocysteine and vitamin B deficiencies, blocking other inventors from developing better tests.

"The present-day implications of such a holding are limitless — and dangerous," LabCorp wrote in its brief. "Anyone who discovers a new medical correlation could stifle medical treatment through a 'test plus correlate' claim."

But Metabolite and its allies argue that such correlations are the basis of diagnostics and that not allowing patents would stifle development of new tests. There are tests, for instance, that look at mutations in particular genes to predict a high risk of breast cancer or to predict which AIDS drugs will not work.

"Hundreds, if not thousands, of patents would at once be called into question" if the ruling goes against Metabolite, said a brief jointly submitted by Perlegen Sciences, a company developing genetic tests, and Mohr Davidow Ventures, a venture capital firm that backs diagnostics companies.

Another question in the case is whether doctors could infringe the patent merely by looking at a test result for homocysteine and then thinking about vitamin deficiency. Indeed, the lower courts said LabCorp had not directly infringed but rather had induced doctors to infringe by performing the correlation.

Partly with that in mind, the American Medical Association, the American Heart Association and AARP have submitted briefs in support of LabCorp, arguing, in the words of the heart association, that the patent could have "devastating effects on patient health care."

Millions of homocysteine tests are done each year because high levels of the amino acid are associated with an increased risk of heart attack, stroke, birth defects and other diseases; people often take B vitamins to lower homocysteine and reduce the risk. (Clinical trial results announced last week, however, suggested that taking B vitamins did not prevent heart attacks.)

Court precedents have held that laws of nature, natural phenomena and abstract ideas cannot be patented. "Einstein could not patent his celebrated law that E = mc2; nor could Newton have patented the law of gravity," the Supreme Court wrote in a 1980 decision. '

But in a 1981 decision in Diamond v. Diehr — the last time the Supreme Court considered the issue — the court upheld a patent on a method of curing rubber that made use of a well-known equation governing chemical reactions. The court said that the equation was only part of a broader invention.

Glenn K. Beaton, an attorney for Metabolite, said that as in that 1981 case, "it's not the correlation itself that is patented here," but rather "the use of that correlation to determine B12 and folate deficiencies."

In recent years, controversial patents have been granted on software and on business methods, such as ways of managing investment portfolios or of allowing people to order merchandise on Amazon.com with one click of a mouse.

Bear Stearns, Lehman Brothers and the Computer and Communications Industry Association filed briefs urging the court to use the LabCorp case to restrict such business method patents, or at least not expand them. Other companies, including American Express and I.B.M., say the LabCorp case is not relevant to business method patents.

The solicitor general, in urging the court not to hear the case, said there was not enough of a record from the lower courts on the question of patenting natural phenomena. That is because LabCorp did not raise that argument in the lower courts, instead trying to get the claim invalidated on other grounds. If LabCorp wins the case in a way that weakens patents on diagnostic tests, it could be one of the bigger losers. The company, based in Burlington, N.C., is counting on high-priced, patented genetic tests to fuel its growth.

Bradford T. Smith, executive vice president for corporate affairs at LabCorp, disputed that. "We think this case can be decided very narrowly," without undermining other patents, many of which rely on more than just correlations, he said.

Innovation And Its Discontents (WSJ)

By Adam Jaffe And Josh Lerner

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

The problems of the U.S. patent system are under discussion today with an urgency not seen in decades. The Supreme Court will soon hear oral arguments in eBay v. MercExchange LLC, which promises to be its most far-reaching examination of patent law in many years. Today the court will also consider LabCorp v. Metabolite Laboratories -- the contested matter is whether a patent can be issued for the correlation between a disease and a naturally occurring substance in the human body. That is: Can you actually patent the laws of nature? And shockingly, Research in Motion has been forced to pay $612 million to prevent all of our BlackBerry handhelds from going dark, even though the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office (USPTO) has indicated that it is likely to find all of the patents behind this ransom demand invalid. Congressional subcommittees, with good reason, have recently held hearings asking fundamental questions about developments like these in the patent system.

The importance of this long-overdue focus on patents cannot be overemphasized. The past decade has seen periodic uproars over particular patents, such as Amazon's "one click" patent for online shopping. The troubling patents have been well publicized, but the wrong lessons have typically been drawn. Commentators have tended to focus on the incompetence of the USPTO in allowing "bad patents." Others have concluded that the patent system is not working with respect to a particular area of technology. Concerns about software awards led, for instance, Jeff Bezos of Amazon to propose a new patent type for software; others have suggested that biotechnology be excluded in various ways from the patent regime.

We believe, instead, that the problems with the patent system are systemic and fundamental, the result of two congressional changes to the patent system. At the time they were described as administrative and procedural rather than substantive; but taken together they have resulted in the most profound changes in U.S. patent policy and practice since 1836. One set of changes has made it easier to enforce patents, easier to get large financial awards from such enforcement, and harder for those accused of infringing patents to challenge the patents' validity; another set of changes has made patents much easier to get. The combination has created a perfect storm: a complex and intensifying combination of factors that increasingly makes the patent system a hindrance rather than a spur to innovation. * * *

Congress set us on this road in 1982 when it created a centralized appellate court for patent cases, the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit. Its decisions -- which advocates argued would simply ensure judicial consistency -- are largely responsible for the significant strengthening of the legal potency of patents. Then, a decade later, Congress turned the USPTO into a "profit center." The office has been pushed to return "excess" revenue to the U.S. Treasury. This shift led to pressures to grant more patents, difficulties in attracting and retaining skilled examiners, and a torrent of low-quality patent grants. These include such absurdities as patents on wristwatches (paw-watches?) for dogs, a method of swinging on a swing ("invented" by a five-year-old), and peanut butter and jelly sandwiches. But they also include the patents on broad ideas related to mobile email -- virtually devoid of any details of implementation -- that have imposed a $612 million tax on the maker and users of BlackBerries.

The combination of making patents easier to get and simultaneously more potent when enforced has led to an explosion in patent litigation. Holders of dubious patents -- be they established firms or "trolls" whose only business is patent enforcement -- routinely threaten firms that sell valuable products with shutdown based on alleged patent infringement. Even if the target firm believes that it does not infringe, or that the patents at the basis of the claim are invalid, the cost and risk of proving this in court may be too high. Innovators may choose simply to drop the allegedly offending product, or to settle and pay ransom rather than fight. This is not a problem confined to any single industry. Even in industries where patents have been traditionally rare, such as financial services, patent filings and litigation are exploding. Financial patents are being litigated at more than 10 times the rate of awards more generally.

It might be tempting to view patent law as just another area where litigation has spun out of control. But there is more at work here than a general increase in litigation; and its effects are particularly worrisome, because a faulty patent system can have profound impact on the overall process of innovation. The hugely successful BlackBerry may be able to bear an enormous "innovation tax" and still succeed, but other valuable but not-quite-blockbuster innovations may be driven from the market entirely.

The continued advancement of commercial technology is the basis for the long-term ability of our society to continuously improve our lives -- to promote health and longevity, protect and clean up the environment, and secure our safety against terrorism and other external threats. For all its deficiencies and periodic stumbles, our free-enterprise system has demonstrated a unique ability to generate new technology: Industrialized economies have increased their economic productivity more in the last two centuries than in all the millennia of previous human history. The basis for this advance is the pursuit of profit, which forces firms to innovate. But the profit-based incentive to innovate depends fundamentally on the institutions governing ownership of the fruits of innovation. Specifically, taking new ideas from the notebook to the market often requires huge investments in research and development. This is an inherently risky process, and risk is the enemy of investment.

The legal protection patents provide is supposed to mitigate the risks of these investments, but the flood of dubious patents that nonetheless have amplified legal force is increasing rather than mitigating the risks associated with investments in innovation. While we have not yet killed the geese that lay the golden eggs, we are increasingly hindering and distracting the people and firms that must breed, feed and care for the geese. If we continue on this course, it is inevitable that their output will decline. * * *

We believe that the incentives of the existing system induce all participants -- inventors, competitors and potential litigators -- to invest in abusing the system rather than innovating. Reform of the system must change these incentives by (1) changing the USPTO review process so that the determination of whether a patent application is really new is made with as much information as practical about what related technology is already out there; and (2) leveling the playing field between litigants so frivolous patent holders cannot intimidate true innovators into paying protection money.

Our proposed reforms start with the recognition that much of the information needed to decide if a given application should be approved is in the hands of competitors of the applicant, rather than the USPTO. A review process with multiple levels efficiently balances the need to bring in outside information with the reality that most patents are unimportant. Multilevel review -- with barriers to invoking review increasing at higher levels, along with the review's thoroughness -- would naturally focus attention on the most potentially important applications. Most patents would never receive anything other than the most basic examinations. But for those applications that really mattered, parties would have an incentive and opportunities to bring information in their possession before the USPTO, and the USPTO would have more resources to help it make the right decision. (Changes in this direction are at the heart of the patent reform bill currently under consideration in the House Subcommittee on Courts, the Internet and Intellectual Property.)

If bad patents with important consequences were weeded out by the USPTO, the incentive to file frivolous applications in the first place would be reduced. This would break the current self-stoking cycle in which inventors are induced to make marginal applications by their likelihood of success, and the resulting flood of applications overwhelms the patent office and makes it harder to separate the wheat from the chaff.

Breaking the vicious cycle of bad examination and bad applications is the key to reform of the patent review process. But there are always going to be mistakes, and so it is important that the court system operate efficiently to rectify those mistakes, while protecting holders of valid patents. Today, the legal playing field is significantly tilted in favor of patentees.

The reliance on jury trials is a critical problem. The evidence in a patent case can be highly technical, and the average juror has little competence to evaluate it. Having decisions made by people who can't really understand the evidence increases the uncertainty surrounding the outcome. The combination of this uncertainty with the legal presumption of validity -- the rule that patents must be presumed legitimate unless proven otherwise -- is a big reason why accused infringers often settle rather than fight even when they think they are right.

The right to a jury of one's peers is a venerated concept in Anglo-American law. But there is ample scope for judges to use pretrial rulings and reports of special "masters" commissioned by the court to resolve more of the most technical issues that determine the outcome of patent litigation. While litigation will always be uncertain, it has to be structured so that complex technical issues are addressed in a way designed to elucidate rather than obscure.

The protection for true innovators created by a workable patent system is vital to technological change and economic growth. The problems in the existing patent system are structural, and the fundamental solutions need to be structural as well. As much as the USPTO needs to do a better job, it can only do so if the system is modified so that all parties have incentives to help with the job, and the courts provide a reliable backstop when mistakes are made.

Kerr-McGee Sues To Dispute Federal Royalties (WSJ)

By Steve Levine

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

Kerr-McGee Corp., at a time of rising political scrutiny of oil-company profits, is suing the federal government to avoid about $108 million in royalties on its deep-water production in the Gulf of Mexico.

The issue of royalty payments on Gulf-of-Mexico oil properties owned by the federal government has attracted much criticism in Congress because of high gasoline prices and record oil-company financial results. Some lawmakers have called for a windfall-profits tax on the industry, though such a levy still appears to be a long shot.

In all, the Interior Department estimates that royalty exemptions in the Gulf of Mexico could cost the U.S. treasury some $7 billion over time, depending on the price of oil and the level of production.

Kerr-McGee, which produces oil and natural gas from 17 deep-water fields in the Gulf, filed suit Friday in federal court in Lake Charles, La. The Oklahoma City company is seeking to overturn a January order by the department's Minerals Management Service division that Kerr-McGee and other oil companies pay more in royalties for the fields. Most oil companies complied with the order, but Kerr-McGee was among three that didn't pay.

The case involves fallout from a 1995 congressional act that, at a time of relatively low oil prices and shrinking U.S. production, attempted to increase oil and natural-gas production from the deep-water sections of the Gulf of Mexico. Water depths there often exceed 2,500 feet, and exploration is expensive and riskier than elsewhere. The congressional act exempted oil companies from royalty payments for millions of barrels of deep-water production for leases obtained from 1996 to 2000 as long as world prices didn't exceed a certain level.

The threshold for those leases last year was $34.71 per barrel for oil and $4.34 per million British thermal units for natural gas. Yesterday in New York, oil futures fell $2.35, or 3.7%, to settle at $60.42 a barrel. Natural-gas futures fell 21.8 cents per million British thermal units, or 3.1%, to $6.835.

But, in addition to a price threshold, Kerr-McGee argues the act allowed the companies royalty-free production of tens of millions of barrels regardless of the price of oil. For example, for fields deeper than about 2,600 feet, the companies could produce 87.5 million barrels of oil without paying a royalty. Kerr-McGee says its fields haven't reached that maximum yet. Meanwhile, the company said it has placed $108 million in disputed royalties into a reserve account until the issue is resolved.

Amerada Hess Corp. said in its annual filing last week with the Securities and Exchange Commission that it is withholding $34 million in royalty payments to the government in a similar dispute.

Walter Cruickshank, deputy director for the Minerals Management Service, said that the Interior Department believes that the companies are obligated to pay royalties once the price threshold is breached, regardless of how much oil they have produced. He said the department will argue the point in Kerr-McGee's court case.

In congressional testimony this month, Mr. Cruickshank said that, as of January, 28 companies weren't disputing the government's royalties demands, that seven others had either paid in full or part while they disputed the request, and that three others hadn't made any payments.

Another issue that has provoked criticism is a disclosure by Interior Department officials that, for reasons they can't explain, the price threshold was lifted for some 1,100 leases made in 1998 and 1999. That meant that, regardless of prices, oil could be drilled royalty-free in those fields.

Critics in Congress say the absence of the threshold for those years could cost the federal government billions of dollars in lost royalties over time. Critics in a House hearing this month said that there should be no royalty relief when oil prices have risen above $60 a barrel, and the oil companies have faced a storm of objections from editorial writers around the country. For 2005, Kerr-McGee reported net income of $3.2 billion on $5.9 billion in revenue.

U.S. Expects Bird Flu This Year (USAT)

By Anita Manning

Leaders of three federal agencies on Monday said bird flu could reach the USA this year on the wings of migratory birds, but the appearance of the flu strain "will not constitute a reason for panic," Department of Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said.

"We are closely monitoring the rapid spread of the (bird flu) overseas, and we now believe it is likely we will detect it within our borders in the U.S.," he said. "It is important to understand a detection of this virus in birds does not signal the start of a pandemic in people."

The highly pathogenic H5N1 has spread across Asia, Europe and parts of Africa. It is contagious and deadly to poultry and many species of wild birds, and it has infected at least 177 people, killing 98. The virus can't spread easily in humans, but scientists warn it could mutate into a form that is contagious among people, causing a pandemic. (Graphic:

Interior Secretary Gale Norton said a program to test up to 100,000 wild birds for signs of infection this year will focus on breeding grounds in Alaska and islands in the Pacific where migrating birds from Asia are now heading.

All samples taken from birds that test positive for the H5N1 virus will undergo further testing to determine if the strain is highly pathogenic or a more benign form, known as low pathogenic North American H5N1, which previously has been found in the USA and Canada.

She said officials expect up to 100 probable H5N1 test results may be found this year, and tests to determine whether they're the highly pathogenic form may take up to 10 days.

"During that time, the public will need to understand this is a disease of birds," Norton said.

Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said it's important to prepare but to keep matters in perspective. "At this point, if you're a bird, it's a pandemic. If you're a human being, it is not," he said.

HHS is funding development of vaccines for possible pandemic flu strains and is stockpiling drugs and other medical supplies. The United States expects to have 26 million courses of the anti-viral drug Tamiflu on hand by the end of this year, he said.

But local communities need to make their own pandemic plans, Leavitt said.

"Any community that fails to prepare with the expectation that the federal government will, at the last moment, be able to come to the rescue will be tragically wrong. Not because the federal government lacks will, not because we lack wallet, but because there is no way in which 5,000 different communities can be responded to simultaneously, which is a unique characteristic of a human pandemic."

Meanwhile, the Food and Drug Administration said it will ban the use of Tamiflu and other human anti-flu drugs in poultry. The drugs are not labeled for use in poultry, but veterinarians can legally use them off-label to prevent flu in animals.

World health experts fear overuse of the drugs in animals could encourage the emergence of flu strains that are resistant to the anti-virals, according to the FDA.

U.S. To Increase Testing Of Wild Birds For Avian Flu (WP)

By Rob Stein

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

Federal officials announced plans yesterday to sharply increase testing of wild birds to try to detect the arrival of the deadly avian flu in the United States as early as possible and stanch any outbreaks of disease.

With the virus spreading worldwide, officials predicted it could show up in this country as early as later this year, most likely in wild birds during their annual migration from Asia through Alaska.

"It is increasingly likely that we will detect a highly pathogenic H5N1 strain of avian flu in birds within U.S. borders, possibly as early as this year," Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton said in announcing the plan with Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns and Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt. "We are working together to expand our early-warning system."

The dangerous bird flu virus, known as H5N1, has spread from Asia into parts of Europe and Africa, killing or forcing the destruction of millions of chickens and other birds. So far the virus has mainly affected birds, but it has killed 98 people -- about half of those who have been infected. All the victims had close contact with poultry. Officials fear the virus could mutate in a way that makes it spread easily from person to person, sparking a devastating worldwide pandemic.

U.S. wildlife experts have been monitoring wild migratory birds since the virus emerged in Asia in 1997. They have tested 12,000 in Alaska since 1998 and 4,000 traveling across the Atlantic since 2000. Officials have been focusing on Alaska because it is a crossroad for bird migration. No birds have tested positive.

Under the new plan, officials expect to collect 75,000 to 100,000 samples from live and dead wild birds this year, along with 50,000 samples of water or feces from waterfowl habitats across the United States. Officials also plan to investigate any disease outbreaks in wild birds and do spot checks of birds killed by hunters, as well as those being sold in live bird markets and being raised by farmers. The effort is part of the Bush administration's $29 million plan to protect the country against the virus.

"None of us can build a cage around the United States. We have to be prepared to deal with the virus here," Johanns said.

If an infected bird is detected, officials plan to immediately quarantine the area and kill any infected birds to stem the spread of the virus. In addition to human health concerns, officials worry that the virus could devastate the $29 billion poultry industry.

Officials stressed that they expect perhaps dozens of false alarms because of increased testing, and that even if a genuine case is found it does not necessarily mean an outbreak will occur.

"The detection of highly pathogenic H5N1 virus in the United States would not constitute a reason for panic," the agriculture secretary said.

Bird Flu May Arrive In U.S. This Year (AP-Y2)

By Libby Quaid

AP2, March 21, 2006

Bird flu is likely to arrive this year in the United States, with the increased testing of tens of thousands of wild birds expected to reveal dozens of suspected cases, the Bush administration said Monday.

Officials will test 75,000 to 100,000 wild birds this year, or nearly six times the number screened since 1998, according to a government plan finalized Monday. The government also plans to quarantine and destroy any poultry flocks where the virus appears.

The wild bird testing could reveal 20 to 100 suspected cases of bird flu, although follow-up testing is likely to reveal "dozens" are false alarms, Interior Secretary Gale Norton said. The emphasis will be on Alaska and other spots along the Pacific flyway, a common route that migratory birds follow into the U.S., possibly carrying the virus as they do. Tests will also be run on 50,000 water and bird dropping samples from waterfowl habitats, the government said.

Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt stressed that people are not yet at risk from the virus, which has ravaged wild and domestic birds alike in Asia, Africa and Europe.

"At this point, if you're a bird, it's a pandemic. If you're a human, it's not a pandemic," Leavitt said.

Norton cautioned that while officials plan to announce any positive tests for bird flu, it will take another five to 10 days for the Agriculture Department's laboratory in Ames, Iowa, to confirm the results.

"This is a disease of birds and not humans, at this point. Finding a bird with the disease does not signal a pandemic," Norton said.

Human cases of bird flu have been rare, but scientists fear the virus could mutate into a form easily spread among people, sparking a worldwide epidemic. For now, wild birds are getting much of the government's attention.

Officials also worry the virus might spread from wild birds to the nearly 10 billion chickens raised each year in the U.S. Authorities say cooking kills the virus and it is safe to eat properly handled and cooked poultry.

Commercial poultry companies already test every flock for bird flu. If the deadly virus shows up in a commercial bird, the entire flock would be quarantined and killed, and the area would be disinfected. Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said the government would compensate farmers for their destroyed flocks.

Unlike in many of the countries affected by bird flu, the U.S. has a highly consolidated, $29 billion poultry industry that raises the majority of its birds in controlled, indoor facilities. That minimizes contact between wild and domestic birds.

"Our producers are as eager as we are to protect the safety of our poultry," Johanns said.

While the deadly strain of the virus has not yet been found in the U.S., other strains have. Birds, like humans, have a flu season. Less virulent "low-pathogenic" flu viruses are common. But three times — in 1924, 1983 and 2004 — a lethal, "highly pathogenic" strain has emerged in the U.S.

Also Monday, the government banned veterinarians from using human antiviral drugs, such as Tamiflu, to treat animals. The goal is to ensure the drugs remain effective in people. A spokesman for the National Chicken Council said the industry does not use the drugs.

Interior Secretary Says Bird Flu Due This Year (LAT)

By From Times Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, March 21, 2006

Bird flu is likely to arrive this year in the United States, with the increased testing of tens of thousands of wild birds expected to reveal dozens of suspected cases, Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton said.

Officials will test 75,000 to 100,000 wild birds this year, according to a government plan. The government also plans to quarantine and destroy any poultry flocks where the virus appears.

Business Prepares For The Possibility Of Avian Flu In The United States (NYT)

By Melanie Warner

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

The deadly strain of avian flu has not been found anywhere in the Western Hemisphere, but Mark Holden, a chicken grower for Tyson Foods in Ellijay, Ga., is not taking any chances.

Every seven weeks a group of his chickens is tested before the birds are sent to be slaughtered. All people who enter or leave the chicken houses must walk through disinfecting baths. And visitors and workers must wear plastic booties over their shoes.

"Even though we don't have any outbreak now, we want to take all the precautions we can to protect our product," said Mr. Holden, who has been in the chicken business for 10 years and lives across the street from one of his chicken houses.

Poultry producers and restaurants doubt that their chickens will be infected by avian flu or that people would catch the virus even if there were contamination. But they are concerned that if the virus gets to the United States, people will eat less chicken, simply out of fear. And they are revving up big plans to be prepared.

In Senate testimony earlier this month, Michael Leavitt, secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services, declared that it was "just a matter of time" before birds infected with the virus found their way to the United States.

The stakes are enormous. United States poultry producers like Tyson, Pilgrim's Pride and Gold Kist sell 26 billion pounds of chicken each year. Restaurant chains — chief among them McDonald's, KFC and Wendy's — sell 45 percent of that.

Sales of chicken are growing. Over the last 10 years, consumption of chicken has increased by 22 percent, while beef consumption has remained flat, according to the Department of Agriculture.

If Europe and Asia are any indication, chicken sales could take quite a hit. In February, after avian flu was discovered in wild swans, poultry consumption declined 70 percent in Italy. In France, sales are down 30 percent since avian flu hit a turkey farm last month. In some areas of India, sales are down 40 percent since last month's discovery of avian flu in chickens.

These declines came even though none of the 175 human cases of avian flu confirmed by the World Health Organization since 2003 resulted from eating poultry.

Dick Thompson, a spokesman for the World Health Organization, said most of the cases of humans contracting avian flu have been from people coming into direct contact with infected poultry, though one case in Vietnam appears to have been a result of someone drinking infected duck blood.

Public health officials consider it unlikely that people will catch the virus from eating chicken. Chicken producers say that any sick birds would immediately be destroyed and would not enter the market. While the deadly strain of avian flu, called H5N1, now hitting Europe and Asia can reside in poultry meat, the virus is killed by the temperatures normally used to cook poultry.

Nonetheless, a Harvard School of Public Health nationwide telephone survey of 1,043 adults in January found that 46 percent of respondents who eat chicken said they would stop eating it if avian flu hit the United States poultry industry.

In October, Yum Brands, which owns KFC, told investors that, based on its experiences with avian flu in China, it estimated that in the worst situation, chicken sales would drop 10 percent to 20 percent if there were widespread concerns about avian flu.

Chicken processors and restaurant chains are already working feverishly to minimize any sales declines. Companies are working on communications strategies that can be set into motion at a moment's notice. These plans deal with avian flu in birds and not the feared hypothetical mutation of the virus into a human-to-human form. Future mutations could make avian flu contagious among humans, and possibly generate a pandemic.

Tyson, Pilgrim's Pride, KFC, Chick-fil-A and Popeyes Chicken and Biscuits all say they have formed internal avian flu task forces that meet regularly and include top executives and leaders from different departments. These executives have been meeting with government health officials, discussing what information should go on the companies' Web sites and when, and devising sales loss projections.

Popeyes Chicken and Biscuits, the country's No. 3 chicken chain behind KFC and Chick-fil-A, said its task force met weekly, often in conjunction with the Ledlie Group, an Atlanta-based crisis management agency. KFC said that it had created TV and print ads aimed at convincing people that eating fully cooked chicken was safe. The ad campaign, which was produced by Creative Alliance, an agency in Louisville, Ky., where Yum Brands is based, is ready to go if a crisis strikes.

Tyson, the country's largest chicken producer, is working on an ad campaign that will run if chicken sales decline, or if consumers start to get nervous.

McDonald's, the country's largest restaurant buyer of chicken, said it had been working on avian flu contingency plans, but declined to discuss details.

At many chain restaurants, including McDonald's, chicken has helped bolster sales more than any other menu item. In presentations to analysts and investors, McDonald's has credited its new line of higher-priced premium chicken sandwiches and its chicken-topped premium salads with increasing sales at outlets in the United States that have been open for more than a year.

Arby's, which is known for its roast beef sandwiches but gets 15 percent of its sales from chicken products, said it was spending more money than it had for any other new product to promote its new line of so-called chicken naturals. Chicken naturals are all chicken, with no added water or chemicals.

Some analysts think avian flu in birds, like mad cow disease in beef, may turn out to be a nonissue for consumers. Since mad cow was first discovered in the United States in late 2003, beef consumption has remained constant, according to the National Cattlemen's Beef Association.

"In the U.S. I think we generally have a greater trust in the government to ensure food safety than they do in Europe and Asia," said John Glass, an analyst at CIBC World Markets. "I'd be surprised if U.S. consumers really react to this."

But some in the chicken industry worry that avian flu will be much more frightening to consumers than mad cow. "I get asked about it all the time," said Steve Gold, vice president for marketing at Murray's Chicken, a producer of humanely raised chicken. "I think people have this idea that it's going to be like Alfred Hitchcock with all these birds flying into their community and everyone getting sick."

Mr. Gold notes that unlike mad cow, avian flu is highly contagious among birds and has the potential to travel long distances in unpredictable patterns.

He and others in the chicken industry are busy honing a message that the nation's chicken populations are well protected from wild, migratory birds that may be the initial carriers of the disease.

A Web site set up by the National Chicken Council, the National Turkey Federation and the Egg Safety Center (www.avianinfluenzainfo.com) promotes the industry's modern system of enclosed, confined chicken growing as an effective line of defense against the spread of avian flu.

The 20,000 to 24,000 birds that reside in a single growing house on the average industrial chicken farm lack access to the outdoors, or even to sunlight — something that has long drawn criticism from animal welfare activists and has helped fuel the growth in free-range and humanely produced chicken. The virtue of isolating chickens, said Richard Lobb, a spokesman for the National Chicken Council, is that no chicken is likely to come into contact with wild birds that may be infected.

He added that while thousands of free-roaming and backyard chickens were infected in Thailand in 2004, none of the country's large-scale, commercial chicken flocks in enclosed facilities were hit.

Mr. Lobb said chickens sold as free-range or organic, meaning they are allowed access to the outdoors, may be more susceptible to avian flu transmission, but this group represents less than 1 percent of the chicken production.

The Egg Safety Center said that consumers should not worry about eggs being infected with the avian flu virus because sick hens either stop laying eggs or lay poor-quality eggs that would not be acceptable for sale.

Some government officials said that if avian flu arrived on United States shores, it would probably be from migratory birds.

Susan Haseltine, assistant director for biology at the United States Geological Survey and an expert on bird migration, said government scientists had their eyes on the bird pathways from Asia to Alaska. "One species with high potential is the pintail," Ms. Haseltine said. "It migrates from Alaska to the southern U.S., to the Gulf Coast and Southern California. They have the ability to fly long distances."

The Department of Agriculture said that since 2000, 12,000 tests had been done on birds in western Alaska and none had been found with the deadly version of avian flu. Ms. Haseltine said there was little bird passage across the Atlantic from Europe.

Other experts say that avian flu is more likely to reach the United States through the illicit trade of poultry from infected countries. Importing birds or poultry meat from countries that have had outbreaks of avian flu is banned, but Rob Fergus, science coordinator for the National Audubon Society, said there were probably instances of smuggled products. "There are a lot of holes in biosecurity in our ports. I'm much more concerned about poultry shipments than wild birds," he said.

There is, of course, still the small chance that North America may be somehow spared from avian flu. But companies like Chick-fil-A are not counting on that. "The question is not if, but when," said Don Perry, a spokesman for Chick-fil-A. "You can't put big nets in the sky to prevent birds from flying here."

FDA To Ban Poultry Use Of 2 Drug Types On Flu Fears (WSJ)

By Jane Zhang

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON – Federal regulators, amid concern of a possible avian-flu pandemic, moved to ban the poultry industry from using two groups of human antiviral drugs to treat their flocks, for fear that may reduce their effectiveness in humans.

The Food and Drug Administration said beginning this summer, it is proposing to ban veterinarians from prescribing off-label, nonhuman uses of Roche Holding AG's Tamiflu and GlaxoSmithKline PLC's Relenza; amantadine (used in generics such as Symmetrel by Endo Pharmaceuticals Holdings Inc.) and rimantadine (used in Flumadine, by Forest Laboratories Inc.). The U.S. has been stockpiling drugs for a possible avian-flu outbreak in humans.

Not one of those drugs is approved for animal treatment, but under a 1994 law, the FDA allows such use. The FDA has the right to ban them if they cause public-health concerns. This is the first time that the FDA has banned human antiviral drugs for animal use.

The FDA and the U.S. poultry industry say these drugs haven't been used in poultry here yet. They are often more expensive than the cost of the birds they would treat. China used one of the drugs last year to treat flocks; this caused resistance to the drug by an avian-influenza strain, said Stephen Sundlof, director of the FDA's Center for Veterinary Medicine. International agencies, such as the World Health Organization and the Food and Agriculture Organization, have called for the ban to prevent the development of resistant strains.

Dr. Sundlof called the move a precautionary measure. He expects the proposal, which is open to public comment until May 22, will become a final rule June 30.

PREVENTING A PANDEMIC

1 • See an FAQ on avian flu2, an interactive global map3 and track the latest developments in the Avian Flu News Tracker4.

• Plus, see complete coverage5.

The announcement follows the agency's decision last year to ban an antibiotic used in chickens and turkeys, citing evidence that the antibiotic's use might lead to pathogens that could withstand drugs used to fight human illness. The agency's reasoning for yesterday's move on antiviral drugs sprang from similar concerns about resistant strains. Because influenza viruses mutate, resistance to antiviral drugs can leave fewer treatment choices.

The FDA ban is part of a White House campaign to convince the public that it is preparing for the deadly Asian strain of H5N1, which several officials have said could arrive in Asian birds migrating to Alaska. Finding the Asian strain of H5N1 in wild U.S. birds is "increasingly likely," said Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton.

The U.S. has an "early warning system" to test as many as 100,000 wild birds this year in Alaska and the Pacific Coast flyway, believed to be where the avian flu might show up in the U.S. first, given migratory patterns.

The Agriculture Department allows the poultry industry to use vaccine to treat some viral-respiratory diseases, but the industry doesn't use human antiviral drugs to treat influenza in poultry, said Richard Lobb, spokesman for the National Chicken Council, a Washington trade group. The chicken industry has vowed to test all flocks for avian flu before sending them to the market, and destroy those infected with some strains, Mr. Lobb said.

Terence Hurley, a Roche spokesman, says the Swiss drug maker has heard of isolated cases of Tamiflu being used in cats and dogs, but not in poultry. "Tamiflu is approved for use in people, not animals."

Michael Fleming, a GlaxoSmithKline spokesman, says the United Kingdom company hasn't studied the impact of Relenza, an inhaled product, on animals. Both companies say they support the FDA decision.

Forest Laboratories and Endo Pharmaceuticals Holdings declined to comment.

Scientists Oppose Move On Grizzlies (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0019746

By The New York Times

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

HELENA, Mont., March 20 — A group of 269 biologists and other scientists from around the country asked the Fish and Wildlife Service on Monday not to lift the protections given to the Yellowstone grizzly bear by the Endangered Species Act.

Doing that, they said, could jeopardize its survival.

A letter from the scientists came on the last day of the comment period on the agency's plan to remove protection for the bear. The service has said that the bear population, estimated at 500 to 600, is fully recovered and growing at 4 percent a year. There are safeguards to restore protection, federal biologists say, if the numbers decline.

Some environmental groups, including the National Wildlife Federation, support the move to remove the bear from the endangered list.

The letter from opponents of the move says the Yellowstone grizzly is cut off from other bears, and therefore new sources of DNA. Because of that, the population needs to be 2,000 to 3,000, the scientists say, to survive a catastrophic event, like disease or the loss of a critical food source.

Conservationists Vie To Buy Forest Habitat (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

FORT BRAGG, Calif. -- The Big River tract in California's Mendocino County is a sprawling expanse of towering redwoods and Douglas firs, woods that for years have provided an ideal habitat for rare spotted owls and endangered coho salmon and steelhead trout. Now, it's all up for sale.

Big River, neighboring Salmon Creek and dozens of other forests across the nation have come on the market in recent years as timber companies shed holdings that are worth more as real estate than as a source of lumber. The trend has spurred a land rush that has conservation groups scrambling to raise money to buy environmentally sensitive tracts in competition with private investors seeking to snap up the land for development.

A recent U.S. Forest Service study predicted that more than 44 million acres of private forest land, an area twice the size of Maine, will be sold over the next 25 years. The consulting firm U.S. Forest Capital estimates that half of all U.S. timberland has changed hands in the past decade. The Bush administration also wants to sell off forest land, by auctioning more than 300,000 acres of national forest to fund a rural school program.

"The nation has never seen anything like this," said Conservation Fund President Lawrence A. Selzer, whose 20-year-old group is hoping to raise $48 million in the coming months to buy the 16,000 acres that make up Big River and Salmon Creek. "It has the potential to permanently and profoundly change the landscape of America."

The United States still has large swaths of forest -- much of it private -- that provide critical habitat for large animals such as bears and cougars as well as recreational opportunities for the public. But if the selling spree continues, environmentalists fear, these areas could be cut up into much smaller parcels in which condominiums and trailer parks would replace soaring trees.

The sales have attracted limited national attention because they are mostly private transactions and involve local planning decisions, but the stakes are enormous. In the Pacific Northwest, New England, Southeast and parts of the upper Midwest, traditional timber companies or newly emerging timber investment management organizations, known as TIMOs, own vast stretches of forest that rival the national forest system.

Today, a third of the U.S. land mass is forest -- the same proportion as in 1907 but just 71 percent of what existed before settlement by Europeans -- and 57 percent of it is privately owned. But competition from cheap imported lumber, soaring land prices and pressure from Wall Street are now prompting timber companies to sell.

Stephen Levesque, the Campbell Timberland Management area manager who oversees the company's forest holdings in Mendocino, said new state regulations have made lumber operations increasingly expensive and developers have come by with tempting offers. The company recently sold off 160 acres that are likely to become lots for residential homes. "There's tremendous pressure for development," Levesque said.

International Paper Co. spokeswoman Amy J. Sawyer said her company is "contemplating selling some or all" of its 6.8 million acres of forest land scattered across the country and focusing on producing more profitable products such as uncoated papers and packages.

"We're exploring whether there's more value in holding and operating the land or in selling it," Sawyer said. "That's what we're weighing."

And the St. Joe Co., a onetime timber and paper outfit, is pushing to build on tens of thousands of its acres on Florida's Emerald Coast. Advocacy groups such as the Natural Resources Defense Council are fighting to preserve the land, whose longleaf pine forests, cypress swamps and wetlands sustain red cockaded woodpeckers and dozens of other endangered and threatened species.

Environmental groups such as the Conservation Fund, the Nature Conservancy and the New England Forest Foundation have tried to limit the environmental impact of the sell-off by purchasing habitats that hold the greatest ecological value, but they cannot afford to buy all the vast expanses and halt this trend outright.

Chris Larson, executive director of Northern California's Mattole Restoration Council, an environmental group, said groups such as his are analyzing the Securities and Exchange Commission filings of timber companies to gauge whether they might sell their holdings to ease their debt. "People are just learning how to do this," he said.

In several instances, they have been able to close a deal. In 2004, the Conservation Fund bought 24,000 acres of working forest along the Garcia River in Mendocino County from Hawthorne Timber Co. for $18 million. It plans to begin logging some trees there this summer to make enough money to pay property taxes and restore key ecological areas.

Now the fund is hoping to buy the Big River and Salmon Creek tracts from Hawthorne and to create a business model other environmental groups can follow.

"We need to move away from this black-or-white idea that either it's preserved or destroyed, it's a national park or not enough," said Chris Kelly, who heads the fund's California office. "If you're trying to protect a landscape, if you're trying to protect 300,000 acres, it's impractical" to preserve the entire area as pristine wilderness, Kelly said.

In November, the Conservation Fund bought nearly 7,700 acres of the most sensitive lands along the headwaters of Maine's Machias River. A month later, it bought 1,600 acres of land in Georgia, just a fraction of the roughly 300,000 acres timber giant Weyerhaeuser recently sold in the state. Fund officials resold the tract to state officials, who plan to turn the area into a nature preserve.

Rex R. Boner, a vice president at the fund, said his and other environmental groups would like to buy more land but "we just don't have the collective ability to do that."

The forest sales have sparked a sense of urgency among conservationists because the holdings constitute much of the remaining intact ecosystems outside of public lands, he said: "It's sort of like Humpty Dumpty. If they're sold, we'll never get them back together again."

Like Georgia, Maine reveals both the promise and the pitfalls of the forest land rush. Maine has the largest contiguous block of undeveloped forest east of the Mississippi -- at least 10 million acres, or more than half of the state's entire land mass. Most of it was once owned by paper companies, but this is shifting quickly. According to the Massachusetts-based Manomet Center for Conservation Sciences, 20 million acres changed hands in Maine's North Woods, north of Bangor, between 1980 and 2000.

In several cases, conservationists, working with local communities and business owners, have been able to stem development's tide. Jeff McEvoy owns Weatherby's lodge in Grand Lake Stream, a town on the edge of Maine's North Woods. When Typhoon LLC, a timber investment company, wanted to sell off 339,000 acres in the region, the New England Forestry Foundation raised $30 million along with locals, enough to buy the development rights and create a 27,000-acre working forest that is logged but supports wildlife.

"People come here for the pristine wilderness experience," said McEvoy, who runs hunting and fishing trips out of a lodge that has thrived for 130 years.

In the nearby town of Greenville, however, a real estate investment trust called Plum Creek Timber Co. has been buying and converting forests into residential and vacation homes. Last year, it proposed turning a stretch of forest into two resorts and nearly 1,000 private lots. Maine's Land Use Regulatory Commission initially rejected the application, and in the coming weeks the company is expected to submit a more environmentally friendly proposal.

In Big River, however, timber companies and conservationists have been able to make common cause. Levesque and his bosses at Campbell Timberland Management would prefer to sell some of their forest to the Conservation Fund so the community can keep its logging jobs and wildlife can continue to thrive. A fisheries biologist with a master's degree in forest hydrology and engineering, Levesque is as enamored of Big Creek as the environmentalists hoping to buy it.

"These are special places," he said, looking up at the redwoods standing by the river's edge. "It's kind of an ecologist's dream."

The Bush administration's accommodation of the mining industry — notably by packing the mine safety agencies with pro-management appointees — has produced a marked decline in major fines for negligent companies. A recent data analysis by The Times documented a risky, business-friendly downturn in penalties since 2001. At the same time, nearly half of the announced fines still go uncollected.

With a rash of 24 mine deaths so far this year, Congress is considering tougher fines of up to $500,000 for culpable companies. But what good are fines if they are not being forcefully used by the federal agencies supposedly responsible for workers' safety? This question must be asked in deadly earnest in the case of the Sago Mine in West Virginia, where a dozen miners perished in January. The company was later found to have been cited for 273 violations in two years' time, not one of them costing more than $460.

Under present practices, fines are rarely levied at the maximum level, and even then companies can negotiate the penalties downward through an industry-friendly appeals process. Fines as low as $60, if collected, amount to jaywalking tickets.

Beyond the slump in fines, the administration's record has been distinguished by budget and job cuts in critical mine safety agencies. Lately, there's been a flurry of reform proposals in response to the deaths in the headlines. But an administration that prefers to fill key regulatory positions with mining lobbyists and executives has a long way to go toward miner safety. It should begin with an urgent reversal of its embarrassing record on penalizing flagrantly negligent companies.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

2 Cos. In FBI Computer Team Cited In Audit (WP/AP)

By MARK SHERMAN, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Two companies that will share in a new FBI computer contract were singled out in a government audit Monday that questioned $17 million in the agency's computer overhaul.

The FBI and its contractors share the blame for $10 million in questionable costs and for 1,205 pieces of missing computer equipment valued at $7.6 million, the Government Accountability Office said in its review of the FBI's Trilogy program.

Two of those companies, CACI and Computer Sciences Corp., are part of the Lockheed Martin Corp. team that last week won a six-year, $305 million contract to build and run the FBI's Sentinel computerized case management system. The total value of the Sentinel project is $425 million.

FBI officials said they were applying the lessons learned in the Trilogy computer upgrade, including keeping tighter reins on their contractors. Sentinel is the replacement for the failed project that was to have been the final piece of Trilogy.

The questionable costs included first-class air travel for government contractors, excessive overtime and $5.5 million in charges that lacked substantiation, the report by Congress' investigative and audit agency said.

The FBI was "highly vulnerable to payments of unallowable costs" because of lax oversight, auditors said.

El Segundo, Calif.-based Computer Sciences, or CSC, was the principal contractor in the effort to put in place a high-speed, secure computer network and 30,000 new desktop computers for the FBI. CACI of Arlington, Va., essentially reported to CSC.

Auditors identified a $456,211 invoice from CACI for which CSC never received sufficient evidence, but paid anyway. "It's not what we asked for but at this point it doesn't really matter. Approve it," one CSC employee wrote another in an e-mail exchange that was included in the GAO report.

In another bill from CSC to the FBI, all but $44,000 of a $1.95 million invoice was listed as "other direct costs" with no additional explanation provided.

Auditors also identified as excessive the $52,000 CACI spent on 60,000 pens that were custom-made for FBI computer training sessions.

CSC spokesman Chuck Taylor said his company complied with its contract, using first-class travel only to accommodate last-minute schedule changes when lower fares were not available. CSC's billings were within approved limits, Taylor said. CACI did not immediately comment Monday.

A separate report last week from Justice Department inspector general Glenn A. Fine warned that costs could again get out of hand unless the FBI puts strong controls in place. Bureau officials have said they are doing just that.

"The lessons learned from the Trilogy program are guiding us, and the FBI continues to strengthen our internal controls," said FBI spokeswoman Cathy Milhoan.

The CSC unit that worked on Trilogy will not be part of the Sentinel project, Milhoan said. CACI will provide training for new system, as it did for Trilogy, she said.

The FBI has since accounted for more than 1,000 of the missing desktop and laptop computers, printers and servers, she said. The bureau also will seek repayment of inappropriate charges identified by a final audit of Trilogy that has yet to be finished, Milhoan said.

ATF Team To Target Atlanta's Violence (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales yesterday said Atlanta would become the 23rd U.S. city assigned a federal Violent Crime Impact Team in an aggressive effort to make that city safer.

"The citizens of the city of Atlanta deserve to live free from violent crime," Mr. Gonzales said in announcing the law-enforcement initiative during a press conference at the U.S. attorney's office in Atlanta. "VCIT will help make Atlanta safer through a coordinated campaign to investigate and prosecute those individuals who threaten our communities with guns and violence."

Washington, Baltimore and Richmond are among the other cities participating in the VCIT program.

The VCIT teams, led by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, consist of ATF agents, U.S. marshals, Drug Enforcement Administration agents and federal prosecutors who partner with state and local law-enforcement officers and prosecutors to proactively and aggressively identify, arrest and prosecute those responsible for firearms-related offenses and other violent crimes.

"Make no mistake about it; Violent Crime Impact Teams have saved lives by getting armed criminals off the streets," said ATF Director Carl J. Truscott.

Mr. Truscott said the teams use technology and human intelligence to identify geographic areas within cities with violent firearms crime; identify the "worst" violent offenders, the criminal organizations that support them and armed career criminals; and use criminal investigations and investigative tools and resources to disrupt and dismantle criminal activity being perpetrated by the targeted persons and organizations.

He said they also arrest and prosecute those persons and their associates in the federal or state jurisdiction that lends itself to the maximum penalty; work with community leaders to cultivate solid and sustained commitment between the community's residents and law enforcement; and evaluate results on a regular monthly basis to assess VCIT progress toward achieving the initiative's goals.

Since its inception in June 2004, Mr. Truscott said, the teams have made 8,892 arrests and recovered 8,485 firearms in the areas where VCIT is deployed -- working in conjunction with Project Safe Neighborhoods (PSN), a strategy geared toward combating gun crime in communities across the country.

VCIT builds on the success of PSN, he said, by adding additional resources to lower the number of homicides and other violent firearms-related crimes in targeted areas.

Other VCIT teams are in Albuquerque, N.M.; Baton Rouge, La.; Camden, N.J.; Columbus, Ohio; Fresno, Calif.; Greensboro, N.C.; Hartford, Conn.; Houston and Laredo, Texas; Las Vegas; Los Angeles; Miami; Minneapolis; New Orleans; Philadelphia; Pittsburgh; Tampa, Fla.; Tucson, Ariz.; and Tulsa, Okla.

U.S. Attorney General Targets Violent Crime, Meth In Georgia (AP)

By Doug Gross

AP, March 21, 2006

WALESKA, Ga. - Anti-methamphetamine laws like the ones passed in Georgia are tamping down the domestic production of the deadly drug, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Monday.

But Gonzales said an increase in the amount of meth being smuggled into the country from Mexico threatens to offset those advances.

Gonzales joined Gov. Sonny Perdue at a town-hall meeting of law enforcement officials, community activists and others on what they called the methamphetamine crisis in the state.

"Meth threatens to turn the American dream into the American nightmare - not just for the users, but for their families ... and their communities," Gonzales said.

The event was held at Reinhardt College in north Georgia's Cherokee County, where there were 490 meth-related arrests and more than $300,000 worth of the drug confiscated by authorities last year, according to Perdue.

The governor highlighted anti-meth measures taken by Georgia's Legislature over the past few years, such as requiring the drug's key ingredients to be moved behind the counter of stores that sell them and making it a felony to cook meth in the presence of a child.

Perdue has requested $1 million in this year's state budget for a new Georgia Bureau of Investigation meth task force and another million for treatment of people addicted to meth.

"We're seeing the spread of meth labs slow down," Perdue said. "We haven't solved this meth crisis by any means, but we are seeing some positive trends."

Gonzales said some of Georgia's laws were mirrored in the federal Combat Meth Act passed recently by Congress.

But he said federal authorities also have tracked an increase in meth production and distribution by organizations based in Mexico. Gonzales said he has planned a May summit with Mexican officials in Dallas to discuss the trend.

Earlier Monday, Gonzales was in Atlanta to announce the launch of a federal initiative to target violent crime in the worst parts of the city.

The Violent Crime Impact Teams initiative is operating in a total of 23 cities across the country, including Philadelphia, Baltimore, Tampa, New Orleans and Los Angeles.

Several federal agencies, including the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the local U.S. Attorney's Office, will work with local law enforcement agencies on the initiative, which will operate around the city "on any given day, at any given time and in different capacities," said Vanessa McLemore, special agent in charge of the Atlanta Field Division of ATF.

They will use firearms dealer inspection data, gang intelligence information, police call response data and other information to identify crime "hot spots," and the peak times for enforcement actions.

Federal officials declined to identify the "hot spots" they will target in Atlanta.

Mexico Called Key To Stopping Meth Imports Perdue Says State Needs To Network To Be Effective (AJC)

By Clint Williams, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, March 21, 2006

Much of Georgia's methamphetamine problem starts in Mexico, Gov. Sonny Perdue said Monday, making a good working relationship with federal and foreign authorities increasingly important.

To stress the need for help in combating the highly addictive drug, the governor appeared with U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at a meeting at Reinhardt College in Cherokee County.

About 200 people made up the invitation-only group of law enforcement officials, prosecutors, drug rehabilitation professionals and elected officials.

While the number of meth labs in Georgia has declined, Perdue said, "importation of high-grade crystal meth is increasing."

Metro Atlanta has become a hub for eastern U.S. distribution of the drug being manufactured at large clandestine labs in Mexico and in the Western United States, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

Stemming the flow of the drug, known as "ice," will take international cooperation, Gonzales said Monday afternoon, noting that he is to meet with the Mexican attorney general in Dallas in May. The United States is training Mexican officials on how to deal with the cleanup of toxic meth labs and other issues, Gonzales said.

Perdue said it's critical that people become more aware of how destructive meth — a cheap, powerful stimulant — can be. "Meth is deadly to make and deadly to take," the gorvernor declared. "Meth is bad stuff."

Education is a key component in the battle against meth use, Perdue said, adding, "We are probably behind the curve on the education and awareness we need to provide."

Perdue has asked the Legislature to approve a little more than $1 million to fund a 15-member task force in the Georgia Bureau of Investigation. His budget also recommends $1 million more to expand meth treatment programs.

Ex-officer Charged With Drug Possession (BRA)

By PENNY BROWN ROBERTS, Advocate staff writer

Baton Rouge Advocate, March 21, 2006

A former Baton Rouge police officer who once went to jail for selling items from the evidence room now faces more prison time after federal agents allegedly found 6 kilograms of cocaine in a trash can in his garage.

Daryl W. Davis, 38, 18030 Manning Drive, Prairieville, was charged Monday in a criminal complaint with one count of cocaine possession and one count of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon.

He is being held in the West Baton Rouge Parish Prison.

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration has been investigating Davis — who spent 13 years on the Baton Rouge police force — for nearly a year, Assistant Special Agent in Charge Kevin Harrison said Monday.

In an affidavit, DEA Special Agent Mark Lusco writes that investigators believed Davis was “obtaining multikilograms of cocaine from Houston, Texas, and distributing them in the Baton Rouge area.”

On Friday, two confidential informants told agents that Davis was about to get “multikilogram” quantities of cocaine, Lusco writes in the affidavit.

Agents began watching Davis that day and stopped him after he made a U-turn “to avoid numerous marked police vehicles with their emergency lights activated,” the affidavit says. He reportedly gave them permission to search his vehicle and his Prairieville home.

There, according to Lusco, agents seized the 6 kilograms of cocaine from the garbage can. On Davis’ property, they also found a loaded .38-caliber revolver, ammunition, an electric money counter and money packaging materials, Lusco’s affidavit says.

Before Davis was arrested, Lusco claims in the affidavit, the former officer admitted to cocaine trafficking but said the gun belonged to his live-in girlfriend.

Davis — who joined the Baton Rouge Police force in 1986 — previously was arrested in July of 1999. He was accused of stealing a cell phone cloning device from the evidence room and selling it for $1,000 to the man from whom police seized it.

He also allegedly helped an evidence room student worker and her boyfriend steal a gun that was evidence in a related case.

The Police Department fired Davis two weeks later when he refused to answer questions posed by Internal Affairs investigators.

Davis was convicted in a bench trial of one count of obstruction of justice and one count of public bribery and sentenced to five years in prison in February 2001. His parole ended last month.

At the time he was sentenced, state District Judge Bonnie Jackson said testimony during the trial suggested Davis was involved in drug activity.

Davis made an initial appearance Monday before U.S. Magistrate Docia Dalby, who appointed a public defender to represent him.

A detention hearing is scheduled for March 27.

Police Testify In Hearing For Drug Suspect (ASPNEWS)

By Troy Hooper, Aspen Daily News Staff Writer

Aspen (CO) News, March 21, 2006

A Little Annie's Eating House employee was bound over for trial Monday after the prosecution portrayed him as a chief trafficker of a local cocaine network.

Seated between defense attorney Arnold Mordkin and an English-to-Spanish interpreter, Fernando Leal-Ruiz quietly listened as law-enforcement officers at his preliminary hearing testified that during a Dec. 2 drug raid they saw him reaching in the direction of a plastic bag that was later determined to contain 44 bindles of cocaine.

An undercover agent from the Drug Enforcement Administration also testified that Leal-Ruiz might have been the supplier of two eightballs of cocaine he purchased in the alley behind Cooper Street Pier and the agent described seeing the defendant repeatedly engage in suspicious activities.

Monday's hearing was the latest courtroom development concerning the December drug raids of two downtown restaurants in an operation coordinated by local, state and federal authorities. The raids drew both criticism and praise, and resulted in a town meeting that focused on the city's drug enforcement policy, which ultimately was left unchanged.

Meanwhile, Mordkin poked holes in police testimony -- a key portion of which was hearsay, which is admissible in preliminary hearings but not in criminal trials -- and pointed out that the evidence presented was entirely circumstantial.

"I realize you don't have to have enough evidence to convict (in a preliminary hearing) but I don't believe there is any evidence at all," said Mordkin, arguing that deputy prosecutor Gail Nichols' position was speculative.

Judge James Boyd ruled that in viewing the evidence in a light most favorable to the prosecution, which is required in a preliminary hearing, there was enough "circumstantial evidence that not only he knew (the bag of cocaine) was there but also that he was in control of it."

During the hearing, DEA agent Dave Storm described how he met a man later identified as Jaime Gamez Acuma at Cooper Street Pier last fall. The agent said he asked Acuma for one-eighth of an ounce of cocaine -- a quantity known on the street as an "eightball" -- on at least two occasions and both times he observed Acuma go into the alley behind Cooper Street Pier, enter the back kitchen door of Little Annie's and return with white powder that a DEA laboratory in San Francisco later determined was cocaine. Storm said he paid $160 for each eightball.

"There was a lot of activity in the alleyway; specifically, a lot of people coming out the backdoor (without food). For an established business to have so many patrons walking in and out of the backdoor became suspicious to us," he said.

Storm testified he purchased the drugs through Acuma, a suspected middleman in the operation, but he never saw Leal-Ruiz directly involved in the transaction. The agent said he did see Leal-Ruiz shake hands with a number of persons and lean into the windows of several vehicles that pulled up in the alley that Cooper Street and Little Annie's shared. In his ruling, Judge Boyd noted Storm's back-alley observations are both consistent with drug dealing and "innocent activity."

Detective Chris Womack, who led the charge into Little Annie's, said when he entered the kitchen on the afternoon of the raids he ordered the only two men in the kitchen, Leal-Ruiz and the head chef, Tom Woodson, to lay stomach-down on the ground. Womack said he and his team discovered 44 blue-colored bindles, which are folded pieces of paper used to carry cocaine, behind some shoes on a shelf that held a box of yams in a storage room where Leal-Ruiz was lying prone. Another 20 yellow-colored bindles were found on the other side of the kitchen near an opening where servers pick up plates of food to deliver to restaurant patrons.

Womack also testified that he spoke with Aspen police officer James Crowley who told him that Martha Byrum, a woman with a history of drug problems, informed him that she bought cocaine at Little Annie's.

Womack said that Crowley told him that Byrum would call up the restaurant and ask for a kitchen worker named "Fernando" and if he was working, she would go to Little Annie's and buy drugs. She identified Leal-Ruiz in a photograph the DEA took as someone who sold her cocaine, according to Womack, although she said sometimes she only dealt with other persons in the kitchen who sold her cocaine - testimony Nichols admitted was flimsy but nonetheless supportive of the conspiracy charge against Leal-Ruiz.

In a brief appearance on the witness stand, an Immigration and Customs Enforcement officer said he saw Leal-Ruiz reaching in the direction of the drugs when he, Womack and either three or four other officers stormed into the kitchen. The ICE officer said he could not see what was in the bag that Leal-Ruiz was reaching for because it was opaque. Mordkin argued that photographs depicting the plastic bag that held the 44 bindles was not opaque but actually transparent.

The next court hearing for Leal-Ruiz is scheduled for April 17.

So far, four of the 10 cases connected to the Dec. 2 raids have been resolved. One of the cases was dismissed and three other men pleaded guilty to felony possession of cocaine. They received sentences of two years' probation.

In other court news:

* Judge Boyd issued an arrest warrant for Basalt resident Karen Kinkaid, who failed to show up to court Monday. Her attorney, Lawson Wills, couldn't provide an explanation on why she didn't show up. The judge said that her previous bond would be forfeited and he set a new bond of $20,000 for a 2005 case involving accusations of illegal-drug possession and he set a $13,500 bond for a new case this year in which Kinkaid is accused of aggravated motor vehicle theft and forgery.

* Andre Jesus Lozano -- who was convicted of stealing credit card numbers from Aspen Valley Hospital, where he worked, to purchase cookie dough, balloons and other items - was sentenced to three years in state prison. He has six previous theft-related convictions, according to Nichols. Brad Osborn, director of the Right Door, said he has been working with Lozano because his stealing problems are a compulsive addiction similar to those experienced by drug addicts. Osborn spoke optimistically about Lozano and recommended the judge allow him to continue counseling. Lozano cried as he admitted acting "greedy" and "selfish" and said he has been feeling emotionally stronger since taking prescribed medication and working with Osborn and another local doctor. "Even in the Department of Corrections there is some help available to you," said Boyd, noting that Lozano expressed remorse and is suffering with a health crisis.

* Aspen resident Sean Gooding, who police last fall accused of threatening two people with a gun at his apartment in the wee hours of the morning, pled guilty to misdemeanor menacing. A related charge against him was deferred for one year.

New Details Emerge In Drug Bust (ATI)

By Chad Abraham

Aspen (CO) Times, March 21, 2006

Relying in part on statements by a woman caught with a crack pipe in the home of Aspen's police chief, a judge ruled Monday there is enough evidence to try a man on cocaine distribution and conspiracy charges.

Fernando Leal-Ruiz of Carbondale was arrested, along with nine others, in the Dec. 2 drug raids on Little Annie's Eating House and Cooper Street Pier.

Leal-Ruiz, a chef at Little Annie's, allegedly had 44 bindles of cocaine, totaling just less than 26 grams, ready to sell from the restaurant's kitchen. Monday's preliminary hearing saw testimony by the Aspen police detective who led the raid on Little Annie's, a DEA agent and an immigration officer.

After her arrest in October, Martha Byrum explained to police how she would buy cocaine from Little Annie's, Detective Chris Womack said on the stand.

She said she would call the restaurant, ask for Fernando and, if he was working, go to the eatery's back door and knock, Womack testified. Whoever answered would sell her cocaine.

Byrum pleaded guilty in January to cocaine possession, second-degree trespassing and a probation violation. She was arrested after walking into Police Chief Loren Ryerson's Aspen home while trying to elude officers.

Dave Storm, a 15-year DEA agent, said he provided that photo to the Aspen Police Department. He testified that he bought drugs from Jaime Gamez-Acuna, who was also arrested, while investigating employees and patrons of the two restaurants. The operation involved video as well as photographs.

Storm's testimony revealed the origins of the controversial busts. The arrests, 11 in all, forced the police department to re-evaluate its drug-fighting policy after some Aspenites criticized authorities for the handling of the operation. The Pitkin County Sheriff's Office was not told about the raid, and many felt that storming the landmark restaurants during après-ski was not in line with Aspen's mellow ethos. Others supported the action.

Storm said he got to know Gamez-Acuna while playing pool at Cooper Street Pier. He later saw him smoking a joint in the alley between that restaurant and Little Annie's, he testified.

When Storm walked up to Gamez-Acuna, whom he called Jimmy, the suspect said, "You don't do weed."

"No, but the other," Storm responded, referring to cocaine.

Gamez-Acuna said he had a friend who sold "eight balls," slang for an eighth of an ounce of cocaine, for $160. He pointed to the back door of Little Annie's, Storm testified.

The agent gave him the cash, and Gamez-Acuna disappeared into Little Annie's, returned with the drug and then went back into Cooper Street, Storm said. The back doors of the restaurants are across an alley from each other.

Storm said he engaged in another drug deal on Oct. 21. While playing pool with Gamez-Acuna at Cooper Street, they agreed to another buy and walked down the back stairs and into the alley, where Storm again produced $160.

Gamez-Acuna went back into Little Annie's and returned with five bindles of cocaine worth $30 apiece, the agent told Boyd.

"It's better than what they're selling up there," Gamez-Acuna allegedly said, referring to Cooper Street.

Storm acknowledged that he did not know who Gamez-Acuna was allegedly getting the drugs from inside Little Annie's. But he said there was "a lot of activity in the alley." During surveillance, he noticed many people quickly going in and out of Little Annie's rear entrance without food. Vehicles also pulled up and people leaned into the windows briefly, he said. Leal-Ruiz was among those Storm said he saw meet vehicles and people in the alley.

During the Dec. 2 operation, Womack led four other law enforcement officials into the back of Little Annie's. The two employees they initially encountered, one of whom was Leal-Ruiz, were ordered to lie face-down.

Dan Fitzgibbon of the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency accompanied Womack during the operation. He testified that Leal-Ruiz, lying prone in a storage area, reached out of his line out of sight. He shouted at Leal-Ruiz at gunpoint to show his hands because he was concerned the suspect may have been trying to get a weapon.

Fitzgibbon then checked the area and saw a Ziploc bag stuffed behind a pile of shoes. He called Womack back, who said the bag contained the 44 bindles. He said there were 20 other bindles in the front of the kitchen, near where the wait staff picks up food for customers.

Prosecutor Gail Nichols told Boyd that Leal-Ruiz had no reason to reach near the shoes other than to try to hide the drugs.

But Leal-Ruiz's attorney, Arnie Mordkin, argued that it had not been proven the bindles were his client's. He grilled Storm on how he handled the bindles and whether they were fingerprinted. Storm said fingerprinting of bindles is rarely done because the paper yields inconclusive prints.

Mordkin also questioned Womack at length about the dimensions of the storage area and whether he moved the shoes to get to the bindles. The defense attorney appeared to be trying to cast doubt on how Leal-Ruiz could have shoved the Ziploc behind the shoes if he was prone on the ground.

Nichols said it was "pretty obvious" that Leal-Ruiz was trying to hide the bag. She also cited Byrum's statements to police - that others were involved in the backdoor sales - as enough justification for the conspiracy charge.

Cocaine was being dealt out the front and back of the tiny restaurant and it would have been impossible for Leal-Ruiz to not know it was going on, she said.

Mordkin countered that there wasn't "any evidence at all" to try his client on the possession or conspiracy charges. The cocaine was on the floor of the storage area and not in Leal-Ruiz's possession, he said. As for reaching in the area where the bag was found, Mordkin said Leal-Ruiz could have been adjusting his shoes - "could have been doing a gazillion things."

"How can he conspire if we never have possession?" he asked.

"There's no connection. There has to be a connection," he said. Mordkin then sat down heavily.

Boyd disagreed. He said Byrum's statements to police, while hearsay, were admissible in a hearing to determine whether there is enough evidence to try him on the charges. He also cited that Byrum identified him in the picture and mentioned his name in describing how she obtained the cocaine.

Boyd said Leal-Ruiz was not complying with orders to show his hands and reached into an area where the cocaine was found. Both the conspiracy and distribution charges are warranted, he ruled.

Five of the 10 men arrested in the raids are still in the court system. Charges against an 11th man, who was arrested a week after the operation, were dismissed and he was deported. Of the five men whose cases already have been considered, at least three have pleaded to guilty to possession of cocaine and received probation.

Edubiel Hernandez-Cruz, who faces similar charges as Leal-Ruiz, also was in court. His hearing was continued, as was the arraignment of Gamez-Acuna. His lawyer said he and Nichols are close to reaching a plea deal.

Leal-Ruiz's next court date is April 17.

Andersen's Dismissal Is Upheld (NYT)

By Liz Robbins

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

An arbitrator ruled in favor of the N.B.A. yesterday and upheld the league's dismissal of Hornets forward Chris Andersen for violating the league's drug policy.

The arbitrator, Calvin Sharpe, ruled on a grievance filed by Andersen and the players union. Andersen, dismissed Jan. 27, cannot apply for reinstatement for two years.

"Obviously the league has made up their mind what they want to do, and we're all going to have to live with that," Hornets Coach Byron Scott said after practice yesterday in New Orleans.

Neither the league nor the players association would reveal Andersen's offense. The N.B.A.'s collective bargaining agreement specifies that a player can be disqualified only for a fourth positive test for performance-enhancing drugs, or a first positive test for "drugs of abuse," which include amphetamines, cocaine, LSD, heroin, codeine and morphine. Andersen had not previously been suspended under the drug policy.

Anderson's four-year, $14 million contract with the Hornets, which he signed last summer, became void.

Arbitrator Upholds Andersen Dismissal (AP)

AP, March 20, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- Former New Orleans Hornets forward Chris Andersen's dismissal from the NBA for violating the league's drug policy was upheld by an arbitrator Monday.

Andersen was dismissed and disqualified from the league in late January. He is not eligible to apply for reinstatement for two years.

Andersen and the players' union had filed a grievance, but arbitrator Calvin Sharpe rejected it.

According to the league's collective bargaining agreement, a player can be disqualified only for a fourth positive test for performance-enhancing drugs, or a first positive test for "drugs of abuse." The drugs on that list include amphetamines, cocaine, LSD, heroin, codeine and morphine.

Andersen has not previously been suspended for testing positive for performance-enhancing drugs.

Bolivian President Takes 'coca Is Not Cocaine' Plea To UN (IND)

By Daniel Howden

Independent, March 21, 2006

Bolivia stepped up a long-running battle with Washington this week by taking its campaign to legalise coca plants to the United Nations in a bid to persuade the international community that the leaf should no longer be banned because of its links to the illegal drugs trade.

The tiny Andean nation, headed by newly elected populist President Evo Morales, is determined to prove that coca can be the source of legitimate products for export and not just the raw material for cocaine.

In Bolivia and across fellow coca-producing nations Colombia and Peru, the leaf has been grown for 3,500 years, and is used in everything from herbal tea to clothing. Its advocates say it can be used, among other things, as an aid to digestion and can provide vital nutrients and vitamins. Its function as an appetite suppressant, they point out, could also come in handy in the struggle against obesity.

Under the slogan "coca is not cocaine", they are calling for coca-based products, ranging from staples such as tea and bread to cosmetic goods such as shampoo, to be mass-produced and exported from all over South America.

But the plant, because of its close link to cocaine, is listed by the UN as a poisonous species, something which Bolivia hopes to change this week as it takes the case for legalising coca to the UN narcotics and crime agency in Vienna.

President Morales, himself a former grower and indigenous Aymara Indian who came to prominence as a spokesman for the coca farmers of the Chapare region of Bolivia, where 90 per cent of the country's coca yield is produced, has condemned his country's cocaine production. He is insistent, however, on its right to harvest more coca.

If he succeeds in changing the plant's status by 2008, Washington will not be happy. The US, which spends $1bn a year on its so-called "war on drugs" across South America, says it would be impossible to legalise coca growing in Bolivia without sending cocaine production soaring.

US officials express serious concerns that the new wave of leftist Latin American leaders - from Bolivia's President Morales to the Venezuelan President, Hugo Chavez - are acting in the interests of cocaine barons.

In most of the Andean states there are already small quotas of legalised coca cultivation supplying traditional products. Washington has argued that any expansion of those quotas would be cocaine production by another name.

Bolivia Urges UN To Defy Washington And Legalise Coca (TEL)

By Sophie Arie in La Paz

Telegraph, March 20, 2006

Bolivia is leading a Latin American campaign to legalise coca plants despite them being vilified by the United States as the source of the world's cocaine industry.

Coca leaves: fans claim it aids digestion and contains more vitamins and nutrients than most vegetables

Under the slogan "coca is not cocaine", politicians, consumers and growers across the Andes are promoting the leaf's qualities and calling for coca-based tea, yoghurt, bread, toothpaste, shampoo and soap to be mass produced and exported.

Its fans claim it helps digestion, provides more vital vitamins, nutrients and fibre than most vegetables and can even combat obesity.

But the plant has been listed by the United Nations as a poisonous species since 1961 because it also contains the alkaloid needed to make cocaine.

Bolivia has this week been arguing the case for legalising coca to the UN narcotics and crime agency in Vienna and hopes to change its status by 2008.

Indigenous communities have chewed its leaf here since 2,500 BC and brewed it as tea to boost their strength and stave off hunger and tiredness.

Even today, Bolivia's tin miners, who work in appalling work conditions, chew coca around the clock to stay awake and dull pain.

DOJ_NMG_0019757

Prsident Evo Morales, a former grower who has campaigned for peasants' rights to tend the crop, has vowed to crack down on cocaine production in Bolivia, the world's third largest producer after Colombia and Peru.

But he insists the country should be allowed to grow more coca for natural, legal consumption.

And in neighbouring Peru a frontrunner in next month's election, Ollanta Humala, has suggested baking 27 million loaves of bread from coca leaves for school breakfasts daily.

Small companies in Bolivia, Peru and Colombia, have launched coca-based energy drinks, biscuits, breads and yoghurts, all faintly green in colour and supposedly providing invaluable nutritional benefits.

Some also claim that the leaf's ability to stunt appetite could provide a natural cure to the world's obesity epidemic.

Maria Eugenia Tenorio, Bolivia's best known coca cook, even claims to have lost more than two stone in eight months by eating large numbers of coca biscuits.

"If Bolivians just started cooking with coca, they could solve most of the problems of malnutrition here," she said in her La Paz kitchen, kneading green coca flour into mashed potatoes to make a local version of gnocchi.

The US spends up to $1 billion a year tackling drugs in the Andes.

The idea that more coca can be grown in Bolivia without boosting more cocaine production is "pie in the sky", US officials say.

Canada's Growing Marijuana Problem (BBC)

By Becky Branford

BBC, March 20, 2006

Nearly half of Canadians admit to smoking marijuana at least once Frank proudly surveys the large log cabin he constructed himself, on a two-acre plot of aromatic evergreen forest he now owns.

"All this," he says, "was built on marijuana."

Over four years, Frank - not his real name - tended a patch of marijuana plants in a forest clearing about 45 minutes' walk from where his cabin now stands.

He regularly pooled his harvests with those of several other growers in the small British Columbia (BC) town in which he lives, to sell wholesale to young men from just across the border in the US state of Idaho.

Frank says he made hundreds of thousands of Canadian dollars before hurriedly leaving the business when his American buyers were arrested.

But tens of thousands of illegal "grow-ops" remain in Canada. Estimates suggest marijuana may generate up to C$7bn (£3.5bn; US$6.1bn) a year in BC, the sunny province thought to be at the heart of the industry.

Canada's new Conservative government says people like Frank are a menace to society, putting drugs on the streets and fuelling organised crime - and it has vowed to get tough on them.

But critics accuse the government of being wilfully blind to the historic failures of law enforcement, and ignoring public opinion and the findings of expert committees in favour of a policy of demonising marijuana - a policy they liken to the short-lived Prohibition of alcohol in 1920s and 30s America.

Vietnam roots

Growing marijuana in BC's thinly populated and rugged interior, Frank was continuing a tradition - of sorts - said to have arrived with some 50,000 young American men seeking to avoid being drafted to fight in the Vietnam war.

It's politics that's stopping a change in drug laws and not logic

Lawyer and policy expert Eugene Oscapella But over the intervening decades, the industry has changed. Most of today's grow-ops are indoors, using artificial light to produce stronger strains of cannabis.

The industry has also grown. The Canadian statistics agency reports that in 2004 there were more than 8,000 cultivation offences recorded - up from 3,400 in 1994.

Experts deduce that the true number of grow-ops is much greater, as even large seizures seem to have little effect on the price of marijuana.

The federal police reported in 2002 that the cultivation industry had reached levels "that could be deemed epidemic in the provinces of BC, Ontario, and Quebec" - and they also warn that almost every large-scale operation these days is linked in varying degrees to organised crime.

"Cannabis is the biggest issue facing law enforcement now," says Inspector Paul Nadeau of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP).

He says smugglers have access to "transport vehicles, planes, helicopters. The sky's the limit".

He calls for greater deterrents, pointing out that in BC only about 10% of those convicted of growing marijuana face jail terms (the figure is higher in other provinces), with most offenders getting a fine or suspended sentence.

The Canadian police: 'We are drowning in the numbers' He says judges facing a backlog of cases in the courts "have to be given the means to deal with the problem... We are drowning in the numbers."

In contrast to the previous Liberal administration, which sought unsuccessfully to reduce penalties for possession, the new Conservative government pledged in its election manifesto to steer Canada "off the road to drug legalisation".

It said it would ensure mandatory minimum prison sentences and large fines for serious drug offenders, including growers.

Consumption rises

But critics of tougher law enforcement insist it is doomed to failure - and has failed.

"I don't advocate smoking anything - I think it's bad for you!" says Stephen Easton, professor of economics and a senior scholar at the conservative Fraser Institute think tank, who has studied the industry in detail.

He and other pro-reform experts accept that there is growing evidence of a link between heavy cannabis use and mental health problems in some people.

Parents and police officers agree the last thing we need is more drugs on the streets

Patrick Charette

Justice ministry "But has criminalisation been successful in deterring consumption? The answer is surely no," he says.

In 2004, the Canadian Addiction Survey found 44.5% of Canadians reported using cannabis at least once - up from 23.3% in 1989.

The proportion of respondents who admitted to using cannabis in the previous year was 14.1% - compared with 9.7% of Britons and 10.6% of Americans in equivalent surveys.

Instead of spending half a billion Canadian dollars each year tackling illicit drug use, Professor Easton argues, federal authorities have an alternative: "Tax and trade it like any other normal commodity."

In fact, several government committees tasked with evaluating Canada's drug laws have recommended legalisation of marijuana - from the 1972 Le Dain Commission to the Senate Special Committee on Illegal Drugs which reported in September 2002.

A recent survey suggested 51% of Canadians supported decriminalisation of marijuana.

Prohibition 'empires'

"There have been studies galore in Canada and elsewhere looking at this issue - it's politics that's stopping [a change in drug laws] and not logic," says lawyer Eugene Oscapella, a founding member of the independent Canadian Foundation for Drug Policy.

"It's hypocrisy, it's cowardice," he says - a charge the justice ministry declined to comment on.

Most marijuana cultivation now takes place indoors, under lights (image: RCMP) Mr Oscapella suggests Canada is fearful of crossing the US government, which he says has threatened to slow bilateral trade worth about US$1bn per day.

Some 85% of marijuana grown in BC is estimated to be exported into the US, though total border seizures of marijuana only amount to about 3% of that discovered entering the US from Mexico.

Mr Oscapella also argues that some sectors have an interest in maintaining what he calls the "Prohibition" on marijuana in Canada.

"You have to look at Prohibition as an industry: the crime-control industry. There are empires built around it - not only organised crime, but government bureaucracies, police departments, privatised prison industries in the US, pharmaceutical and drug-testing companies. These empires thrive on Prohibition."

He says he fears tougher enforcement will lead to a burgeoning prison population, but have little impact on the illicit industry.

Meanwhile, critics charge, the proceeds of the industry continue to feed what a recent editorial in the Vancouver Sun newspaper called the "monster" of organised crime.

As early as 2000, RCMP Commissioner Giuliano Zaccardelli warned this "monster" was threatening to destabilise Canada's parliamentary system.

'Pay the price'

But police insist tougher sentences, not legalisation of cannabis, is what is needed.

This argument is echoed by the new Ottawa government, though it says it will take advice before formulating a detailed drugs policy. It argues any resultant increase in spending on tougher law enforcement will be offset by lower spending on the social problems caused by drug abuse.

"Parents and police officers agree the last thing we need is more drugs on the streets," says the Ministry of Justice's acting communications director Patrick Charette.

"There has been a huge inconsistency in the application of the law - whether you're caught with a joint in a small rural community or downtown Vancouver, you'll get [a different] reaction from the police...

"Rather than simplifying and having a more relaxed approach, we think you need to enforce the law and make sure those caught with drugs and producing drugs pay the price."

Former Track Coach Convicted Of Doping (AP)

AP, March 20, 2006

The court found the 47-year-old Springstein guilty on charges including the alleged doping of young athletes in 2003.

Prosecutors had sought a longer suspended sentence, while the defense pleaded for an acquittal.

The trial took an unexpected twist when the court was read e-mails found when police raided Springstein's home in search of evidence.

In one e-mail, Springstein complained that the "new Repoxygen is hard to get. Please give me new instructions soon so that I can order the product before Christmas."

Repoxygen is designed for gene therapy on patients with anemia. It can boost an athlete's performance by inducing the release of erythropoietin, or EPO, a substance that stimulates the production of red blood cells to carry more oxygen to the muscles.

The International Olympic Committee and World Anti-Doping Agency already test for synthetic EPO. But there is no known test for Repoxygen, which gives the body the gene to stimulate EPO production on its own.

Springstein has worked with athletes including former East German track stars Grit Breuer and Katrin Krabbe. The two were banned from competition for using the steroid clenbuterol in 1992.

IMMIGRATION:

Exam Week For The GOP Congress (WSJ)

By George Melloan

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

Immigration reform is on the Senate agenda this week. The issue has been festering for years and probably will still be when Congress takes its Easter break, once again demonstrating the weakness of Republican congressional leadership.

It hardly needs saying the U.S. immigration policy is a mess. An estimated 11 million undocumented immigrants are among the 300 million souls who inhabit the nation. Most fill jobs U.S. citizens disdain. It would be hard to run U.S. hotels and restaurants without the maids and busboys who have made their way from places like Quito and San Salvador.

Yet their presence annoys what Weekly Standard editor Fred Barnes aptly calls "paleocons," conservatives of the Pat Buchanan stripe who go hysterical over these brown-skinned, Spanish-speaking toilers. Vigilantism has broken out on the Mexican border, with macho guys packing six-guns searching for wetbacks. More seriously, the hysteria has infected Congress, resulting in House passage in December of a bill that would, along with other drastic measures, authorize the construction of a 700-mile Berlin Wall on the Mexican border.

One guy who really loves that wall is a Yankee-baiting Mexican leftist named Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador. The highly visible testimony to gringo abhorrence of Mexicans is feeding his campaign for the July 2 Mexican presidential election. If he makes it, the U.S. will have only a few friends left in Latin American capitals. The aging, tottering Fidel Castro will have finally achieved his life's ambition of turning the Spanish-speaking world against America.

Illegal immigrants are indeed a problem, although also the principal victims of their illegal status. Because they don't have documents they can be easily exploited in ways offensive to the American sense of justice and fair play. The industry that has developed for sneaking them into the country is used for other purposes, such as smuggling drugs. A few, partly because of attachments to the smugglers, turn to crime in places like Los Angeles and Albuquerque.

The inability of the U.S. to devise a sensible set of immigration policies has broader repercussions beyond Latin America. Microsoft's Bill Gates complains that the U.S. is shutting out foreigners with needed skills. Colleges and universities say that Immigration and Naturalization Service bureaucracy complicates the admission of students, limiting the ability of the U.S. to earn foreign currency and international goodwill by offering the world's youth first-class educational opportunities. Employers protest at criminal penalties if they fail to detect document forgeries and thus don't fulfill their "duties" as surrogate law enforcers.

If Congress had been living up to its responsibilities, these problems would have been addressed long ago. The first requirement is for members to accept the fact that unfilled jobs in a booming economy are going to attract individuals seeking better lives. That's a normal and powerful drive in homo sapiens. Spending taxpayer billions on a hideous wall and more cops might reduce the flow, but it won't stop it or deal with the issue of what to do about those already in the country.

Lawmakers of course have a natural predilection toward exercising police power. Large construction projects appeal as well, especially in a Congress that seems mainly focused on finding ways to pass out federal dollars to key constituencies. But it should be evident by now that those kinds of approaches are limited in coping with honest human instincts.

The equation is simple: The U.S. needs labor; immigrants supply labor. So the solution is to find ways to bring the two together in some legal, orderly way. President Bush understands this, which is why he has proposed the restoration of a guest-worker program. But for some reason -- perhaps because the president's staff is not sufficiently skillful or vigorous enough in pressing his case -- the Republican leaders in Congress seem deaf to the wishes of their own president.

The second part of the equation, what to do about existing illegals, is a bit more difficult, politically at least. The first bit of advice worth taking: Stop treating it as a police problem. Nearly all of the illegals sneaked into the U.S. for nothing more heinous than to offer their honest labor. They violated U.S. immigration laws but they aren't criminals in the sense of posing a threat to persons or property. If approached seriously and with sufficient goodwill, it should not be beyond the mind of man to find ways to make them legal.

In other words, they need to be given amnesty. The paleocons immediately object that doing so would reward them for breaking the law. How about changing the phrasing a little bit? Let's say they are to get amnesty in recognition of the fact that they already have suffered sufficient hardship in getting into the U.S. and living secret lives. Various other schemes that have been mentioned, such as sending them home to wait in a queue, have one fatal defect: They won't convince illegals that it is safe to come out of hiding.

Offering to give illegals green cards and wipe the slate clean is the only practical solution. If they come forward, they can stay on their jobs and travel back and forth to their homes legally. Some who have been trapped in the U.S. by their inability to travel freely will choose to go home permanently. There will be less incentive to sneak in family members, since it will be possible to visit relatives or send remittances. Restoring something like the old bracero program for temporary farm workers would further regularize the flow of labor.

Let's admit that Beltway politics has gone crazy. Aside from the paleocons, there are the labor unions and their "liberal" friends. Most unions long ago gave up representing working people in favor of representing themselves, which is no doubt why they are losing membership. It is hard to think of a class of workers more in need of union support than poor Latinos with no legal rights. But politics are what Congress is paid to manage. It's too bad this Congress is making such a hash of it.

Companies Target Your Tax Refund (WSJ)

By Jeff D. Opdyke

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

A variety of companies are trying to get their hands on your tax refund before you do, and state law-enforcement officials are cracking down on some of the practices.

As the April tax-filing deadline approaches, businesses from tax-preparation firms to auto dealerships are offering consumers the opportunity to put their expected refund checks to work weeks before the IRS sends them out -- often by loaning them the expected amount for a high fee. Dozens of retailers, including Olive Garden restaurants and AMC move theaters, have begun offering gift cards in exchange for tax refunds to people who file using TurboTax, the popular tax-preparation software. H&R Block Inc. recently launched savings accounts for customers to channel their tax refunds. And hundreds of car dealerships will prepare your taxes if your refund is applied toward a down payment on a car.

But now, state officials are clamping down on some of these programs, claiming they saddle low and moderate-income families, recent college graduates and others with high fees. Last year about three of every four tax filers received a refund, according to the Internal Revenue Service. Those refunds totaled nearly $218 billion, or about $2,171 per household.

Last week, H&R Block, the nation's biggest tax preparation firm, was sued by New York's attorney general for selling so-called Express IRAs that allegedly earned less money than what customers paid in fees. That action followed a lawsuit last month against Block by California's attorney general, who accused the firm of charging fees that equate to annualized interest rates that can exceed 500% on so-called refund-anticipation loans, the popular instant refunds, which are loans that clients repay when their refunds arrive. Oklahoma's attorney general last week warned consumers away from instant refunds, which are also offered by other big tax-preparation firms, including Jackson Hewitt Tax Service Inc. and Liberty Tax Service, saying the best strategy "is to file your taxes, and wait for your refund check."

Block said at the time that the California suit has "no legal or factual merit," and said it clearly discloses the terms of its loans to consumers. The company also has denied the charges in the New York lawsuit, saying its IRA program offers its customers "a powerful first step toward ensuring a secure financial future."

Block has been aggressively expanding beyond tax-preparation; last week the company said it had been granted a federal savings bank charter that allows it to provide checking, savings and other services through a banking subsidiary. The company this year launched a money-market savings account, which clients can fund with tax refunds. It costs $15 to start, though that is waived if customers deposit a minimum of $1,000 or agree to regular deposits. The firm is also piloting a debit card onto which customers can load their refund. The debit card is free, though the average customer accumulates about $17 in ATM fees before the refund is exhausted, Block says.

Bernie Wilson, Block's vice president for outreach and business development, says the company's goal is to help the low- to moderate-income Americans who do not have traditional banking relationships. "We're helping people save," he says. "We've been very careful to focus on things that will improve the financial situation of clients' lives."

Other firms also are targeting tax refunds. Jackson Hewitt, which has about 5,400 stores nationally, offers taxpayers its "ipower CashCard." It allows taxpayers to have their refund loaded onto what is essentially a prepaid MasterCard, then to access their cash through debit transactions or through ATM withdrawals. Taxpayers must first pay a $30 charge to load their refund onto the card.

Both Jackson Hewitt and H&R Block have teamed up with chains that place check-cashing machines inside some local tax-preparation stores. Taxpayers who opt for an instant refund can turn around and stick that check into the machine and receive cash immediately -- minus another fee that averages 2.7%, according to ACE Cash Express Inc., which provides machines to many Block stores.

Meanwhile, Intuit Inc. began this year offering users of its popular TurboTax tax-preparation software the opportunity to apply some or all of their refunds to gift cards from about 50 retailers, including Starbucks, Sharper Image, Lowe's and Red Lobster. Retailers are offering greater value in the gift card than the amount of money customers put in -- loading the card with $1,200 for a refund amount of $1,000, for instance. However, customers pay a one-time fee of $14.95 to TurboTax for shipping and handling. The offer is available to taxpayers who file their returns electronically.

TaxMax, a unit of CarBiz Inc. of Sarasota, Fla., offers taxpayers to chance to turn their federal tax refund into a down payment on a car -- though at a potentially high cost. The company says it has partnered with about 800 mainly used-car dealerships around the country and charges consumers an average of about $200 to complete a federal 1040A form, a relatively simple form.

TaxMax says customers can show up at the dealership with a driver's license, Social Security card and a W-2 form. A salesman helps fill in two to four pages of paperwork seeking information such as number of dependents and whether the taxpayer wants TaxMax to complete a state tax return for an additional $25 fee. The dealer faxes the paperwork to TaxMax, where the data are entered into a tax program and the return is looked over by a supervisor trained in tax preparation, before it is returned to the dealer and taxpayer. The process takes about 30 minutes. The size of the average return: about $2,300, according to Stan Heintz, chief operating officer for CarBiz, who expects the company to complete about 3,500 returns this tax season.

The J.D. Byrider used-car dealership in Milwaukee expects TaxMax to do about 75 tax returns for its customers this tax season, says franchisee Steve Muller. The TaxMax option "is a very popular program" and the volume of customers relying on tax refunds as down payments on cars has tripled in the past year, he says. Mr. Muller says the tax-selling season begins as early as late November, when buyers come in with their paystub and TaxMax estimates what their refund will likely be for the year.

Liberty Tax Service, with about 1,700 stores nationwide, says about 17% of its customers apply for a refund-anticipation loan, paying $75 or so for loans that average about $2,500. John Hewitt, Liberty's chief executive, says the Virginia Beach, Va., firm tries to discourage most customers from applying for the loans. "We think cross-selling to customers is fraught with difficulties, including pushing these types of products on people that they're bad for," Mr. Hewitt says. Still, he adds, "if you don't have [instant refunds], you're not competitive."

Pastors' Get-Out-the-Vote Training Could Test Tax Rules (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

WASHINGTON, March 20 — Weeks after the Internal Revenue Service announced a crackdown on political activities by churches and other tax-exempt organizations, a coalition of nonprofit conservative groups is holding training sessions to enlist Pennsylvania pastors in turning out voters for the November elections.

Experts in tax law said the sessions, organized by four groups as the Pennsylvania Pastors Network, could test the promises by the tax agency to step up enforcement of the law that prohibits such activity by exempt organizations.

Such a test could define the boundaries for churches and other groups.

Although the tax agency has often overlooked political activity by churches, it has repeatedly warned the clergy and religious groups that it intends to enforce its rules with new vigor this year, in part to correct what it considers to have been too much political intervention by churches and charities in 2004.

The first training session, on March 6 in Valley Forge, included a videotaped message from a single candidate, Senator Rick Santorum, the Pennsylvania Republican who faces a difficult re-election fight.

"I encourage you to let your voices be heard from the pulpit" on vital issues, Mr. Santorum said, urging the pastors to champion a proposed constitutional ban on same-sex marriage, according to a recording made by a person at the session.

DOJ_NMG_0019763

Americans United for Separation of Church and State, a liberal group critical of the effort, provided the recording to The New York Times.

Colin A. Hanna, founder of the conservative advocacy group Let Freedom Ring and master of ceremonies, called the book "thoroughly and soundly grounded in Christian doctrine and Scripture as the revealed word of God," according to the recording.

Mr. Hanna described Mr. Santorum's book as a rebuttal to another book, "It Takes a Village," by Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, and pointedly said he would not name its author. The session on March 6 attracted 125 members of the clergy, and on Monday, Let Freedom Ring posted a notice on its Web site that the Pennsylvania Pastors Network was hiring 10 full-time organizers to help churches get out the vote, suggesting a sizable and well-financed effort.

Gary Marx, who helped direct the Bush re-election campaign's work with Christian groups in 2004, oversees the get-out-the-vote effort.

A politician speaking to a religious group is hardly new, and the tax code allows churches and other tax-exempt charities to register voters and to express views on public issues.

But the rules forbid supporting a political party or candidate. Inviting just one candidate to speak, singling out one candidate for special praise and highlighting a combination of issues tailored to one candidate's campaign are all factors that the I.R.S. considers problematic.

That is especially the case if the discussion is in the context of a get-out-the-vote effort, said Marcus S. Owens, a lawyer here who is the former director of the exempt-organizations division of the tax agency.

The training session was two weeks after the internal revenue commissioner, Mark W. Everson, spoke at the City Club of Cleveland saying, "We can't afford to have our charitable and religious institutions undermined by politics."

The tax agency found "a disturbing amount" of political activity during the 2004 election, including churches' inviting just one candidate to speak or distributing voters' guides that in effect favored one candidate over another, Mr. Everson said in a statement.

Pennsylvania appears to be the sole state where advocacy groups are pouring so much into working with churches so early. The outcome of the effort, and the way the tax agency responds, could have an influence far beyond the state.

Republicans, encouraged by their success mobilizing religion-minded voters in 2004, are stepping up their efforts to collect church directories around the country to help turn out voters for the midterm races. Democrats are watching the Pennsylvania senator's race closely in part because Mr. Santorum's opponent, Bob Casey Jr., shares Mr. Santorum's opposition to abortion rights, defusing the issue that has galvanized Christian conservatives.

In an interview on Friday, Mr. Hanna said the meetings were unrelated to Mr. Santorum's campaign. He noted that the training sessions explicitly encouraged the members of the clergy to speak about policies and to avoid endorsing candidates, guidelines within the limits of tax laws.

He also noted that one of the speakers was Raymond L. Flynn, a former Democratic mayor of Boston and ambassador to the Vatican who has become a supporter of President Bush and social conservative causes.

Mr. Santorum spoke on the tape for about seven minutes. A spokesman for the senator, Robert Traynham, said his statement was "generic video greetings about a public policy initiative that will be pending before the United States Senate," referring to the debate over the proposed ban on same-sex marriage.

"You are the leaders of the flock," Mr. Santorum told the pastors. "You have a responsibility to be informed and to inform" and "to help guide those who seek your counsel," especially about the importance of banning same-sex marriage.

The Rev. Frank Pavone, national director of Priests for Life, invoked the prophet Ezekiel, whose voice brought a field of bones to life.

"You and I are standing before a field of dry bones, aren't we?" Father Pavone told the training session. "Dead consciences. Destroyed life."

Without mentioning Mr. Santorum or Mr. Casey, Father Pavone emphasized how important control of the Senate would be if another Supreme Court vacancy opened soon, potentially tipping the court against abortion rights.

"This particular president needs the kind of support that he has today but might not necessarily have after 2006," Father Pavone said.

With the abortion issue off the table in the Pennsylvania race, other speakers concentrated on same-sex marriage. Mr. Casey has said he opposes same-sex marriage but he also opposes amending the Constitution to ban it. "It is a point of differentiation," Mr. Hanna said.

Among the other speakers were two conservative Christian organizers from Ohio, where they worked with Let Freedom Ring on a state marriage referendum that helped increase conservative turnout in the 2004. "As we listen to how they did it in Ohio," Mr. Hanna told the pastors, "think about how it relates to us in Pennsylvania."

On March 6, Mr. Hanna, a former Republican commissioner of Chester County who successfully fought a legal battle to preserve a display of the Ten Commandments, said the new network would provide sermon notes, teaching aides, voters' guides, and legal referrals.

The Rev. Barry W. Lynn, executive director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State, said the network reflected "a growing backdoor, under-the-radar effort to lure churches into political campaigns" that could risk their tax exemptions.

Michael Geer, the president of the Pennsylvania Family Institute and a speaker on March 6, said such critics were trying to "squelch the free speech" of conservative pastors. No one complained, Mr. Geer said, when opponents of the state marriage amendment had an organizing meeting last week at St. Michael's Lutheran Church in Harrisburg, Pa.

Court Rejects Last Whitewater Appeal (AP-Y2)

By Jill Zeman

AP2, March 20, 2006

The seven-year, $70 million Whitewater investigation that toppled an Arkansas governor and dogged Bill Clinton for most of his presidency officially drew to a close Monday when the U.S. Supreme Court declined to hear the last remaining appeal.

Former Gov. Jim Guy Tucker had asked the high court to let him withdraw a guilty plea in a tax-conspiracy case that he said was based on an outdated law. Tucker was accused of crookedly scheming to reduce his tax liability on the sale of cable television system.

"It has been drawn out a long time," said W. Hickman Ewing, who was a chief deputy to Whitewater special prosecutor Kenneth W. Starr. "It just shows you people can keep things going."

Tucker became Arkansas governor in 1992 after Clinton was elected president. He resigned in 1996 after being convicted in a separate case, also brought by Whitewater prosecutors, involving a small business loan. Because of poor health, Tucker never went to prison but served 18 months of home detention.

In the cable case, Tucker's previous arguments led a federal judge to cut the amount of restitution owed from $1 million to $63,000. Tucker argued further that the government used the wrong section of the law when it pursued him.

"It's disappointing that there will never be a report in a court of law as to how this independent counsel, with all its resources and purported brilliance, managed to indict a citizen by use of a repealed statute," Tucker said Monday.

The appeal was the lone remnant of the Clinton-era Whitewater probe, and the cable television case had nothing to do with the Arkansas land development that gave the investigation its name. Starr won permission from then-Attorney General Janet Reno to broaden the investigation when Tucker's name came up in the business loan case.

Tucker has long argued that he would never have been pursued by prosecutors if not for Clinton. Ewing said Monday: "It's probably true."

In a 1996 trial involving the business loan, a federal jury convicted Tucker with former Clinton Whitewater business partners James and Susan McDougal. Tucker quit and was replaced by Mike Huckabee, who still holds the job.

Clinton was never charged.

High Court Rejects Appeal, Ends Whitewater Case (WT)

By Jerry Seper

DOJ_NMG_0019765

The Supreme Court yesterday refused to hear an appeal from former Arkansas Gov. Jim Guy Tucker, who asked the justices to allow him to withdraw his guilty plea to tax charges in the Whitewater investigation, closing the door on the 12-year, $60 million probe.

Tucker, who in 1996 was found guilty by a federal jury of conspiracy and mail fraud and later pleaded guilty to conspiracy to defraud the Internal Revenue Service, said through his Little Rock attorney, Jeffrey Rosenzweig, that an appeals court wrongly denied him a new hearing on whether the plea was voluntary.

The justices did not comment in refusing to hear the appeal. In 2004, they declined to consider whether Tucker, who resigned his office after his conviction, was wrongly barred from raising new arguments in challenging his tax conspiracy conviction.

Called the "Whitewater investigation" because of its ties to a questionable real estate development on the banks of the White River in the Arkansas Ozarks, the probe netted 14 convictions or guilty pleas, including those of Bill and Hillary Clinton's Whitewater Development Corp. business partners, James and Susan McDougal, and one-time Associate Attorney General Webster L. Hubbell, a law partner of Mrs. Clinton's at Little Rock's Rose Law Firm.

The investigation formally ended in September 2000, less legal appeals, when independent counsel Robert W. Ray declared there was "insufficient evidence" to bring charges against the Clintons. In an announcement seven weeks before the Nov. 7, 2000, presidential election, Mr. Ray said the lengthy probe, which focused on accusations that the Clintons obstructed justice and gave false testimony, was "now closed."

At the time, the White House, which had vilified Mr. Ray's predecessor, Kenneth W. Starr, portrayed the Ray report as vindication.

The Whitewater investigation, begun in 1994 by special prosecutor Robert B. Fiske, focused on accusations that the Clintons knowingly participated in criminal conduct related to Madison Guaranty Savings and Loan Association, the Little Rock thrift owned by the McDougals. The thrift failed in 1994 at a cost to taxpayers of $73 million.

The McDougals and Tucker were convicted in a $3.13 million scheme involving bogus loans through Madison Guaranty, which the McDougals owned.

The probe netted 14 guilty verdicts or pleas, including Hubbell, who pleaded guilty to tax evasion, mail fraud and concealment by scheme; Tucker, who was found guilty of conspiracy and mail fraud and pleaded guilty to conspiracy to defraud the Internal Revenue Service; McDougal, convicted by a jury of 18 felonies in Madison's collapse; and Mrs. McDougal, convicted of four felonies.

Other Clinton associates, bankers and real estate officials pleaded guilty to six felonies and eight misdemeanor charges in the case.

Mrs. McDougal was sentenced to two years, but served only 105 days before a judge released her because of a back problem. But she served 18 months on a contempt citation sought by Mr. Starr for refusing to testify before a grand jury about Mr. Clinton's role in the Whitewater affair.

With less than two hours remaining in his presidency, Mr. Clinton pardoned Mrs. McDougal. It was among 140 pardons and 36 commutations signed by the president as he prepared to leave office.

Refunds Grow Fat On Tax Changes (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, March 21, 2006

Taxpayers overpaid their federal income taxes by a record 29% in both 2003 and 2004, according to a USA TODAY analysis of Internal Revenue Service data.

That has pushed refunds above $200 billion a year. Final figures aren't in for the 2005 tax year, but the average refund so far is $2,423, up 4% from last year.

The fatter refunds are the result of taxpayers withholding nearly twice the traditional safety margin from their paychecks to avoid a year-end tax bill.

The extra withholding gives the government an interest-free loan worth more than $10 billion a year, equal to about $100 per tax return.

"The deficit is a little smaller because of this voluntary tax," says Leonard Burman, co-director of the Tax Policy Center in Washington.

Changes in tax rates automatically revise withholding levels, but changes in tax credits and deductions do not. Workers getting expanded credits or deductions must fill out new W-4 forms to change the amount of money deducted from their paychecks.

The child tax credit, which rose from $500 to $1,000 per child in 2001, is the biggest reason for a jump in excessive withholding. More than 25 million tax returns claim this credit, worth $55 billion in 2005.

Tax credits are available for a dozen purposes, including college education, adoption assistance and child care expenses. The portion of returns claiming at least one credit rose from 13% in 1995 to 31% in 2003. Credits reduce the tax owed dollar for dollar.

Expanded deductions for health costs, college expenses and retirement accounts also played a role. Deductions reduce income that is subject to tax, rather than the tax itself.

Overwithholding has grown fastest among families earning $50,000 or less a year because they benefit most from tax credits. Many low-income families obtain refund anticipation loans, which typically cost $100 or more, to get their money about 10 days earlier than from Internal Revenue Service.

"It's crazy to lend your money to the government interest-free and then pay triple-digit interest for a refund anticipation loan," says Chi Chi Wu, a lawyer with the National Consumer Law Center.

But many people love the forced savings and its reward — the fat refund — no matter how much it costs. "Taxes are so complicated people are just happy to come out ahead on April 15 rather than behind," says Ellen Katz, editor of the Tax Savings Report newsletter.

In-House Critic Holds IRS Feet To The Fire (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

For nearly three years, Nina Olson tried to get her bosses at the Internal Revenue Service to change an antifraud program that withheld thousands of tax refunds without notifying the suspected scofflaws.

Tired of being rebuffed, Ms. Olson, the National Taxpayer Advocate, launched an attack. In January, she released internal IRS documents showing that, in more than 65% of the cases she investigated, the agency ultimately determined the suspicions were unfounded and coughed up the refunds. Faced with the wrath of lawmakers and IRS critics, IRS Commissioner Mark Everson ordered a review of the program and promised to let taxpayers know when their refunds were frozen.

"Before going public, I had a lot of sleepless nights," Ms. Olson says now. "I didn't like embarrassing the IRS, but I didn't really have a choice. I had a moment of, 'What's going to happen to me after this comes out?' "

By any standard, Ms. Olson, who is 52 years old, has a tough job. As the taxpayer advocate, one of her tasks is to tell Mr. Everson what he's doing wrong -- and to take action if, in her view, injustices against taxpayers aren't resolved fairly and quickly.

It makes for a delicate and sometimes rocky relationship. Generally, the two meet once a month and discuss problems. "It is really just a nutty position," she says. "You get to say to the boss, 'This is good, but...' " Mr. Everson says there's "undoubtedly a certain amount of tension in the relationship." But he adds, "I don't think that there is an undue amount of tension."

The IRS has many people looking over its shoulder: the Treasury Department's Inspector General, an oversight board, Congress, and the Government Accountability Office. But only Ms. Olson is the designated "voice" of the taxpayer within the IRS. Congress created the position in 1998, when the IRS was under criticism for being unyielding and heavy-handed with taxpayers. Ms. Olson was appointed in 2001.

The give and take between the two can affect how the agency collects $2 trillion in annual taxes from America's 130 million individual taxpayers and 25 million businesses. Technically, Mr. Everson can't fire Ms. Olson: The taxpayer advocate is appointed by the Treasury secretary. But he writes her job evaluations, which can affect whether she keeps the confidence of Treasury Secretary John Snow.

Mr. Everson, a former deputy director of the White House Office of Management and Budget and a vice president of a private food-services company, has been IRS commissioner for three years. In that time, he has increased the number of audits, cracked down on illegal tax shelters, and earned the confidence of Congress to continue with his mission to remake the IRS.

Ms. Olson, who says she never had a boss before coming to the IRS, founded and was executive director of the Community Tax Law Project, of Richmond, Va., the first independent low-income taxpayer clinic in the U.S.

With something of a tough-guy reputation, Mr. Everson, 51, isn't inclined to strike deals with businesses or individual taxpayers to reduce the taxes or penalties they owe. Ms. Olson, while intolerant of fraud, is at the same time trying to moderate and nuance Mr. Everson's aggressive tone.

Though the difference in emphasis can produce clashes, the two often work in tandem behind the scenes to make navigating and understanding the IRS easier and fairer for taxpayers.

Yet there are the times when Mr. Everson and Ms. Olson view IRS problems from vastly different perspectives. In the case of the frozen refunds, Mr. Everson says the IRS wanted to fully investigate suspicious activity without tipping off possible tax cheats. Ms. Olson, who was peppered with complaints from taxpayers saying they had done nothing wrong and needed the money, argued that the program was punishing innocent people as well as guilty ones. Many of the refunds involved the Earned Income Tax Credit, which is designed to help low-income workers.

Another point of contention: Walk-in taxpayer-help centers. To save money, Mr. Everson proposed closing 68 of the agency's 400 walk-in service centers. His argument: Taxpayers should call the IRS or go online for help. Ninety percent of called-in questions are answered accurately, the highest percentage ever, he says. But the closings haven't gone forward because of objections from lawmakers and Ms. Olson, who say that face-to-face service is valuable.

Each year, Ms. Olson submits a report to Congress, detailing problems at the IRS and proposing remedies. She is working on the 2006 report. In past ones, she has criticized the IRS for rushing delinquent tax cases through the system -- a move that's meant to resolve cases quickly but sometimes results in unfair treatment of taxpayers, she says. Ms. Olson also says that IRS letters and notices need to be much clearer. "Many people can't understand the IRS rules," she says.

She also has faulted the agency for pushing some people into the appeals process for delinquent bills too quickly and has urged the IRS to steer clear of private debt collectors. She worries that sensitive taxpayer information will end up in the hands of private collection agencies.

Nevertheless, the IRS recently began a pilot program that would contract out some collections to three private firms. If successful, the program will expand to 10 firms by next year.

Mr. Everson, in response to Ms. Olson's complaints, says that reducing the time it takes for revenue officers to collect overdue taxes is an important initiative that benefits taxpayers with prompter, clearer service. Since assuming office, he has reduced the time it takes to close those tax-collection cases to an average of 38 weeks from more than 47 weeks.

Moreover, he says, while Ms. Olson has the luxury of focusing solely on taxpayers' concerns, he must also worry about ensuring that taxes are paid promptly. The tax gap -- the amount owed by taxpayers but not paid -- is estimated at $290 billion.

With no fanfare, President Bush signed a bill Monday pushing the ceiling on the national debt to nearly $9 trillion.

The measure allows the government to borrow an additional $781 billion and prevent a first-ever default on Treasury notes. It also lets the government pay for the war in Iraq without raising taxes or cutting popular domestic programs.

The debt limit increase was the fourth of Bush's presidency, totaling $3 trillion. With the budget deficit near record levels, an additional increase in the debt limit almost certainly will be required next year.

The measure allows the debt limit to rise from $8.184 trillion to $8.965 trillion.

AP2, March 21, 2006

Federal aid to help the poor cope with energy costs will increase by $1 billion to more than $3 billion this year under legislation President Bush signed on Monday.

It took months to get the additional money for the Low Income Home Energy Assistance Program through Congress, in part because of resistance from fiscal conservatives opposed to new spending and from lawmakers from warm weather states who contend that the program favors cold weather regions.

Proponents said the program's budget has failed to meet the needs of the poor as heating and cooling costs soar.

The $1 billion, on top of $2.1 billion already allotted for the current budget year, was obtained by transferring money originally intended for the budget year that begins Oct. 1.

Under a compromise worked out in the Senate, half of the new money would be distributed according to an existing formula that would favor warm weather states while the other half would be spent at the discretion of the president.

Choices Shrink In Drug Plan, Study Says (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

WASHINGTON — One of the first independent studies of the Medicare prescription benefit has concluded that many low-income California seniors now have access to a narrower range of drugs than when the state covered their medications, according to a report being released today.

The new federal program contains pitfalls for middle-class beneficiaries as well, the report said, because of wide differences in the number of drugs the private Medicare prescription plans cover. For example, among 10 plans the study analyzed, only two covered all of the top 100 medications taken by Medicare patients. Another two covered 99 of the drugs; one plan covered 71.

And higher monthly premiums did not necessarily mean access to a greater number or variety of prescription drugs.

Medicare administrator Mark McClellan took issue with the report's conclusions Monday, saying that many of the medications that plans do not cover have generic equivalents that cost much less and are paid for by the plans.

"The concern I would have is implying that because not every cholesterol drug is covered, that the plans aren't providing access to needed drugs," he said. "If that is the conclusion people draw, that is a misleading conclusion."

The report, among the first assessments based on government data rather than anecdotal evidence, comes as California is experiencing significant problems with the transition of low-income seniors and disabled people from the state Medi-Cal program to the Medicare drug plan. An emergency program instituted by the state as a backstop continues to pay for about 10,000 prescriptions each weekday.

Although focused on the California experience, the report's findings could have national implications, as federal and state lawmakers grapple with ways to work out problems with the new benefit.

"This is true across the country — this is not a California phenomenon," said Jonathan Blum, a vice president of Avalere Health, a Washington, D.C., consulting firm that conducted the study for the California HealthCare Foundation. Its findings will be presented today at a joint hearing of the California Assembly's health and aging committees.

On Jan. 1, when the Medicare benefit took effect, nearly 1 million elderly low-income Californians were automatically transferred into it from Medi-Cal, the state's version of Medicaid. The former Medi-Cal beneficiaries were assigned at random to one of several private plans, with no consideration of the drugs they were taking.

There were big differences in coverage among the plans, which have wide latitude in choosing the drugs they will pay for. Of those plans accepting Medi-Cal beneficiaries, the most inclusive covered 3,360 medications, while the most restrictive covered 626, the report found.

The Food and Drug Administration has approved about 8,000 medications, virtually all covered by Medi-Cal. The Medicare plans are required to offer at least two choices in every major class of drugs.

Focusing the analysis on four classes of medications — drugs used to treat psychosis, AIDS, high blood pressure and high cholesterol — the study found disparities.

"Many … beneficiaries, even if they are properly enrolled in a drug plan, have coverage that is inferior to their coverage under Medi-Cal for the four classes analyzed," the report said.

It also found that co-payments, although modest, are higher than what low-income seniors paid under Medi-Cal.

Among the drugs used to treat schizophrenia and other serious mental illness, Medi-Cal covered 20 medications, according to the study. Of the Medicare plans, one covered 15 of the drugs, while the most inclusive covered 21. The median was 18 medications.

Among AIDS drugs, the plans covered the same median number, 23, as Medi-Cal had.

There was a wider difference in coverage for drugs used to treat high blood pressure and high cholesterol. Medi-Cal covered 12 blood pressure drugs; the number covered by the plans ranged from five to 12, with a median of eight.

Similarly, Medi-Cal covered 14 cholesterol-lowering drugs, while the number covered by the Medicare plans ranged from seven to 20, with a median of 10.

Medications for severe mental illness and AIDS are in a specially protected category, under which Medicare requires the private plans to cover most or all available medications. Those special protections appear to be working, the report found.

But it questioned the policy of randomly assigning low-income beneficiaries to plans in which some of their drugs might not be covered.

"Especially to the extent that [beneficiaries] lose access to drugs that reduce other, higher-cost medical services, the state of California would face higher costs when Medi-Cal pays for the more expensive care," the report said.

Some California pharmacists say that all of the participants in the new drug plans are likely to face more coverage problems next month, after a 90-day transition period expires. Special medical authorization then will be needed to get drugs not on a plan's approved list.

"When April 1 rolls around, there are going to be more frequent incidents of patients having to confront these types of things," said John Cronin, owner of Community Pharmacy of Escondido. "Right now when we transmit [such] a claim, we get a message saying they'll cover it this time, but they're not filling it after April 1. We are basically sending that information to the physicians."

Before signing up for a drug plan, the report recommended, seniors should check not only whether the medications they currently take are covered, but also how many of the top 100 Medicare drugs are included. That way, they can have greater assurance of comprehensive coverage if they require new medicines.

Major Education Official Is Quitting For House Post (NYT)

By Diana Jean Schemo

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 20 — The federal Education Department's top official overseeing colleges and universities has resigned and will become deputy staff director of the House committee on education, the panel announced on Monday.

The official, Sally L. Stroup, the assistant secretary for postsecondary education, said in an interview on Monday that she submitted her resignation last Wednesday and would leave the department in mid-April.

"I've been here four years," Ms. Stroup said. "That was long enough."

In moving to Capitol Hill, Ms. Stroup will return to her onetime employer, officially known as the Committee on Education and the Workforce, for which she had worked for seven years.

Though her new job carries a less exalted title than the one she is leaving, Ms. Stroup said she would have a broader portfolio, overseeing legislation on disabled students, elementary and secondary schools, labor and other issues.

Her departure was first reported by The Chronicle of Higher Education on Friday.

Before joining the Education Department in 2002, Ms. Stroup was briefly a lobbyist for the University of Phoenix, the largest for-profit university in the country.

DOJ_NMG_0019770

The committee's new chairman, Representative Howard P. McKeon, Republican of California, has been considered an ally of the for-profit education industry, like his predecessor, Representative John A. Boehner, Republican of Ohio, the new House majority leader.

In recent months, the committee for the first time permitted institutions that teach more than half their courses online to receive federal student aid, a boon to for-profit institutions like the University of Phoenix.

The committee is expected to complete an updating of the Higher Education Act, the main federal law governing colleges and universities, in the coming months. Ms. Stroup has said that as assistant secretary she withdrew from any policy or regulatory matters directly involving the University of Phoenix.

She said on Monday that she did not expect to have to step aside in the same way in her new job, because legislation would address higher education or for-profit universities generally, not a single institution.

"I would never recuse myself from those kinds of things that have a broad reach across an entire industry," she said.

G.O.P. Makes Its Pitch To Firefighters' Union (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 20 — With the election season heating up, the Bush administration and the Republican Party used a good deal of energy and charm on Monday to woo a group that has long been part of the Democrats' base: organized labor.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff; Senator Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska; and the Republican National Committee chairman, Ken Mehlman, spoke to the annual legislative conference of the main firefighters' union, saying they were eager to work with the union on issues of common ground.

The White House chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., had been scheduled to speak, but canceled, citing illness. Mr. Mehlman praised the union for an increasing focus on bipartisanship and said if the firefighters and other unions worked with Republicans they could achieve more of what they were seeking, including greater preparedness for emergencies.

"We've sometimes disagreed, but we've always kept the dialogue open," he said. "There are areas where we can work together over the coming year."

Mr. Mehlman said the Republicans hoped to attract more union voters this year than in 2004, when 38 percent of union members backed President Bush, according to surveys of voters leaving the polls.

"I do think we can make greater inroads," he said.

Harold A. Schaitberger, the president of the International Association of Fire Fighters and the first prominent labor leader to back Senator John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts, for president in 2004, voiced the views of an increasing number of union leaders in saying it was important to work with Republicans.

"I realize that historically the Democrats have been friendlier toward workers," said Mr. Schaitberger, whose union has remained in the A.F.L.-C.I.O. as five unions have left the federation. "The bottom line is that at almost every level of government the government is split, and most legislatures are split. And you have to work both sides of the aisle to move an agenda."

The Teamsters, the service employees and other unions have begun cooperating with Republicans. But rarely have the Republicans made such strong overtures toward a union as they did on Monday toward the firefighters.

The firefighters have cachet because they are viewed as pillars in many communities and because 343 New York firefighters were killed on Sept. 11, 2001.

Sarah Chamberlain Resnick, executive director of the Main Street Republican Partnership, a group of Republican lawmakers that works closely with unions, said it was no coincidence that Republican leaders were courting union members.

"When the president is at 34, 36 percent in the polls, you have to begin to reach out," Ms. Resnick said. "The unions are not the president's base. So the White House is starting to reach out."

Her group has told unions that it is smart to reach out to Republicans.

"Republicans are in control, so it's good to have some friends who are in the majority," she said.

Mr. Chertoff promised that the administration would do a better job dispatching vital supplies to firefighters and other emergency workers when they respond to disasters.

Mr. Hagel urged the firefighters to help build a bipartisan consensus to deal with overarching problems like terrorism, poverty and health care.

Underlining the Republicans' difficulties in wooing union members, Howard Dean, the Democratic chairman, received far more applause than any Republican speaker. "We want American jobs that will stay in America," Mr. Dean said to thunderous applause.

He also called for "retirement security," saying Democrats, unlike many Republicans, would not seek to reduce public-employee pensions.

Some union leaders have voiced fears that labor's flirtation with bipartisanship could undercut efforts to return control of Congress to the Democrats, who have been friendlier to labor on issues like workplace regulation and raising the minimum wage.

As part of the bipartisan approach, Mr. Schaitberger said his union would back candidates, Republicans and Democrats, who have stood with the firefighters on issues like increased spending to hire first responders.

He said his union would back the re-elections of Republicans like Gov. Rick Perry of Texas and Senator Mike DeWine of Ohio but would seek to defeat Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in California and Senator Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania, two other Republicans.

"For those politicians who support our agenda, we will support them," Mr. Schaitberger said. "And for those who are looking to roll back the rights and improvements we've earned, we'll oppose them at every turn."

He criticized Mr. Bush for proposing to eliminate federal financing to hire additional first responders.

Mr. Schaitberger has revamped his union's political contribution so that 35 percent went to Republicans in 2004, up from 9 percent in 2000.

"We have one party that doesn't really care for us as labor and another that takes us for granted," he said. "I'm not sure which is worse."

Allen's 'Paycheck Penalty' Not Popular Among Peers (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, March 21, 2006

Sen. George Allen, testing the 2008 presidential waters while facing his own re-election in the fall, says members of Congress should not get paid if they miss the deadline for passing a federal budget.

The Virginia Republican's so-called "paycheck penalty" proposal has piqued the interest of fiscal conservatives, but is unpopular among his colleagues.

Mr. Allen's critics call the proposal disingenuous, noting that last week the senator voted to increase the federal debt limit to $9 trillion.

"There's a great need for fiscal responsibility in Washington," Mr. Allen said yesterday. "It's absurd that a full-time legislature at the Capitol can't get their job done by October 1st. There is no excuse why this can't get done on time."

Mr. Allen said that voting to raise the debt limit was difficult, but he defended it as "responsible" to avoid higher interest rates on government bonds.

The deadline for passage is the end of the fiscal year, Sept. 30, but Congress rarely meets that date.

Lawmakers, who earn $165,200 annually, are not penalized for being late and often agree on multiple continuing resolutions before resolving the budget just before Christmastime.

Mr. Allen said the system makes it difficult for lawmakers to scrutinize all the spending because they are eager to get home for the holidays.

Harris N. Miller, a Northern Virginia businessman seeking the Democratic nomination to challenge Mr. Allen in November, balked at the proposal.

"Being a senator is very serious business, which includes using the taxpayers' dollars wisely and learning words like 'no,' " Mr. Miller said. "It's clear that he's failed at his job."

Mr. Miller also called on Mr. Allen to return $229,308 to taxpayers -- the amount that Mr. Miller calculated the senator has received after the budget deadline since he took office in 2001.

Mr. Allen said yesterday that the proposal works only if paychecks for all of the lawmakers are withheld, "to apply real pressure."

Former Secretary of the Navy and author James H. Webb, who faces Mr. Miller in a June 13 Democratic primary, did not respond to calls or an e-mail to his campaign staff yesterday.

So far, no lawmakers have co-sponsored Mr. Allen's bill, which is pending review in the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

Mr. Allen said that Virginia, where he served as governor in the 1990s, knows how to keep a fiscal house in order. Chief executives there are allowed a line-item veto, a tool that he used several times when signing budgets. Lawmakers there, as in most states, also are required to pass balanced budgets.

Mr. Allen first introduced the idea during a speech to the Conservative Political Action Conference in February. In courting fiscal conservatives there as he explores a bid for the White House, he also proposed a presidential line-item veto and a balanced-budget constitutional amendment.

During the conference, the political insiders attending ranked Mr. Allen as most likely to be the Republican presidential nominee in 2008.

Alphonso Jackson: The Pinup And The Papa (WP)

By Laura Blumenfeld

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

The girls had wet lips, chasmic cleavage and hair that a man could get lost in. Their pictures hung on the wall above Brandon Rawlins's bed, at the Howard University freshman dorm.

"Who's that?" Rawlins asked, furrowing his brow at the blown-up photographs above Blakeley's bed.

"The secretary of housing and urban development," Blakeley said. "He's my mentor."

"Where's he live?"

"In D.C.," Blakeley said. "He's a Cabinet secretary."

Rawlins blinked. "What made him be your mentor?"

When Blakeley was a high school sophomore, he saw Alphonso Jackson give a speech. "I asked him a question, and he was really angry. I thought we should get an apology for slavery, and he disagreed. I said, 'Being a black Republican is an oxymoron.' "

Housing and Urban Development Secretary Jackson had heard it before, but when Blakeley confronted him, Jackson said, he saw something rare. Blakeley seemed angry, like many young black men, but also "extra intelligent." Six months later, Jackson sent Blakeley a note. Three years and many conversations later, Jackson wrote him a reference to Howard University. By the end of Blakeley's first semester, Jackson had brought him to the White House.

"Hey, give him my number," said Blakeley's friend Nick Owen. "Spread him around."

Jackson, 60, grew up in Texas the youngest of 12 children, the son of a foundry worker, the product of St. Peter's Academy for Coloreds, and the bearer of his own load of anger. To Jackson, becoming a Republican as a young man meant trading self-pity for self-reliance. He attended law school and then served as public housing director in St. Louis, in Washington, and in Dallas, where he befriended George W. Bush. Now he runs a $34 billion agency and relaxes by playing golf at his vacation home in Hilton Head, S.C.

But Jackson's happy ending is meaningless, he said, unless it is retold through the lives of other young blacks. It is why he reached out to Blakeley and why, on weekends, he is tape-recording his memoirs for his first grandchild. Jackson is a grandfather now and has a story to tell, one that he hopes will cast a spell.

"You think about your legacy when you get to be 60," Jackson said to Blakeley over a breakfast of eggs, bacon and sausage at the Hyatt on Capitol Hill one recent morning. The two men meet every few months. Jackson was escorted by security guards. Blakeley wore a $5 blazer and a $2 tie from a secondhand store. Blakeley is one of four children his single mother had with four men; for a while, he said, he lived in a homeless shelter.

"I expect to see you 15 years from now a deputy secretary or secretary, if not a millionaire," Jackson told him. "I've seen the denigration of black males. It's not what white people have done. It's that we haven't expected enough from our kids."

Jackson is a compact man, with a round, endearing face and spectacles that deflect his acknowledged temper. He is intense, a double-brewed man, like the two tea bags he dunks at once into his hot water, one herbal and the other caffeinated.

"I'm going to find you a great girlfriend. A great girlfriend makes your life easier," said Jackson, who remarried in 1988 after a divorce. "Women provide stability."

"What about fraternities?" Blakeley asked.

"You'll make friends for life," Jackson said. "The first lady's sorority sisters are around all the time."

Blakeley talked about his classes. "I was doing a report on Justice Thomas. Why can't I find anything positive?"

Jackson frowned. He meets Thomas, an old friend and fellow conservative, for breakfast here every six weeks. "Just give me one opinion that Thomas has written adverse to black people."

Blakeley nodded as if they were two men facing the same problem: "When I went to the White House, guys in my class said, 'You're a house Negro.' You should've heard them."

"They want to portray us as being callous and cold," said Jackson, stabbing a sausage with his fork. "And I don't mind." He chomped the sausage. But after Blakeley ran off to his 9 a.m. class, Jackson approached a table of NAACP leaders. He put his arm around one and said, "What are we going to do? You going to keep beating me up?"

It is a phrase -- "beat me up" -- that comes up often, sometimes figuratively, but also literally. One Sunday morning at Jackson's Alexandria townhouse, as he sat in the living room recording his life story for his granddaughter, he lifted his pant leg to his knee, revealing a jagged scar. In 1965, while working on voter registration in Alabama, he was beaten and was attacked by dogs.

Jackson's wife, Marcia, 50, sat listening, with luminous eyes. As the gears on his tape recorder turned, Jackson spoke of being arrested for using a whites-only bathroom, of witnessing a white policeman shoot and kill a neighbor, of learning that his father's land had been seized when he was wrongfully accused of raping a white woman.

"Lauren needs to know that's part of her heritage. Not to be bitter about but to project her to do well," Jackson said. "I was angry, very angry. I pushed myself through anger to be my best."

If there's a moral to Jackson's bedtime story, it is the triumph of action over anger. Jackson recalled the moment he realized he had succeeded: "At the first State of the Union, when they presented the Cabinet," Jackson's voice caught. He stared at Marcia, as his eyes turned red.

"You thought about your mom and dad," Marcia offered.

Marcia continued: "How much you appreciate all their sacrifices."

But what had caught in Jackson's throat, took hold inside of hers. The tape recorder whirred. The room was quiet. And when Lauren grows up and listens, she'll know this is the happiest part of the story, because her Mimi and her Papa are crying.

Bushes' Home Turf Loses Out In Bid To Host Presidential Library (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno

DOJ_NMG_0019774

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

West Texas, where George W. and Laura Bush grew up and met, was dropped from consideration as a site for the George W. Bush Presidential Library.

Former commerce secretary Donald L. Evans, a West Texan himself and chairman of the presidential site-selection committee, delivered the bad news in a letter late last week.

"This was a difficult decision for the committee," Evans wrote to David A. Miller, chairman of the West Texas Coalition, which represented Texas Tech University in Lubbock and Midland College in Midland. "Your team has brought to light many important ideas, and it is our hope that the final selection and site will make you and the institutions you represent proud."

Still in the running as library sites are Southern Methodist University in Dallas (Laura Bush's alma mater), the University of Dallas and Baylor University in Waco. Although SMU has little land available for new building, it is perceived to be the favorite because Laura Bush is a member of the board of trustees.

Longtime Bush adviser Karen Hughes and White House counsel Harriet Miers -- who also is advising the library selection committee -- also possess SMU degrees.

A Dallas lawyer recently sued SMU, alleging that the school used fraud and intimidation to oust residents of a condominium complex east of the campus to make room for the proposed Bush library.

SMU officials have denied the allegations, saying the school started buying the condo units long before a library was in the works. The condo purchases began in 1998, when President Bush was still Gov. Bush. SMU subsequently gained control of the condo board, designated the condos beyond repair and declared it will tear down the 347-unit complex.

One school not mentioned is Texas A&M University, which is home to the George H.W. Bush presidential library.

Intelligence Community Works At Common Pay System (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

The intelligence community -- comprising 16 government agencies -- plans to take the first steps this year toward pulling its tens of thousands of employees into a common pay system.

The IC, as it's known in the government's jargon, operates with a patchwork of pay rules that makes it difficult for intelligence agencies to share, reassign and recruit employees, according to officials. A White House commission last year called on John D. Negroponte , director of national intelligence, to create a more uniform pay and personnel system to help integrate operations and shape a more agile workforce.

Since that report, the departments of Homeland Security and Defense have firmed up plans to roll out performance-based pay systems this year. Pay changes also may come to parts of the FBI, such as its new national security branch.

"There can be no doubt that pay modernization is coming to the IC, and generally, I believe that is a good thing," Gen. Michael V. Hayden , principal deputy director of national intelligence, recently wrote intelligence employees.

Designing a common pay system for spies, code breakers, scientists, analysts and others around the world will be one of the most ambitious personnel-management projects undertaken by the government in decades.

There is no chain of command for unified management of intelligence personnel. Intelligence agencies use a range of pay models, from the traditional grade and step system to broad salary scales. Some offer special pay rates for hard-to-fill jobs, and some are steeped in traditions tied to agency mission.

There are also communities within the intelligence community, such as the national clandestine service and an evolving analytic group.

"It's the most complicated transformation that I've been involved in," said Ronald P. Sanders , who is helping steer the effort.

Sanders, chief human capital officer for the intelligence community, came to the post last year after a stint at the Office of Personnel Management, where he helped oversee plans to overhaul the pay and workplace rules at the departments of Defense and Homeland Security. He also has played key roles in personnel management at the Defense Department and the Internal Revenue Service, where he helped implement a restructuring ordered by Congress.

In an interview, Sanders pointed to the memo sent by Hayden to employees and his promise that officials "will reach out to you to share our thoughts and proposals, understand and address your concerns, and incorporate your ideas."

Sanders said there is no deadline for overhauling pay in the intelligence community, and, he added, there are no prescriptions, solutions or recommendations on the table.

He said officials will try to introduce the new system in phases.

The first phase will focus on research and listening to employees in the intelligence community, Sanders said. Out of that phase, IC officials will develop a series of options for consideration by IC leaders later this year, and their decisions will form the basis for drawing up a tentative plan. The last phase calls for taking the proposal back to the IC workforce to explain "what it looks like and why," Sanders said.

The IC has a mixed record on pay systems. A few agencies have adopted modern compensation practices, but CIA employees balked in 2001 when the agency explored possible changes in the way employees would be evaluated and paid. Employees were concerned about how pay changes might affect their pension credits and how performance ratings would affect pay raises. In the end, the CIA project was put on hold.

But Sanders said the IC cannot afford to allow pay disparities, created by the current patchwork of systems, impede the sharing of people. In addition, he said, many agencies need more flexible pay practices so they can better compete when recruiting candidates for entry-level jobs, particularly those who speak foreign languages and have other specialized skills and knowledge.

"There is this shared sense of mission amongst all parts of the community," Sanders said. "So that's a kind of binding force that offsets the structural impediments to building community, and it's something that we want to leverage."

Invest In Teachers (USAT)

By Tom Mooney

Public schools and the teaching profession should welcome classroom help from experts in fields such as science and math, as well as history, literature and the arts. But recruiting such experts — whether from academia, business or other professions — on a part-time or temporary basis will do little to alleviate teacher shortages in crucial subjects or reduce staggering overall attrition rates from teaching.

The Bush administration's proposal to import the concept of adjunct faculty from higher education and apply it to America's high schools is just another quick-fix attempt to avoid tackling the real problems that limit and drain the teaching talent pool. Low pay, poor working conditions and the lack of opportunity for advancement cause too many talented people to take a pass or just pass through.

Subject matter expertise is critical to effective teaching, but training in research-based methods of instruction is equally important. A brilliant chemist, engineer or historian might be unable to manage, much less motivate, engage and successfully instruct adolescents. Their expertise ought to be tapped as guest lecturers or tutors supporting the classroom teacher. They also can be invaluable in continuing education programs, and helping teachers advance their own expertise and keep up with developments in their fields.

The president's proposal is unlikely to be helpful, and it could erode the quality of teaching in America's high schools. The last thing secondary education needs is to replicate the extensive use of exploited adjunct faculty that is turning our public colleges and universities into academic sweatshops.

Tom Mooney is president of the Ohio Federation of Teachers.

Earlier this month, two top Army scientists from the Aberdeen Proving Ground in Maryland sat down with teachers from the nearby public high school to advise them on setting up a robotics course. Aberdeen scientists will also co-teach classes, mentor students and appear at school career days.

This sort of collaboration might sound non-controversial, but it's not. Teachers' union leaders are resisting a plan by President Bush to build an "adjunct teacher corps" of 30,000 experienced scientists and mathematicians, like those at Aberdeen, to assist in the nation's schools. The union leaders say raising teacher pay and improving working conditions, not bring in outside experts, is the way to enhance math and science teaching.

Those objections miss the larger point. The USA faces a challenge to its technology leadership that can't be ignored. Although this country was built on innovation, it now risks passing that mantle to international competitors, according to several recent credible reports.

Business and government leaders say retaining a creative edge requires doubling the number of math and technology majors by the year 2015. Meeting that goal requires reaching students early with instruction that is both competent and inspirational.

As it is now, fewer than a third of U.S. fourth- and eighth-grade students score at the proficient level in math. And U.S. students score below the international average on tests of math and science knowledge.

Inadequate instruction is at least part of the reason for those scores. An estimated 38% of math teachers in grades 7-12 lack either a major or minor in math.

A child who receives mediocre math and science instruction in elementary school is unlikely to complete algebra by eighth-grade. Completing algebra by that grade is a key predictor for who will pursue a college degree in science or math.

Here's where Bush's $25 million adjunct teacher plan, being considered by Congress, could prove invaluable. Some of these volunteer experts might advise teachers and mentor students, as the Aberdeen scientists are doing. Other scientists might become certified to try teaching as a full-time second career.

The private sector can support this. IBM already offers $15,000 in tuition and stipends to company scientists in New York and North Carolina who are interested in post-retirement teaching careers. The American Electric Power utility runs teacher workshops to improve math and science education.

Real-world experts know how to make their subjects interesting to students. Former Lockheed Martin chairman Norman Augustine, who chaired a National Academy of Sciences report on science education, recalls a recent visit he made to his grandson's preschool. After Augustine used the floor to lay out paper models of the planets, the students asked about Pluto. Because of rotational patterns, Pluto isn't always the outermost planet, he told them. And there's evidence of planets beyond Pluto, he said.

The students were fascinated.

Augustine and other private scientists bring detailed knowledge that can capture students' imaginations. Teachers should see them as educational partners, not as a threat to their livelihoods.

Be Sure Before You Censure (NYT)

By H. W. Brands

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

RUSSELL FEINGOLD, the outspoken Democratic senator from Wisconsin, wants to censure President Bush for authorizing wiretaps of Americans without court orders. His fellow Democrats haven't exactly leaped to his side, but a recent poll indicated that 46 percent of the public considers censure warranted. If that figure increases, Mr. Feingold may have company.

Still, history shows that he ought to move carefully. While many have compared the censure proposal to the impeachment of President Bill Clinton, there is a more relevant precedent: In 1834, America's most famous political orator, Henry Clay of Kentucky, arranged the Senate's only successful censure of a president, Andrew Jackson — and he never stopped paying for his accomplishment.

The bad blood between Clay and Jackson dated to the election of 1824, in which Jackson received the greatest number of popular and electoral votes, but not a majority of either. Clay finished third in the popular count and fourth in electors. The contest went to the House, and Clay threw his support to John Quincy Adams, who won the presidency and thereupon named Clay secretary of state — and next in line, in the practice of the day, for the White House. Jackson defeated Adams in an 1828 rematch, spoiling Clay's plans for the succession. But Clay maneuvered Jackson into vetoing a measure to renew the charter of the Bank of the United States, a privately controlled precursor to the Federal Reserve system. Clay forced the issue because he anticipated that the bank veto would undermine business confidence, which it did. Clay was wrong, however, in thinking this would fatally weaken Jackson in the 1832 election, in which Clay ran as the candidate of the new anti-Jackson coalition, soon to be called the Whigs.

Jackson was re-elected handily, and afterward withdrew the federal government's deposits from the Bank of the United States as punishment for its collusion in Clay's machinations. "The bank, Mr. Van Buren, is trying to kill me," Jackson told Vice President Martin Van Buren. "But I will kill it!"

Amid this so-called Bank War, Clay proposed to censure the president for removing those deposits without Congressional approval. The proposal enraged Jackson, who castigated Clay for being as "reckless and as full of fury as a drunken man in a brothel." It provoked an uproar in the Senate and the press, with Jackson's supporters rallying behind him as the defender of democracy against the moneyed interests, and his critics alleging that his interpretation of executive authority was revolutionary and unconstitutional. (Beyond the shouting, there were plausible arguments on both sides — as in the case of the Bush wiretaps.) On March 28, 1834, the Senate critics carried the day, approving the censure resolution by a vote of 26 to 20.

Clay thought he had won a great triumph. But the 1834 midterm elections returned control of the Senate to the Democrats, as the Jacksonians were called by then. And the Democrats refused to let the censure issue rest. Senator Thomas Hart Benton of Missouri, who had once shot Jackson in a street brawl (the president still carried bullet fragments in his shoulder) but eventually became the president's most devoted partisan, campaigned incessantly against the censure and all who had voted for it. His efforts helped make the retiring Jackson the focus of the 1836 presidential election, bringing voters out in force for Van Buren, Jackson's uncharismatic protégé.

The Democrats celebrated Van Buren's victory by voting to expunge the censure resolution from the records of the Senate. As Jackson, old and ill, prepared to leave Washington for the Hermitage, his plantation near Nashville, Benton choreographed an elaborate ceremony in which the original handwritten journal of the Senate from 1834 was carried into the chamber and the Senate's secretary, after drawing bold black lines around the censure resolution, wrote across it, "Expunged by order of the Senate."

Benton retrieved the secretary's pen and sent it to Jackson as spoils of victory, while Henry Clay was left to mutter against the "foul deed which, like the blood-stained hands of the guilty Macbeth, all ocean's waters will never wash out." Clay continued to pay for his temerity: in 1844, even as Jackson declined toward death, Clay lost his third (and final) race for the presidency to another Jackson protégé, James K. Polk.

Russ Feingold is no Henry Clay, at least not yet. And if he hopes to discredit Mr. Bush, as he doubtless does, I'd suggest he find means other than censure. The last thing today's Democrats want to do is to make George W. Bush look like Old Hickory.

H. W. Brands, a history professor at the University of Texas at Austin, is the author, most recently, of "Andrew Jackson: His Life and Times."

Man Overboard (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

I have a new theory about what's behind everything that's wrong with the Bush administration: manliness.

"Manliness" is the unapologetic title of a new book by Harvey C. Mansfield, a conservative professor of government at Harvard University, which makes him a species as rare as a dissenting voice in the Bush White House. Mansfield's thesis is that manliness, which he sums up as "confidence in the face of risk," is a misunderstood and unappreciated attribute.

Manliness, he writes, "seeks and welcomes drama and prefers times of war, conflict, and risk." It entails assertiveness, even stubbornness, and craves power and action. It explains why men, naturally inclined to assert that "our policy, our party, our regime is superior," dominate in the political sphere.

Though manliness is "the quality mostly of one sex," Mansfield allows that women can be manly, too, though the sole example he can seem to come up with, and deploys time and again, is Margaret Thatcher. "Is it possible to teach women manliness and thus to become more assertive?" he wonders, but not really. "Or is that like teaching a cat to bark?" Me-ow!

"The problem of manliness is not that it does not exist," Mansfield concludes. "It does exist, but it is unemployed." Well, um, excuse me, but I think -- it's just my opinion, now, maybe you disagree, and I'm sure we could work it out -- Mansfield has it exactly backward. Manliness does exist. The problem is that it's overemployed -- nowhere more than in this administration.

Think about it this way: Is a trait exemplified by reluctance to ask directions -- "for it is out of manliness that men do not like to ask for directions when lost," Mansfield writes -- really what you want in a government deciding whether to take a country to war?

The undisputed manliness of the Bush White House stands in contrast to its predecessors and wannabes. If Republicans are the Daddy Party and Democrats the Mommy Party, the Clinton White House often operated like Mansfield's vision of an estrogen-fueled kaffeeklatsch: indecisive and undisciplined. (Okay, there were some unfortunate, testosterone-filled moments, too.) Bill Clinton's would-be successor, Al Gore, was mocked for enlisting Naomi Wolf to help him emerge as an alpha male; after that, French-speaking John Kerry had to give up windsurfing and don hunting gear to prove he was a real man. And Bush's father, of course, had to battle the Wimp Factor. Mansfield recalls Thatcher's manly admonition to 41 on the eve of the Persian Gulf War: "Don't go wobbly on me, George."

No wimpiness worries now. This is an administration headed by a cowboy boot-wearing brush-clearer, backstopped by a quail-shooting fly fisherman comfortable with long stretches of manly silence -- very "Brokeback Mountain," except this crowd considers itself too manly for such PC Hollywood fare. "I would be glad to talk about ranchin', but I haven't seen the movie," Bush told a questioner.

There are, no doubt, comforting aspects to the manly presidency; think Bush with a bullhorn on top of the smoldering ruins of the twin towers. After a terrorist attack, no one's looking for a sensitive New Age president. Even now, being a strong leader polls at the top of qualities that voters most admire in Bush.

But the manliness of the Bush White House has a darker side that has proved more curse than advantage. The prime example is the war in Iraq: the administration's assertion of the right to engage in preemptive and unilateral war; the resolute avoidance of debate about the "slam-dunk" intelligence on weapons of mass destruction; the determined lack of introspection or self-doubt about the course of the war; and the swaggering dismissal of dissenting views as the carping of those not on the team.

The administration's manliness doesn't stop at the water's edge. Pushing another round of tax cuts in 2003, Vice President Cheney sounded like a warrior claiming tribute after victory in battle: "We won the midterms. This is our due," Cheney reportedly said. After the 2004 election, Bush exuded the blustering self-assurance of a president who had political capital to spend -- or thought he did -- and wasn't going to think twice before plunking down the whole pile on Social Security.

Mansfieldian manliness is present as well in Bush's confident -- overconfident -- response to Hurricane Katrina (insert obligatory "Brownie" quote here). And the administration's claim of almost unfettered executive power is the ultimate in manliness: how manly to conclude that Congress gave the go-ahead to ignore a law without it ever saying so; how even manlier to argue that your inherent authority as commander in chief would permit you to brush aside those bothersome congressional gnats if they tried to stop eavesdropping without a warrant.

Mansfield writes that he wants to "convince skeptical readers -- above all, educated women" -- that "irrational manliness deserves to be endorsed by reason." Sorry, professor: You lose. What this country could use is a little less manliness -- and a little more of what you would describe as womanly qualities: restraint, introspection, a desire for consensus, maybe even a touch of self-doubt.

But that's just my view.

Fed Chief: Rates Not Sign Of Slowdown (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said Monday the fact that long-term interest rates have stayed low, even though the central bank has been raising short-term rates since mid-2004, does not indicate a major, looming economic slowdown.

But in a speech to the Economic Club of New York, Bernanke said the reasons for the tame long-term rates, unusual during a period of Fed tightening, are unclear, as are the implications for future policy.

If low long-term rates signal investor expectations of a slower economy, a Fed response might be to ease short-term rates. If other factors, such as a decline in long-term inflation fears or higher demand, are in play, that would be more stimulative, and the Fed might need a higher short-term rate, he said.

"I will do a better job of raising questions than of answering them," Bernanke said in his prepared remarks. Bernanke said the Fed should monitor bond yields carefully, "but only in tandem with the signals from other important financial variables."

Long-term interest rates are usually higher than short-term rates because investors demand a premium to guard against uncertainty over the longer time horizon. But since mid-2004, when the Fed began raising short-term rates to guard against inflation, long-term rates have remained unusually low.

The Fed has pushed its target for short-term rates up 3.5 percentage points to 4.5%. The 10-year nominal Treasury note yield, at less than 4.75%, is not much above the Fed's short-term rate and is about even with yields on bonds maturing in one to three years.

Fed funds futures, a market in which investors make bets on future Fed decisions, indicate traders expect the central bank to raise short-term rates by another quarter-point when it meets March 27-28, with a 50% chance of an additional quarter-point increase in May, according to Moody's Economy.com.

Sometimes in the past, a small gap between long- and short-term rates has been followed by an economic slowdown, but Bernanke said he "would not interpret the currently very flat yield curve as indicating a significant economic slowdown to come." In a previous episode, when an inverted yield curve was followed by recession, interest rates were quite high, Bernanke said. Also, if the flatter yield curve reflects lower inflation expectations, it is a positive for the economy.

In a question-and-answer period following his speech, Bernanke said although there are risks, the outlook for consumer spending is still strong. He noted that although home price appreciation is likely slowing, wages were increasing, household wealth is growing and many consumers have locked in mortgages at low rates in recent years.

"Consumer finances are consistent with continued reasonable growth in consumption, enough to keep the economy growing at or close to its potential," Bernanke said. Economists keep a close eye on consumer spending because it accounts for two-thirds of all U.S. economic activity.

Global View Is Backed By Fed Chief (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

Ben S. Bernanke, the newly installed Federal Reserve chairman, suggested yesterday that the central bank would need to pay more attention to global financial conditions in setting interest rates, moving beyond its traditional focus on domestic economic forces.

In a speech to the Economic Club of New York at the Grand Hyatt Hotel in Manhattan, Mr. Bernanke said that to understand the reasons behind movements in American bond yields "an explanation less centered on the United States might be required."

In only his third speech since being sworn in as Fed chairman last month, Mr. Bernanke was also skeptical about the argument that the economy will slow in the near future, a view that many investors may take as a sign that the Fed is not quite near the end of its string of interest rate increases.

Mr. Bernanke built the prepared text of his speech around one of the most pressing puzzles in financial markets today: Why do long-term bond yields remain so low despite steadily rising short-term interest rates?

Traditionally long-term rates have fallen when investors have anticipated a slowdown in the economy or a decline in inflationary pressures. But Mr. Bernanke argued that other factors —including a worldwide imbalance between abundant savings and less robust investment — may be a more powerful explanation for the current phenomenon.

Over time, however, the challenge will come in determining whether global forces are likely to push rates lower than otherwise might be the case — or higher. The answer, Mr. Bernanke said, will be increasingly crucial to the conduct of monetary policy. If long-term yields are low primarily because investors are buying more long-term bonds — be they Chinese central bankers trying to manage the yuan's exchange rate or global investors more comfortable with long-term securities because of a decline of economic volatility — they would be adding an extra lift to consumer spending and business investment. That would tend to push the Fed to raise its key interest rate a little more than it might otherwise have considered appropriate.

"If spending depends on long-term interest rates, special factors that lower the spread between short-term and long-term rates will stimulate aggregate demand," Mr. Bernanke said. Other things being equal, he added, this "argues for greater monetary policy restraint" and higher short-term interest rates.

On the other hand, if the low bond yields are indicating that investors expect an economic slowdown around the corner, it might require the Fed to take a different tack.

The behavior of long-term bond yields has perplexed financial investors for many months. Starting in June 2004, the Fed has raised short-term rates from 1 percent to 4.5 percent in quarter-point increments. Yet the 10-year Treasury bond yield has inched ahead only slightly, and is now less than a quarter of a percentage point higher, creating a pattern known as a flat yield curve.

Financial investors awaited Mr. Bernanke's speech in hopes of combing it for signs of when the Fed might end its series of interest rate increases. The Fed is widely expected to raise its key rate another quarter of a point at its meeting next week, but analysts are divided over whether it will echo that increase in May.

Yet beyond discarding the notion of an economic slowdown, Mr. Bernanke refrained from providing any precise indication of what to expect from the Fed. "The implications for monetary policy of the recent behavior of long-term yields are not at all clear-cut," he said.

There was virtually no reaction in the bond market to Mr. Bernanke's speech, with yields on 2-year notes and 10-year bonds remaining nearly identical.

"This speech is not going to change anybody's mind that the Fed will raise interest rates next week," said Ashraf Laidi, chief currency analyst at MG Financial Group in New York. "But it leaves up in the air what the Fed will do at its next meeting in May."

Mr. Bernanke agreed that domestic factors were still highly important in determining long-term rates, pointing out that the drag on consumer spending from higher-priced energy and expectations that the housing market will cool might be keeping long-term interest rates low even as short-term rates rise.

But he threw a new element into the mix: the possibility that what he has referred to as a "global savings glut" — an excess in global savings over global investment — might also be weighing on long-term rates, with ambiguous implications for American monetary policy.

Considering all these elements left Mr. Bernanke perched on the fence. To the extent that lower long-term yields merely reflect investors increased appetite for long-term debt, he said, "the policy rate associated with a given degree of financial stimulus will be higher than usual."

But "to the extent that long-term rates have been influenced by macroeconomic conditions, including such factors as trends in global savings and investment, the required policy rate will be lower."

Bernanke Dismisses Fears Of US Slowdown (FT)

By Andrew Balls

Financial Times, March 21, 2006

Ben Bernanke, chairman of the Federal Reserve, dismissed the idea on Monday that the low level of long-term interest rates meant investors were pricing in the likelihood of a sharp and imminent slowdown in the economy.

"Although macroeconomic forecasting is fraught with hazards, I would not interpret the currently very flat yield curve as indicating a significant slowdown to come," Mr Bernanke said, in a speech prepared for delivery in New York on Monday night.

The Fed chairman said that – unlike in past episodes where a flat yield curve had preceded a recession – both short and long-term interest rates remained low. Also, other financial indicators, including narrow corporate bond spreads, suggested that market participants did not harbour "significant reservations" about the economic outlook.

But he said the low level of long-term rates had "ambiguous" implications for the central bank's policy decisions, as low rates reflected forces boosting US economic performance as well as the drag from the trade deficit.

Mr Bernanke said low long-term rates were in part the result of a decline in the "term premium" investors demand for holding longer-dated securities. This was stimulating economic activity and requiring tighter monetary policy to offset the effect of overall looser financial conditions in the economy.

The lower term premium in part reflects well-anchored inflation expectations, and expectations that the steadier macroeconomic performance of recent years would continue, he said.

But, drawing on his past speeches on the "global savings glut", Mr Bernanke said low long-term rates also reflected low levels of intended investment in the global economy relative to savings. Sluggish domestic demand growth outside the US, and in turn weak demand for US exports, was holding down global interest rates, resulting in a lower federal funds rate than would otherwise be needed, he said.

The new Fed chairman was careful to avoid drawing conclusions for policy and gave no hint about the point at which the US central bank would stop raising rates. Interest rate futures show that investors are pricing in a rise in the federal funds rate of another quarter point to 4.75 per cent at the Fed's March meeting, and about a 70 per cent chance of a rise to 5 per cent in May

Mr Bernanke concluded: "The implications for monetary policy of the recent behaviour of long-term yields are not at all clear-cut. Given this reality, policymakers are well advised to follow two principles familiar to navigators throughout the ages. First, determine your position frequently. Second, use as many guides or landmarks as available."

The Fed chairman played down the idea that purchases of US bonds by Asian central banks were an overwhelming influence on long-term rates, pointing out that interest rates were also low on other securities less favoured by official investors.

Further Rate Hikes By Fed Uncertain, Bernanke Says (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke said yesterday that it's unclear whether the central bank, seeking to keep the lid on inflation, should raise short-term interest rates much more because unusually low long-term interest rates are stimulating the economy.

Bernanke, in a speech delivered in New York, challenged recent suggestions by many analysts and some Fed officials that the central bank might have to increase its benchmark short-term rate higher than it otherwise would because low long-term borrowing costs continue to spur consumer and business spending.

"The bottom line for [Fed] policy appears ambiguous," Bernanke said, addressing a key concern among investors eager to divine how much higher central bank policymakers will raise their key short-term interest rate.

Bernanke, speaking just one week before his first central bank policymaking meeting as chairman, also repeated that unusually low long-term interest rates do not now presage an economic slowdown, as they have some times in the past.

Futures markets show that investors expect the Fed to raise the rate to 4.75 percent from 4.5 percent next week, and they believe the committee probably will increase the rate again in May to 5 percent.

The Fed has raised the rate at 14 consecutive meetings since June 2004, when it was at 1 percent. The federal funds rate, the rate charged on overnight loans between banks, directly influences other important short-term rates throughout the economy, such as banks' prime rate on business loans and the rates on many consumer loans linked to the prime. Those rates have risen steadily over the last 20 months.

But investors and economists remain puzzled about why long-term rates have not risen as well, and how the Fed should respond.

In the past, a rising federal funds rate also caused increases in long-term rates, such as the yield on the 10-year Treasury bond, which is a benchmark for mortgage rates. But, instead, those rates fell for many months after the Fed began raising the federal funds rate, a surprising development that former Fed chairman Alan Greenspan called a "conundrum."

Long term rates have been rising this year, but remain low. The average rate on a 30-year mortgage, for example, was 6.34 percent last week, or just slightly higher than it averaged in June 2004, according to Freddie Mac.

The yield on the 10-year Treasury bond, at 4.66 percent when the U.S. markets closed yesterday, was "not much" higher than the federal funds rate, Bernanke noted. Indeed, the 10-year yield was slightly lower yesterday than it was the day before the Fed started lifting the federal funds rate.

The appropriate Fed response to this situation is unclear, because it depends on why long-term interest rates remain so low, Bernanke said.

On one hand, investors globally appear to be demanding less compensation for the risk of lending money over time because they expect low inflation and healthy economic growth to continue for many years, he said.

In this case, the Fed would have to raise the federal funds rate to keep inflation in check, Bernanke said, because "the effect is financially stimulative and argues for greater monetary policy restraint."

On the other hand, low long-term rates appear also appear to reflect a surge in the demand for long-term securities by foreign central banks, oil producers, pension funds and other savers worldwide, Bernanke said. He attributed much of this to a "global saving glut," or an excess of saving relative to investment.

In this case, the weak demand for capital means global interest rates, and the Fed's benchmark short-term rate, "will be lower than they otherwise would be," he said.

Bernanke Delves Into Market Puzzle (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

Unusually low long-term interest rates could require the Fed to keep the short-term rates it controls higher -- or lower -- than normal, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said. It all depends on what is keeping long-term rates down.

Tackling one of the biggest current puzzles in financial markets, Mr. Bernanke turned to a theory he popularized a year ago to suggest that the Fed ought to keep rates lower than it normally would. He said a glut of world saving -- a result of high saving and weak investment demand across many countries -- might be keeping long-term rates unusually low.

If that is so, then the "neutral" short-term interest rate -- one that neither stimulates nor restrains spending -- will also be lower than normal, Mr. Bernanke said in a speech to the Economic Club of New York last night. Mr. Bernanke has discussed before what he has dubbed a "global saving glut," but his remarks yesterday were the most explicit in explaining what the phenomenon means for Fed policy.

However, Mr. Bernanke said other explanations for low long-term interest rates, such as a shortage of long-term bonds or strong demand from pension funds, would require the Fed to set its key short-term rate target higher than normal. Thus, "the implications for monetary policy of the recent behavior of long-term yields are not at all clear-cut," he concluded.

The Fed, he said, must watch bond yields closely but "only in tandem" with other financial-market prices, data on growth and inflation, and "a goodly helping of qualitative information."

Since June 2004, the Fed has raised its target for the Federal-funds rate charged on overnight loans between banks from 1% to 4.5%, but long-term Treasury yields have remained between 3.75% and 4.75%. Long-term rates are now barely above short-term rates, creating a flat "yield curve," which in the past has often presaged a slowdown or recession.

For the first time since Mr. Bernanke became chairman, the Fed's policy-making committee meets Monday and Tuesday. It is expected to raise the funds rate by one-quarter percentage point to 4.75%. It also is likely to signal a bias to raise rates further, though possibly with less certainty than it has to date.

Although Mr. Bernanke steered away from any clear signal on the direction of interest rates, his speech was notable in that he gave more weight to factors favoring a lower "neutral" funds rate than have some other current and previous Fed officials. Most officials who have studied the issue agree a variety of factors are at work; what differs is their emphasis.

Former Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan had previously suggested low long-term rates mainly reflected increased -- and perhaps, unwarranted -- confidence by investors that future economic growth, market conditions and inflation will be predictable and stable. New York Federal Reserve Bank president Timothy Geithner in a recent speech argued an important factor holding long-term rates down was foreign central banks' purchases of U.S. bonds. Mr. Bernanke, though, gave little weight to the impact of foreign central bank buying. That should have only a "short-term" impact, he said, noting that "long-term yields continued to fall over recent quarters" even as foreign central bank buying of Treasurys slowed.

Mr. Bernanke, like other officials, argued the yield curve did not seem to be foreshadowing a slowdown.

He also sounded an upbeat note on the economic outlook in response to questions after his remarks. While U.S. consumers may boost their saving in coming years as housing prices moderate, that "would not necessarily be a problem for the sustained expansion" and their spending continues to be lifted from past increases in home prices. He added that only about 10% of residential mortgages will be repriced this year, so the impact of higher interest rates will be gradual. He also said it was encouraging that "we are beginning to see cyclical recovery in Europe and Japan."

He also reviewed several structural factors that could be holding down long-term rates. He noted the economy was also less volatile in the 1950s and 1960s and the structure of interest rates was similar. He said pension funds may demand more long-term bonds to fund the benefits of future retirees, while at the same time issuance of very-long-term U.S. dollar bonds has diminished. If these factors explain why long-term rates are so low, "the effect is financially stimulative and argues for" a higher Fed-funds rate, "all else being equal."

By John McAuley

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

A gauge of future economic activity slipped 0.2% in February to 139, according to preliminary estimates by the Conference Board.

The private research group said its composite index of leading indicators edged down in February after a revised 0.5% increase in January, when the index was originally reported to have increased 1.1%.

The February reading for the leading index came in slightly less weak than the -0.3% median estimate of 21 economists surveyed by Dow Jones Newswires.

The index was equal to 100 in 1996.

Though the index of leading indicators has been volatile since Hurricane Katrina struck last year, the reading has been generally flat over the past five months. "This suggests that economic growth in the year ahead should be weaker than in the past year," said Steven Wood, an economist at Insight Economics, in a note to clients. "However, it does not suggest that growth will be extremely sluggish or will turn negative."

The Conference Board noted that five of the 10 indicators that constitute the leading index showed improvement in February. The largest positive contributions came from manufacturers' new orders for nondefense capital goods, followed in order by real money supply, average weekly manufacturing hours, new orders for consumer goods and materials, and the interest-rate spread.

The negative contributors were: vendor performance, the index of consumer expectations, average weekly jobless claims, building permits and stock prices.

The Conference Board's composite index of coincident indicators increased 0.3% in February to 122.1, after no change in January. The index of lagging indicators was up 0.1% in February at 122.6, after a revised 0.5% rise the month before. The Conference Board is a nonprofit research and business membership group that computes the composite indexes formerly compiled by the U.S. Department of Commerce.

Investors Sit On Their Hands (WSJ)

Oil prices plunged Monday, a development that normally would send stocks soaring. But Wall Street seemed paralyzed by news of an afterhours speech by Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke, and stocks remained little changed.

Benchmark light, sweet crude futures for April, set to expire Tuesday, fell $2.35, or nearly 4%, to settle at a one-week low of $60.42 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. While the decline didn't spur stocks higher ahead of Mr. Bernanke's speech and a report Tuesday on producer price data, oil is on the radar, and further declines could lend support to stocks.

Jay Suskind, director of trading at Ryan Beck in Florham Park, N.J., said that if oil prices fell significantly below $60, traders will take note. "If it breaks one way or the other, it will have an impact," he said. "It gives more credence to inflation being under control, because certainly energy has a lot to do with it."

Falling oil prices helped at least one group of stocks Monday: airlines. The Dow Jones Transportation Average was up 0.5%, with Continental Airlines and AMR the average's best performers, up 5.4% and 3.3%, respectively. Transport stocks have been hitting all-time highs and the average is up nearly 10% year-to-date.

Overall, the Dow Jones Industrial Average was down 5.12 points to 11274.53, with McDonalds losing 1%. An earlier advance put the average about 30 points shy of its highest level since January 2000, the same month the Dow industrials hit their all-time closing high of 11722.98. Wal-Mart Stores was the best-performing component, up 2.3%, after the retailer said it plans to add 150,000 new jobs in China over the next five years.

Other indexes were little changed but still near multiyear highs. The Nasdaq Composite Index, heavy with technology stocks, rose 7.63 to 2314.11. Microsoft gained 1.4% on reports that it is working on a secret hardware project with chip maker Transmeta; Dell was ahead by 2.3% on news it plans to double the number of its mostly call-center employees in India to 20,000. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slid 2.17 to 1305.08.

Treasury bond prices were higher, sending yields lower. The benchmark 10-year Treasury note was up 5/32, or $1.56 for each $1,000 invested, at 98 25/32 to yield 4.66%. The 30-year bond was up 11/32 at 96 30/32, yielding 4.70%.

With little economic data on tap today, stock and bond traders are mostly waiting on Mr. Bernanke's speech tonight at the Economic Club of New York, and tomorrow's report on the producer prices. Little is expected from the speech, but that isn't stopping the market from following the new Fed chief's every utterance just a week before he presides over his first Federal Open Market Committee monetary-policy meeting.

"Bernanke is going to define what is going to happen to interest rates," said Paul J. Nolte, director of investments at Hinsdale Associates in Chicago, adding that the Fed chief isn't likely to say anything new or too eventful ahead of next week's meeting. "Everyone is lining up for one and done at this point. Wall Street is going to parse his words very closely to get to expectations."

While policy makers are widely expected to raise rates another quarter-percentage point to 4.75%, the outlook after that has become less clear amid signs that economic growth is slowing. Last week, stocks rallied after the consumer price index excluding food and energy rose just 0.1%, raising hopes that the Fed won't raise rates more than once or twice more. This week will bring more fodder with the PPI, due tomorrow morning. The measure of wholesale prices rose at a 0.3% rate in January, and the "core" rate, which excludes food and energy, jumped 0.4%, sending stocks lower.

In today's sole economic release, the Conference Board said that leading indicators fell 0.2% last month, a more moderate decline6 than the 0.3% decline expected by economists. While the figure shows that economic growth is slowing and supports the case for the Fed halting its rate increases, market reaction to was limited.

The housing market may offer more evidence of a slowdown amid rising interest rates. Boston Fed President Cathy Minehan said in a speech to the New England Realtors Conference that while the short-term economic outlook remains positive, there are other risks to the longer-term outlook, she said, and the housing sector is "one of the greatest areas of uncertainty." Also speaking today is San Francisco Fed President Janet Yellen at the 2006 national Community Reinvestment Conference.

After the market closed, Oracle said its fiscal third-quarter net profit jumped 42% as revenue climbed 18% on stronger demand for its database and business applications software. A new crop of value investors will be carefully watching7 Oracle's financial results, The Wall Street Journal reported, digging for clues about whether the software giant's stock has become cheap enough to buy. Shares were up 1% in regular trading, but pulled back in after-hours trade.

Blue Chips Pull Back In Cautious Trading (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

Following its biggest weekly gain in two months, the Dow Jones Industrial Average edged backward, as investors awaited an evening speech on interest rates by the Federal Reserve's new chairman, Ben Bernanke.

As analysts speculated about whether Mr. Bernanke would use his speech to the Economic Club of New York to hint at when rate increases might end, the Dow Jones Industrial Average inched down 5.12 points, or 0.05%, to 11274.53, little changed from Friday's 4½-year high. It is up 5.2% this year. Trading volume was below average.

"People were just kind of waiting to hear" Mr. Bernanke's interest-rate comments, said Mike McDonald, a trader at Boston-based brokerage firm Canaccord Adams. An end to rate hikes soon would help stocks by holding down costs for businesses and consumers.

The index of leading indicators declined in February, the Conference Board announced, suggesting that economic growth may be slowing. Slower growth makes it easier for the Fed to stop raising rates.

Treasury-bond prices rose slightly, pushing yields lower, on hopes for some kind of signal from Mr. Bernanke.

Investors also were expecting that today's report on February wholesale prices would show a decline, to go with the very small rise in February consumer prices announced last week. Tame inflation reduces fears of an overheating economy, which makes it easier for the Fed to stop raising rates.

Oracle announced strong quarterly profits, but, in a sign of investors' rising expectations, it wasn't enough to keep the stock from falling 3.1% in after-hours trading.

The Nasdaq composite rose 0.33%, or 7.63 points, to 2314.11, up 4.9% this year. The S&P 500 fell 0.17%, or 2.17 points, to 1305.08, up 4.6% this year.

Crude-oil futures sagged $2.35 to $60.42 a barrel on signs that supplies remain strong. Gold, however, continued its rebound, up $1.10 to $555.20 a troy ounce.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.39%, or 0.84 point, to another record, 214.85.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks were mixed1; bonds gained2. The 10-year Treasury note rose 4/32, or $1.25 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.658%. The 30-year bond was up 10/32 to yield 4.699%.

The dollar strengthened.3 Late in New York, it traded at 116.21 yen, up from 115.82, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2170 from $1.2195.

The Daily Grail: 'Da Vinci Code' Trial Wraps Up (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

LONDON, March 20 -- The "Da Vinci Code" copyright infringement trial, which ended in a London courtroom Monday, combined lively peeks into a celebrity author's lifestyle and hours of legal arcana so numbing that they put a white-wigged attorney to sleep within feet of the judge.

Fans of media-shy author Dan Brown learned that his inspiration to write fiction came on a Tahitian vacation when he read Sidney Sheldon's alien-invasion thriller "The Doomsday Conspiracy." The next day lawyers were arguing about obscure points of religious history, such as whether and why Pepin the Fat murdered Dagobert II, and what Godefroi de Bouillon was really up to during the First Crusade.

In 12 days of testimony over three weeks, authors Michael Baigent and Richard Leigh tried to prove that Brown stole the idea for his mega-selling novel from a nonfiction book they published in 1982, "The Holy Blood and the Holy Grail." Judge Peter Smith, a man so soft-spoken that his words often seemed to have trouble escaping his thick black mustache, said he hoped to issue a ruling by April 8.

At stake is a multimillion-dollar slice of Brown's pie, which includes sales of nearly 40 million books and an upcoming Hollywood film starring Tom Hanks that, if "Da Vinci's" luck holds, is expected to sell movie tickets and Raisinets from here to the Sea of Tranquillity. (And next week the paperback, a massive 5 million copies, will finally hit U.S. shelves.)

John Baldwin, attorney for Random House U.K., the British publisher of both "Da Vinci" and "Holy Blood" and defendant in the lawsuit, said in his closing statement that the case of Baigent and Leigh is "in tatters." Baldwin said Baigent's testimony was so unreliable that he is either "deluded," "extremely dishonest" or a "complete fool."

Jonathan Rayner James, attorney for Baigent and Leigh, was equally unimpressed with Brown, a clean-cut former prep-school English teacher who traveled from the seclusion of his New Hampshire home to spend nearly three days on the witness stand.

"His evidence should be approached with deep suspicion," James argued in his closing statement, calling Brown uncooperative. He said Brown was evasive about key facts, such as when he purchased a copy of "The Holy Blood," which Baigent and Leigh wrote with a third author, Henry Lincoln, who is not a party to the lawsuit.

In the courtroom, Brown appeared to take great pains to remain polite and patient during lengthy questioning by James, one of Britain's leading copyright specialists.

Brown, who explained his wife, Blythe Brown, does a lot of his research, acknowledged reading "The Holy Blood and the Holy Grail." He mentions it prominently in "The Da Vinci Code" and on the stand he admitted that he had "reworked" passages from it for use in his book. He said he never copied directly and using the reworked passages is "how you incorporate research into a novel."

Brown said the book was one of dozens he used to research his novel, and he didn't consult it until well after he had formulated the main plot. But James argued that he had a copy of the book much earlier and that it was much more important to the research than Brown admitted.

Smith, the judge, aggressively challenged James's arguments throughout the day Monday and repeatedly questioned the basis for the suit. He asked James how he could argue that Brown was hiding the fact that he read "The Holy Blood and the Holy Grail" when his characters in "The Da Vinci Code" discuss it admiringly in one scene.

The trial attracted reporters from around the world, and all manner of hangers-on. Bored-looking British teenagers on a school trip came one day, while a steady stream of cheery American tourists -- most of them obvious Brown fans -- made their way through the metal detectors and up to the 10th-floor tribunal in London's ornate Royal Courts of Justice.

On Monday two young men in their early twenties wandered in, one wearing a Las Vegas sweat shirt and the other clutching Frommer's guide to London. With Brown long since departed, they crept back out after 15 minutes of dry-as-dust legal arguing between James and Smith.

Lynn Picknett and Clive Prince attended every day of the trial. Brown used a book they wrote, "The Templar Revelation," in his research and mentioned it in his novel. Rather than suing, Picknett and Prince said they sent Brown a thank-you note.

"It was something of an honor, we thought," Picknett said.

Much of the case, and almost all of Monday's final arguments, centered on what can be protected under copyright law, and how extensively an author can use the product of another's research and writing.

James argued that Brown had lifted the central themes of Baigent and Leigh's book. But Baldwin countered that those themes were not protected by copyright law because they were so general, and most of them had been published in other books before Baigent and Leigh's.

Both books involve the idea that Jesus married Mary Magdalene, that they had a child and that the bloodline continues to the present. There are also significant differences, including that Baigent and Leigh posit that Jesus did not die on the cross. Brown sticks to the traditional story of Jesus's death.

Brown attended the trial until he finished testifying, but his place at the front table was empty Monday. Leigh and Baigent were still in their familiar seats, Leigh in his regular brown leather jacket and aviator sunglasses, with stringy hair, mutton chops and mustache, looking like he just rode his Harley in from Daytona Beach.

Baigent, whose book "The Jesus Papers" comes out next month, sat next to Leigh wearing a crisp gray suit and tie. In the hall as the last day of the trial started, he said he was ready for it to be over.

"I'm shattered," he said, referring to his exhaustion. "It's just been really tiring."

Swing Is Still King At The Polls (WP)

By Mark J. Penn

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

We hear it every day: America is divided into two camps -- red and blue -- and the key to elections is just energizing the base.

But in fact, while the base is critical, it's not the whole picture. Behind all the rhetoric, the reality is that swing is still king. The two or three or 10 voters who are the quietest in focus groups, who never demonstrate and who belong to no political party, will be the ones who determine the political course of America.

This is less true in Washington, where everyone has to choose sides to survive, but outside the Beltway, trends show that voters are increasingly open and flexible, not rigid. They are looking at candidates' records and visions, not their party affiliation.

In the past 50 years independents have grown from one-quarter to one-third of the electorate, according to Gallup polls. In California, the number of independent voters more than doubled between 1991 and 2005. The fastest-growing political party in the United States is no party.

According to the American National Election Studies at the University of Michigan, the number of split-ticket voters in the electorate -- meaning people who vote for a Democrat for president and a Republican for Congress, or vice versa -- has gone up 42 percent since 1952. That shows a radical new willingness on the part of Americans to look at individual candidates, not party slates. It is a sign of a thinking electorate, not a partisan one.

When asked, Americans have a characteristic swagger and express that they definitely will or will not vote for candidates and parties. In 1995, 65 percent of voters said they would never vote for Bill Clinton. One year later they reelected him in a landslide.

Recent polls show that rather than a static electorate, we have a dynamically changing one. Based on the polls six months ago, journalists were declaring Republican hegemony. Today, Democrats have the widest margin in two decades on the generic congressional vote.

Was there a sudden surge in the number of hard-core Democrats answering surveys, or was it just a matter of America's swing voters deciding that President Bush is failing on the economy, the war and, recently, national security, by compromising the ports? Clearly, there is a massive swing electorate out there that is receiving more information from more sources than ever before -- and acting on it.

According to CNN exit polls, in the presidential elections of 1996, 2000 and 2004, one-fifth to one-third of voters made up their minds in the last month before the vote. Indeed, in the summer of 2004, voters swung from an eight-point lead for John Kerry to a 13-point lead for Bush, and in the end gave Bush a victory by only three points.

We can expect the same variability in the 2006 and 2008 elections. In a Gallup poll from last August, 83 percent of Americans said either that they hadn't seriously considered who they'll support or that they weren't really paying much attention. Asked in January whether they would vote for a Republican or Democrat for president in 2008, 34 percent of registered voters said "neither" or that they could go either way.

And an analysis of the last presidential election shows that while turnout was indeed higher, it was higher on both sides, canceling out the impact of the appeals to the two bases. Middle-aged women and Hispanic voters were the key voting blocs that made the difference, swinging the vote from Kerry to Bush. In fact, in 2004 women made up 54 percent of the U.S. electorate, the highest percentage in history. Their interest in and impact on politics has been increasing.

Choosing between appealing to the base and the swing vote is, as President Bill Clinton would say, a "false choice." His signature policies -- family and medical leave, 100,000 cops, middle-class tax cuts, a strong national defense, and a balanced budget -- drew support from both Democratic die-hards and voters in the vitalcenter.

In 1996 we identified soccer moms as the critical swing voters. Today they remain at the center of the swing vote, but they're a decade older and their kids are going off to college. Now they get their information from the Internet as well as TV, radio and print media, making them the most informed swing voters in history. And while they had little time when their kids were 6 and 8, many of those boomers are now getting some extra time to think about what's going on in America and the world.

These voters are untethered to either political party. While it's become conventional wisdom to say that voters' minds are firmly made up, and that certain candidates can or cannot win, it's just not true. The growing bloc of swing voters takes a hard look at candidates much later in the process, and they adjust and shift as they gather information. They may seem like wallflowers in the political process right now, but they are the ones a successful campaign eventually needs to cross the finish line.

Sabo to retire

Rep. Martin Olav Sabo is retiring after 46 years in state and national politics, saying Congress has become more polarized and less hardworking during his years there.

The 68-year-old Minnesota Democrat, known for his understated style, said he sensed it was time to quit.

"I've always believed the fundamental problem with politics today are people who overpromise and overstate. I've tried to do the opposite," Mr. Sabo said Saturday. "I've also tried to treat my colleagues with respect. I don't recall ever making a public statement critical of my colleague, whether it's Democrat or Republican."

Mr. Sabo was first elected to the state House the same year John F. Kennedy won the presidency, then spent almost 28 years in Congress. He serves on the House Appropriations Committee and has helped steer millions of dollars to the Minneapolis-St. Paul area.

His retirement at the end of the term is expected to set off a stampede among Democrats eager to succeed him in his liberal Minneapolis district, where John Kerry won 71 percent of the vote in the 2004 presidential election, the Associated Press reports. State Rep. Keith Ellison and Gary Schiff, a member of the Minneapolis City Council, both said they will run in the Sept. 12 state primary.

Nominee blocked

Sen. John Ensign, a former veterinarian, didn't like the way pet evacuations were handled after Hurricane Katrina, but Senate insiders say that is not why the Nevada Republican has a hold on the nomination of Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen to be the Coast Guard commandant.

Adm. Allen, who took over post-Katrina operations after Mike Brown was fired from the Federal Emergency Management Agency, was nominated by President Bush in January to take over the 200-year-old Coast Guard.

Jack Flynn, Mr. Ensign's spokesman, says his boss has a "series of questions we want answered from the nominee before the senator is comfortable moving forward," but declined to say what issues the questions address.

The hold has baffled some former Coast Guard officials, including Stephen Flynn, a retired Coast Guard commander and senior fellow for the Council on Foreign Relations.

"Surely, he can find a better way to advance his pet issue of pet evacuation other than tripping up the appointment of the most highly respected Coast Guard leader of the one agency that earned universal acclaim in the Katrina disaster," Mr. Flynn said.

Mr. Ensign met with Adm. Allen last fall to discuss rescue efforts and the plight of abandoned animals, but a Capitol Hill source familiar with the hold procedures says it is not related to animal rescues.

Ultrasound images

Michigan Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm will sign a bill requiring abortion providers to give pregnant women the option to see ultrasound images of their fetuses, a spokeswoman says.

Mrs. Granholm, a Democrat, generally has opposed legislation that regulates or limits abortion, but the bill was amended so it no longer requires pregnant women to see the ultrasound images, spokeswoman Liz Boyd said Sunday.

Until now, Michigan law has required that women seeking abortions be allowed to review diagrams and descriptions showing a developing fetus, but not their own.

Pro-life advocates hailed the new law. Right to Life of Michigan said it ensures that pregnant women have fuller access to accurate information before having abortions. Critics called it a further erosion of women's rights, the Associated Press reports.

No Al in '08

Former Vice President Al Gore said yesterday he has no plans to run for president in 2008, but hasn't ruled out a future in politics.

"I'm enjoying what I'm doing," Mr. Gore told an audience at Middle Tennessee State University, where he gave a lecture on global warming, according to the Associated Press.

"I'm not planning to be a candidate again. I haven't reached a stage in my life where I'm willing to say I will never consider something like this," he said. "But I'm not saying that to be coy. I'm just saying that to be honest -- that I haven't reached that point."

Vacation days

The House of Representatives is on track this year to be in session for fewer days than the Congress Harry S. Truman labeled as "do-nothing" during his 1948 re-election campaign, USA Today reports.

Members of Congress are taking an entire week off for St. Patrick's Day. It's the latest scheduling innovation to give members more time to meet with constituents. Through Friday, the House was in session for 19 days this year, compared with 33 for the Senate, USA Today reporter Kathy Kiely writes.

If they stick to their current schedule -- including two weeks off in April, a week in May and July, plus all of August -- House members will spend 97 days in Washington this year. The House was in session 108 days in 1948, according to the chamber's archives, compared with 141 days last year.

Failure to vote

Republican U.S. Senate hopeful Kathleen Troia McFarland, who repeatedly skipped New York elections, failed to vote for President Reagan even while working for him in Washington, the New York Post reports, citing newly acquired records.

Mrs. McFarland, a Park Avenue matron who says she drafted Mr. Reagan's "Star Wars" defense proposal while serving as a high-level Pentagon official from 1982 to 1985, didn't vote in 1984, when the president was seeking re-election, records obtained by the Post show.

An official voter profile from the Washington, D.C., Board of Elections & Ethics shows Mrs. McFarland, who hopes to challenge Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, registered to vote from a Washington address in June 1983, when she served as deputy assistant secretary of defense for public affairs, a position she describes as equivalent to a three-star general.

Schumer's 'skinheads'

"Don't look now, but we think Charles Schumer just compared Arab businessmen to skinheads," the Weekly Standard's Scrapbook column says.

"According to a piece in the New York Observer last week, Schumer's beating the drums to kill the Dubai ports deal came under fire from many quarters, with some critics suggesting that opposition to the deal was driven by xenophobia or anti-Arab racism. Mr. Schumer heatedly disputes that view. 'Let's say skinheads had bought a company to take over our port,' he said. 'I think the outcry would have been the same.'

"So why exactly do businessmen who happen to be Arabs deserve to be compared with skinheads, Mr. Schumer?"

A Gore Comeback? New Run At President Has Historic Precedents (AJC)

By Scott Shepard

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — Is history calling Al Gore back into the political fray?

History says candidates who won the popular vote but lost in the electoral college have all gotten their revenge with victories in subsequent elections. And now, after years of calling himself a "recovering politician," Gore is flirting again with politics.

Or is he?

Even those who were part of his inner circle in 2000, when Gore lost the White House to George W. Bush in one of the closest and most controversial presidential elections in American history, still don't have a clear idea what the former vice president is thinking in terms of a 2008 campaign.

"I do not know for sure if he's looking or flirting," Donna Brazile, his 2000 campaign manager, said in an interview Monday. "But, I have an opinion — Gore remains a headliner and can raise money and rally the base."

Speculation about Gore's intentions has intensified in recent weeks due to three events: his Martin Luther King Jr. holiday speech in January lambasting the president for "breaking the law" with his warrantless domestic surveillance program; his message to Democratic donors in February soliciting funds for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee; and his party fund-raising appearances this month in Florida, the scene of the contentious vote recount that ended with a Supreme Court ruling that made Bush president in the 2000 election.

Gore's activities prompted pollster Lee Miringoff to include Gore in a recent poll on possible Democratic 2008 contenders. It found Gore was second only to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York. Clinton was the favorite of 33 percent, Gore was the choice of 17 percent.

"The numbers suggest that a case could be made for Mr. Gore in 2008 ... though it's a little unclear what he may have in mind," Miringoff said in an interview. "Clearly, he is someone to be watched, especially as an alternative to Hillary Clinton."

Chris Lehane, who was Gore's chief spokesman in the vice presidential office and later in the presidential campaign, noted in an interview that "Gore has been pretty public that he does not intend to run in 2008" and, he added, "I do think that this is indeed where his head is right now."

But political analysts, in considering the prospect of a Gore comeback, cite the historic precedents of candidates who won the popular vote but lost the electoral college vote, only to win later: Andrew Jackson, losing in 1824 and winning in 1828, and Grover Cleveland, denied in 1888 but triumphant in 1892.

Gore "may be a man whose time has come in his party," Dick Morris, a political adviser to Bill Clinton for 20 years, wrote recently in his column for The Hill newspaper. "Like a completely refurbished 'pre-owned vehicle,' Al Gore seems to be positioning himself to Hillary Clinton's left and greener than John Kerry ... His slogan might well read 're-elect Al Gore.' "

Longtime Republican operative Roger Stone Jr. made similar points in a column for the New York Observer, citing "uncanny parallels" in the careers of Gore and Richard Nixon, who narrowly lost the White House in 1960 but rebounded to win it in 1968.

But Brazile acknowledged that there are "some voters [who] want a complete break from the past and may not look favorably on [his] return to the political fight."

Gore's office in Nashville did not respond to telephone inquiries Monday, but the former vice president has previously told The Associated Press he has "no plans to seek the presidency in 2008."

There is no evidence he is assembling any kind of campaign organization. In a recent survey of Gore's friends and organizers in New Hampshire, James Pindell, managing editor of PoliticsNH.com, found none had been contacted about 2008.

"They seem to be convinced he is not running" and will not visit the state, which traditionally hosts the first presidential primary, Pindell said Monday.

Occasionally, Gore even seems like an anti-candidate. For example, he is scheduled to be in Seattle on Thursday to talk about global warming, but he has insisted on no press coverage, sparking some angry newspaper editorials.

However, "in the Internet age, there is the potential for someone with his profile to mount a non-conventional campaign," said Lehane, "someone with a high name identification, someone who could raise money online, someone with prime time experience and someone who could potentially attract support from the angry left."

Condoleezza Rice, a bona fide football fan, is not applying for the newly opened post of NFL commissioner — not now, anyhow, her spokesman said carefully on Monday.

The wiggle-room in his response after NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue announced he would retire resonated off frequent only half-joking statements by Rice that as a lifelong football fan she aspires to run the league one day.

She may also aspire to be president or vice president, at least there has been speculation that she might wind up on the Republican ticket in 2008.

The owner of the New England Patriots, Bob Kraft, for one, seems to be in Rice's corner for the football post.

Kraft told CNBC that he had dinner with Rice a few months ago and found her to be "tremendously capable and highly competent."

"I am flattered that she is interested in joining us," Kraft said. "But, of course, I am only one of 32."

Dell To Double Workforce In India (NYT)

By Saritha Rai

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

BANGALORE, India, Mar. 20 — Dell, the world's largest maker of personal computers, plans to double its employee strength in India to 20,000, and is scouting for a site to set up a manufacturing unit in the country, its chairman, Michael Dell, said today.

"There is a fantastic opportunity to attract talent," Mr. Dell said, referring to the country's technically qualified, English-speaking pool of workers. "We will ensure a major recruitment push in engineering talents," he said in a press meeting during a visit to Bangalore, India's outsourcing capital.

Dell, which is based in Round Rock, Tex., has four call centers in India, where the bulk of its 10,000 employees work, as well as software development and product testing centers.

Dell plans to double its hardware engineering staff to 600 in one year, Mr. Dell said.

Dell's statement today followed similar pronouncements by Microsoft Corp and Cisco Systems which plan to double and treble, respectively, their Indian headcounts.

Many Western multinationals, particularly technology companies, have recently been moving many key functions such as design and research and development to India. Many of these were earlier in the forefront of shifting software development and back office work like call centers to this country.

Salaries in India are rising rapidly, but still are about a fifth of what they are in the West for comparable jobs.

Mr. Dell said his firm was talking with several state governments about a site for manufacturing plant..

In a market where the penetration of computers is very low, companies such as Dell are eager to set up a manufacturing base to help expand sales. Dell accounts for about four percent of the 4 million computers purchased in India.

Sales of computers in India are expected to grow to 20 million a year in the next few years.

The GOP's Shrinking Middle (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0019792

Members of Congress retire all the time, but some retirements are leading indicators of the direction of our politics. Rep. Sherwood Boehlert's announcement last week to call it quits matters, and in a depressing way.

The affable 69-year-old New York Republican is one of the last of a breed: a liberal Republican, though he calls himself a "moderate" and has the record to prove it. Boehlert's departure does not leave the House bereft of liberal Republicans -- Rep. Jim Leach of Iowa is more liberal than Boehlert. But Leach, alas, is an outlier. The spotted owl is in good shape compared with liberal Republicans.

Boehlert chose to retire in the year when National Journal, the political world's answer to Sports Illustrated, featured him as the ultimate "Down the Middle" guy. In its Feb. 25 issue, the magazine published its annual ratings, which showed that Boehlert's votes were more liberal than those of 52.2 percent of House members and more conservative than 47.8 percent. Boehlert's district includes the Baseball Hall of Fame in Cooperstown, and it's hard to move the ball more to the middle of the plate than he does.

It's been downhill for his brand of Republicanism from the moment he set foot in Washington as a congressional staffer in 1964. That's the year Barry Goldwater won the Republican presidential nomination and the great flight of the Republican liberals began.

After Goldwater's landslide defeat, two Republican progressives who later became conservatives, George Gilder and Bruce Chapman, wrote a brilliant book called "The Party That Lost Its Head," detailing how and why the party's liberal wing responded so anemically to the conservative challenge. But it was too late. The party of Abraham Lincoln and Theodore Roosevelt was destined to become an annex of the conservative movement.

Boehlert has always been unabashed in embracing his liberal roots. Over breakfast on a sunny summer morning in Cooperstown five years ago, Boehlert embraced two of the most progressive politicians of his lifetime. "People say to me: 'Why are you the kind of Republican you are?' Because in my formative political years, when I was coming up in New York, my governor was Nelson A. Rockefeller and my senator was Jacob K. Javits."

Why does the decline and fall of liberal Republicanism matter? After all, rationalizing the political system into a more conservative GOP and a more-or-less liberal Democratic Party makes the alternatives clearer to voters, who are offered, in Goldwater's famous phrase, "a choice, not an echo."

But it turns out that a Republican Party dominated by conservatives is no more coherent than the party that left room for progressives. The huge budget deficit is conservatism's Waterloo, testimony to its political failure. The conservatives love to cut taxes but can't square their lust for tax reduction with plausible spending cuts. Oh, yes, a group of House conservatives has a paper plan involving deep program cuts, but other conservatives know that these cuts will not pass, and shouldn't.

Paradoxically, because the liberal Republicans didn't pretend to hate government, they were better at fiscal responsibility. They were willing to match their desired spending levels with the taxes to pay for them. It didn't make for exciting, to-the-barricades politics. It merely produced good government.

Boehlert, being an optimist by nature, was always ready to declare that the "moderates' moment" had finally arrived. Last November, after I had written a column taking some moderate Republicans to task for backing the outrageous budget bill that passed under the cover of darkness at 1:30 a.m., there was Boehlert on the phone insisting that he and fellow moderate Mike Castle (R-Del.) had wrung some important concessions out of the House leadership. Maybe so, I replied, but I had a higher opinion of moderate Republicans and expected more of them than that lousy budget bill.

The problem may be that Boehlert and Castle did get as much as they could, given the numerical weakness of their variety of Republicanism, but that's not good enough. I suspect Boehlert knows this. Absent a robust progressive wing, congressional Republicans will continue to produce fiscally incoherent government. Democrats now have the task of representing their own brand of politics, and that of progressive Republicans, too.

I'll miss Boehlert and his optimistic moderation. Our politics worked better when a sufficiently large band of Republican moderates and liberals could take the edge off polarization and orient government toward problem-solving. But the liberal Republicans are gone. We have to deal with the GOP we have, not the GOP we wish still existed.

Citing Foreign Law (WP)

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

IN A SPEECH last month at the Constitutional Court of South Africa, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg made some unfair insinuations about critics of the use of foreign law in American courts. Justice Ginsburg was defending what is, in our view, a perfectly defensible proposition: that American courts should "learn from legal systems with values and a commitment to democracy similar to our own." Yet in doing so, she managed to link those who take an opposing view to the legacies of slavery and apartheid and to paint them as "fuel[ing] the irrational fringe" in its threats against judges.

To hear Justice Ginsburg describe the matter, you'd think the use of foreign law presents an easy question, legally and morally. In her speech, she quoted language from Chief Justice Roger Taney's infamous Dred Scott decision that rejected the notion that European opinions ought to guide American understanding of the Constitution. She went on to note that South Africa under apartheid also rejected the influence of foreign law, while its 1996 constitution explicitly invites its consideration. And she attacked members of Congress for introducing bills to eliminate the use of foreign precedents in American judicial decisions. Such legislation, she suggested, was responsible for an incident in which someone posted a call on the Internet for her and then-Justice Sandra Day O'Connor to be assassinated.

We don't support such legislation, but its advocates present one side of a valid debate, and there is no cause to blame them for the incitements of others. In the debate over foreign law, neither side has a monopoly on wisdom.

We agree with Justice Ginsburg and the court majority that American courts need not pretend that foreign courts do not exist. Law review articles, after all, constitute a legitimate, even routine, source of guidance for American adjudication; why not the considered judgment of a competent foreign tribunal? At the same time, Justice Antonin Scalia offers some reasonable criticisms of how the court has used foreign precedents -- that is, selectively, when foreign law supports results that the court cannot justify based on American authorities alone. As Justice Scalia points out, justices cite foreign precedents in capital cases, where European law is far more liberal than American law, but not in abortion cases, where it is more restrictive.

One doesn't have to agree, in other words, that foreign law has no place in American courts to worry that courts are using foreign law too politically. And one doesn't need to be Chief Justice Taney -- or a South African racist or an aspiring domestic terrorist -- to believe that it would be better if courts did not interpret America's founding documents in light of foreign authorities that postdate them. Justice Ginsburg has a strong case to make without stooping to such insinuations.

Some U.S. Officials Fear Iran Is Helping Al Qaeda (LAT)

By Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — U.S. intelligence officials, already focused on Iran's potential for building nuclear weapons, are struggling to solve a more immediate mystery: the murky relationship between the new Tehran leadership and the contingent of Al Qaeda leaders residing in the country.

Some officials, citing evidence from highly classified satellite feeds and electronic eavesdropping, believe the Iranian regime is playing host to much of Al Qaeda's remaining brain trust and allowing the senior operatives freedom to communicate and help plan the terrorist network's operations.

And they suggest that new President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad may be forging an alliance with Al Qaeda operatives as a way to expand Iran's influence or, at a minimum, that he is looking the other way as Al Qaeda leaders in his country collaborate with their counterparts elsewhere.

"Iran is becoming more and more radicalized and more willing to turn a blind eye to the Al Qaeda presence there," a U.S. counter-terrorism official said.

The accusations from U.S. officials about Iranian nuclear ambitions and ties to Al Qaeda echo charges that Bush administration figures made about Iraq in the run-up to the U.S.-led invasion three years ago.

Those charges about Iraq have been discredited. And in the case of Iran, some intelligence officials and analysts are unconvinced. If anything, they suggest, the escalating tensions between Shiite and Sunni Muslims in Iraq would logically cause Iran's Shiite government to crack down on Al Qaeda, whose Sunni leadership has denounced Shiites as infidels.

A U.S. intelligence official said he did not see any relaxation in Iran's restrictions on Al Qaeda members.

"I'm not getting the sense that these people are free to roam, free to plot," the official said.

Still, the official acknowledged that the relationship between Tehran and Al Qaeda officials within Iran was largely unknown to U.S. and allied intelligence, especially since Ahmadinejad's election last summer.

To some U.S. intelligence officials, what worries them most is what they don't know.

"I don't need to exaggerate the difficulty in determining what these people are up to at any given moment," the intelligence official said.

The U.S. counter-terrorism official was more blunt. "We don't have any intelligence going on in Iran. No people on the ground," he said. "It blows me away the lack of intelligence that's out there."

U.S., European and Arab intelligence officials spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss the issues publicly.

Ties between Iran and Al Qaeda were highlighted by the Sept. 11 commission, which disclosed a wealth of details about such connections in its final report. The commission said Iran and Al Qaeda had worked together sporadically throughout the 1990s, trading secrets, including some related to making explosives.

Iranian representatives to the United Nations did not return repeated phone calls seeking comment.

In November, the State Department's third-ranking official, Undersecretary R. Nicholas Burns, said the United States believed "that some Al Qaeda members and those from like-minded extremist groups continue to use Iran as a safe haven and as a hub to facilitate their operations."

A year ago, Iranian delegates to a global counter-terrorism conference circulated a document describing Iran as "a major victim of terrorism." The document blamed links between drug trafficking and terrorism for "thousands of security problems," especially along Iran's eastern border with Afghanistan and Pakistan.

Al Qaeda operatives and family members have lived in Iran for years, many since late 2001, when they fled the U.S. bombing of Afghanistan. Many other Al Qaeda figures fled to Pakistan — a U.S. ally — and are believed to be there still.

Three months ago, Iran declared that no Al Qaeda members remained in the country, but U.S. officials rejected the claim. At other times, Iranian officials said that Al Qaeda members there were kept under house arrest and their activities monitored.

In Tehran, analysts said American officials were misreading Iran's intentions. The fact that the government has not turned over Al Qaeda suspects to the United States should come as no surprise given the state of relations between the two countries, said Nasser Hadian, a political analyst at Tehran University.

"They won't. Why should they" without receiving something in return? he said. "Unfortunately, now everything is becoming commercialized, if I may use that term. Everything is being assessed on its value in negotiations, and that is on both sides."

Some of the suspects have been indicted in the United States in connection with terrorist attacks, including the 1998 bombings of two U.S. embassies in East Africa, but Iran has refused to extradite them.

Among them is Saif Adel, believed to be one of the highest-ranking members of Al Qaeda, behind Osama bin Laden and Ayman Zawahiri. Whatever restrictions might be placed on the network's activities within Iran, Adel — who has a $5-million U.S. bounty on his head — was able last year to post a lengthy dispatch about Al Qaeda activities in Iran and Iraq that was widely circulated on the Internet. U.S. intelligence officials consider the posting authentic.

In the dispatch, Adel said he had used hide-outs in Iran to plot with Abu Musab Zarqawi to make Iraq the new battleground in the group's war against the United States. Iran had detained many of Zarqawi's men, Adel wrote, but they ultimately slipped into Iraq and began attacking U.S. forces.

For several years, the U.S. counter-terrorism official said, satellite feeds have helped officials monitor some of the day-to-day activities and movements of Adel and other senior Al Qaeda operatives in Iran. The intelligence suggests that the Al Qaeda leaders have been monitored by Iranian authorities but could move and communicate somewhat, the official said.

U.S. officials also said that other senior Al Qaeda figures — including Zarqawi, now the group's point man in Iraq — had moved in and out of Iran with the possible knowledge or complicity of Iranian officials.

The Al Qaeda members in Iran include three of Bin Laden's sons, including Saad and Hamza, who are thought to be his heirs apparent. Some of Bin Laden's wives and other family members are suspected of being there as well, as is Al Qaeda spokesman Sulaiman abu Ghaith, U.S. officials say.

Of special concern, they said, is the number of Al Qaeda operatives in Iran who are of Egyptian descent and loyal to Zawahiri, the Cairo-born physician who merged his Egyptian Islamic Jihad with Al Qaeda in the years before the Sept. 11 attacks.

Adel is a former Egyptian police official. In addition, U.S. officials confirmed intelligence showing that three other Al Qaeda operatives with Egyptian roots — Abdallah Mohammed Rajab Masri, also known as Abu Khayer; Abdel Aziz Masri; and Abu Mohamed Masri — are in Iran. Authorities believe them to be, respectively, the head of Al Qaeda's shura, or leadership council; a biological weapons expert who heads the terrorist network's effort to develop weapons of mass destruction; and its top explosives expert and training camp chief.

The U.S. counter-terrorism official said the Egyptians' presence was troubling because Tehran for more than a decade has actively supported Egypt's two largest militant groups — Egyptian Islamic Jihad and Gamaa al Islamiya — in their terrorist campaign to topple the Cairo government.

Though the bitter Sunni-Shiite divide has prompted Tehran in the past to say it had "no affinity" with Al Qaeda, U.S. officials believe there is a history of cooperation between Iran and some Sunni militant groups, including Al Qaeda. Iran nurtures such relationships, they believe, to enhance its regional influence and punish Arab political enemies through intimidation and violence.

Adel traveled to Iran in the early 1990s as part of a delegation sent by Bin Laden to learn bomb making, U.S. officials say. They fear he and other Egyptians may have maintained ties with Iranian military and intelligence services.

The Sept. 11 commission concluded that Iran had harbored Al Qaeda operatives wanted in the U.S. embassy bombings in East Africa and other terrorist attacks. It quoted one top Al Qaeda official as saying Iran had made a "concerted effort to strengthen relations with Al Qaeda" after the 2000 attack on the U.S. warship Cole in Yemen.

Imprisoned top Al Qaeda operatives also have told U.S. officials that Iran let Islamic militants traveling to and from Afghanistan and Pakistan pass freely across its borders without passport stamps — including at least eight of the 19 future Sept. 11 hijackers, the now-disbanded commission reported.

The commission strongly urged the Bush administration and Congress to investigate the ties between Iran and Al Qaeda. Last week, commission member Timothy Roemer said in an interview that Washington still had not adequately addressed those ties.

U.S. and allied intelligence agencies say that, more recently, they have picked up indications of closer cooperation. The intelligence includes European wiretaps of militants discussing how Iranian officials would help them or look the other way.

U.S. officials fear Ahmadinejad may be strengthening ties with Al Qaeda with the help of Iranian intelligence and military agencies, particularly the Revolutionary Guard.

The intelligence official and others noted that Ahmadinejad himself rose through the ranks of the guard, an elite military unit. U.S. government officials have accused the guard of financing and orchestrating terrorist acts in the region by groups including Hezbollah, which is suspected of blowing up U.S. military facilities and embassies in the 1980s and killing hundreds of Americans.

Rep. Brad Sherman of Sherman Oaks, the ranking Democrat on the House International Relations subcommittee on terrorism and nuclear proliferation, who receives classified briefings on Iran, said U.S. intelligence indicated that Tehran was engaged in some kind of collaboration with Al Qaeda leaders.

"The cooperation is substantial," Sherman said. "Key operatives of the most successful terrorist organization in history are spending their time in the No. 1 state sponsor of terrorism.... That is of massive concern."

U.S. officials fear that an Iranian hard-line faction or even a rogue official could conspire with Al Qaeda or provide access to the country's military arsenal.

Despite the mutual antipathy between Sunnis and Shiites, some U.S. officials argue that the Iranian regime and Al Qaeda share a common enemy — the United States — and that both oppose the establishment of a pro-Western democracy in Iraq.

John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, told Congress on Feb. 2 that Iran was engaged in a broad campaign "to disrupt the operations and reinforcement of United States forces based in the region, potentially intimidating regional allies into withholding support for United States policy toward Iran and raising the costs of our regional presence" for the U.S. and its allies.

Bush Warns Iran On Israel (AFP)

AFP, March 20, 2006

US President George W. Bush said he hoped to resolve the nuclear dispute with Iran with diplomacy, but warned Tehran he would "use military might" if necessary to defend Israel.

"The threat from Iran is, of course, their stated objective to destroy our strong ally Israel. That's a threat, a serious threat. It's a threat to world peace," the US president said after a speech defending the war in Iraq.

"I made it clear, and I'll make it clear again, that we will use military might to protect our ally Israel," said Bush, who was apparently referring to Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's call for the destruction of Israel.

On the atomic dispute, Bush said he hoped "to solve this issue diplomatically" with a "united message" to Tehran from Washington, London, Paris, Berlin as well as Russia "hopefully" and China.

The message would be that "your desire to having a nuclear weapon is unacceptable," he said.

Bush also touched on Iran's agreement to discuss Iraq with the United States, saying that "it's very important, however, for the Iranians to understand that the discussion is limited to Iraq.

"We're using this as an opportunity to make it clear about our concerns of interference within a democratic process that is evolving," he said, saying that the talks will not decide Iran's relations with a sovereign Iraq.

"Ultimately, Iraq-Iranian relations will be negotiated between the Iraqi government and the Iranian government," he said.

Security Council Fails To Reach Accord On Iran (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, March 20 -- The Security Council's five permanent members and Germany failed to reach agreement at a meeting Monday on how to respond to the Iranian nuclear crisis but said they would forge ahead in the coming days to break the impasse.

The deadlock comes as U.S. and European officials confirmed that Britain had presented the United States with a paper outlining a possible diplomatic strategy to resolve the crisis, including new talks and concessions. But the British representative at Monday's talks, John Sawers, said Britain had not made such a proposal at the meeting.

Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns said the United States is not going to participate in direct negotiations with Iran on the nuclear issue.

Top foreign policy coordinators for the United States, Russia, China, France, Britain and Germany issued a joint statement that echoed an agreement Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had reached with those five governments in January. The statement expressed "deep concern" that Iran has "failed to respond positively" to requests by the United Nations' Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency to suspend its uranium enrichment activities and allow for more intrusive U.N. inspections of its nuclear energy program.

The impasse follows weeks of negotiations over how to respond to Iran's behavior. The United States, France and Britain believe the threat of Security Council sanctions is required to pressure Iran to meet international calls to suspend its nuclear enrichment activities, which Iran insists are for peaceful purposes.

Russia and China oppose sanctions, and they want the Iranian crisis to be handled by the International Atomic Energy Agency, which is considered more likely to pursue a negotiated settlement.

The paper circulated by British officials detailed an approach that could include new multinational talks with Iran. The talks would be aimed at satisfying demands by China and Russia that the United Nations' major powers had exhausted all diplomatic options to resolve the standoff with Iran, a senior administration official said Monday.

On Sunday, after the Associated Press reported that the British were discussing such an approach, another senior administration official denied that Britain had made such a proposal.

The United States has sought to avoid being drawn into new negotiations with Iran, saying Tehran has used talks to buy time to develop its nuclear know-how.

Britain Calls For New Talks With Iran (AP-Y2)

By Edith M. Lederer And George Jahn

AP2, March 20, 2006

Britain is calling for new talks with Iran about its suspect nuclear program but will push for militarily enforceable U.N. Security Council sanctions if those talks do not make progress, according to a letter obtained by The Associated Press.

The proposal is angled toward Russia and China, allies of Tehran who staunchly oppose firm Security Council action.

Senior diplomats from six key nations that have been struggling to find a way to deal with Iran's suspect nuclear program met Monday at U.N. headquarters.

Representatives from the five veto-wielding council nations — the United States, Russia, China, Britain and France — and Germany will try to overcome differences on a statement demanding a quick report on Iran's nuclear program.

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said earlier that Monday's meeting "will basically consider the longer-range issues, although obviously in the capitals in Moscow and Beijing, certainly, they will now have a look" at the latest text of the Security Council statement, and hopefully the senior diplomats will have instructions "that will allow us to make progress."

Bolton said he would like to see agreement on the statement when the Security Council meets again on Tuesday afternoon.

Britain's U.N. Ambassador Emyr Jones Parry also said he hoped the high-level diplomats meeting Monday would "look at the wider strategy of how we develop our relations with Iran." He added: "But let's be clear that negotiation of the (statement) will be done in the council."

The British hoped the Russians and Chinese would agree to tougher council action on Iran should that be needed in exchange for Western willingness to engage in new negotiations.

Moscow has offered to enrich Iran's uranium but is insisting that Iran must freeze its own uranium enrichment program — a possible pathway to nuclear arms.

Moscow and Beijing also want the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency, the International Atomic Energy Agency, to assume the main role in cajoling Iran on enrichment and its refusal to fully cooperate with an IAEA probe.

The March 16 letter, which is marked "confidential" and displays the seal of the British Foreign Office, is from John Sawers, a top British negotiator.

"We are not going to bring the Russians and Chinese to accept significant sanctions over the coming months, certainly not without further efforts to bring the Iranians around," the letter said.

"The Iranians ... will need to know that more serious measures are likely. This means putting the Iran dossier onto a Chapter VII basis" — shorthand for binding Security Council resolutions, including sanctions, that can be enforced by military means.

The letter was addressed to U.S. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, German Foreign Office Political Director Michael Schaefer and French Foreign Ministry Political Director Stanislas de Laboulaye.

It suggests making suspension of all uranium enrichment by Iran "a mandatory requirement of the Security Council, in a resolution we would aim to adopt, I say, early May."

"In return for the Russians and Chinese agreeing to this, we would then want to put together a package that could be presented to the Iranians as a new proposal," the letter said. "Ideally this would have the explicit backing of Russia, China and the United States as well as the EU-3" — France, Britain and Germany.

But any talks with U.S. involvement likely would need to focus on economic and security guarantees meant to reassure Tehran that Washington has no plans to force a regime change. Critics of U.S. policy have maintained for years that Tehran was unlikely to compromise on its nuclear program without such a direct guarantee.

In Washington, German lawmaker Ruprecht Polenz said "we would really love it" if the United States participated in the process.

The six countries agree that Iran should not develop nuclear weapons, but they differ on the best way to get Tehran to halt uranium enrichment, which can be used either in a civilian nuclear program to generate electricity or to produce nuclear arms.

Russia and China have said tough council action could spark an Iranian withdrawal from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and eventually lead to tougher measures, such as sanctions.

The United States, Britain and France want a statement listing demands already made by the IAEA — including the suspension of uranium enrichment and steps toward greater transparency and more cooperation. They also want IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei to report to the council on Iran's progress in meeting those demands in two weeks, which Russia and China say is much too soon.

Negotiations between Iran and France, Germany and Britain, acting on behalf of the European Union, collapsed in August after Tehran rejected an incentives package offered in return for a permanent end to uranium enrichment. Its subsequent moves to develop full-blown enrichment capabilities led the IAEA's 35-nation board to ask for Security Council involvement earlier this year.

Iranian President Wants West To Apologize (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, March 21, 2006

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on Monday said the West should apologize to Iran for accusing it of trying to develop a nuclear weapons program and said his country would continue to resist international pressure to halt its nuclear energy program.

"Today they tell our nation that nuclear energy is a bad thing and it is not necessary for our people to have it. But the nation of Iran has stood (for its right)," he said in a televised speech to mark the Iranian New Year, which begins Tuesday. "Those who head war and crimes accused the Iranian nation of war seeking. They insulted our nation. I do advise them to apologize."

Iran insists its nuclear program is for peaceful energy purposes but Western countries who believe otherwise have pushed for United Nations action — including possible sanctions — against the country.

Ahmadinejad stressed that Iran would not give up its nuclear rights.

"Today we announce with pride that the peaceful knowledge and technology are at our disposal in order to be used for different purposes, including electricity generation, and we have not borrowed it from anybody that can take it away from us," he said.

Ahmadinejad reiterated that Iran should be compensated for a two and a half year suspension of its nuclear activities. Under heavy pressure from the West, Iran suspended its enrichment of uranium and related activities in 2003 and began negotiating with Germany, Britain and France to reach an agreed framework for its nuclear development. It resumed nuclear research earlier this year when talks failed.

The United States and its European allies want Iran to permanently abandon uranium enrichment and all related activities, a technology that can be used to produce nuclear fuel for reactors or materials for a nuclear bomb.

Jews Wary Of Becoming Fall Guy For Iran's Woes (WT)

By John R. Bradley

TEHRAN -- Members of Iran's Jewish community fear they are being set up to take the blame if President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's drive to establish a nuclear program ends badly for the country.

Members of the 30,000-strong community say they already are being viewed as a potential fifth column after a series of speeches in which the firebrand president has spoken of a "Holocaust myth" and heaped scorn on Europe for its defense of the "Zionist entity."

"Ahmadinejad has decided to pick on the easiest victim, Israel," said Meir Javedanfar, a specialist on Iran and director of the Middle East Economic and Political Analysis Co. "Every time Ahmadinejad has internal problems, he will attack Israel again, using it as a tool."

Iranian Jews, many of whom have family ties with Israel, are hitting back with forceful public rebuttals. But privately, they acknowledge fears of orchestrated political attacks if the United States or Israel conducts air strikes against Iran's nuclear facilities.

There are still painful memories of events six years ago in the southern city of Shiraz, where 13 Iranian Jews and eight Muslims were accused of spying for Israel.

It was widely thought that they were being used as pawns in a struggle within the Islamic regime, with hard-liners seeking to embarrass President Mohammed Khatami and his comparatively moderate administration.

Now there are signs that Mr. Khatami and other reformers are using the Jews to try to undermine Mr. Ahmadenijad's political agenda.

Mr. Khatami publicly contradicted the president this month, describing the Holocaust as a "historical reality."

"We should speak out if even a single Jew is killed. Don't forget that one of the crimes of Hitler, Nazism and German national socialism was the massacre of innocent people, among them many Jews," the cleric said in widely published remarks.

The prominent centrist newspaper Sharq also has taken on Mr. Ahmadinejad, saying, "The Jewish question was never a problem for Iran or Islam."

The debate has forced supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei to speak out in support of the president in spite of widespread reports that he is unhappy with Mr. Ahmadinejad, who recently called for Israel "to be wiped off the map."

After the 1979 Islamic revolution, thousands of Jews left for Israel, Western Europe or the United States, fearing persecution. But Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, Iran's first post-revolutionary supreme leader, issued a "fatwa" to protect Jews and other religious minorities, reducing the outflow to a trickle.

Tehran has a Jewish nursing home and a Jewish library with a reading room used by both Muslim and Jewish university students. The capital also has a Jewish hospital and 11 functioning synagogues.

Haroun Yashayaei, the leader of the Jewish community, wrote publicly to Mr. Ahmadinejad last month, asking how he could "ignore all of the undeniable evidence existing for the exile and massacre of the Jews in Europe during the Second World War."

The president's questioning of the Holocaust, he wrote, "has created astonishment among the people of the world, and spread fear and anxiety among the small Jewish community of Iran."

"At the moment, there is no direct political pressure on the Jewish community," Mr. Yashayaei said in an interview.

Explaining why he wrote the letter, he said, "It is more a question of emotional stress. I was angry at what the president said, and it is my right to tell him what I think."

Jews have scored several legal victories in recent months, said Morris Motamed, a Jewish member of the Majlis, or parliament.

One of those ended a practice under which a Jewish family received far less money in compensation than a Muslim family when a relative was killed in an accident.

Another bill, expected to be passed in the coming months, will remove discriminatory aspects of the inheritance laws.

Iran's Jews, however fear that such progress could be reversed by a coming conference called by Mr. Ahmadinejad to "investigate evidence for the Holocaust."

In such a climate, Mr. Motamed said, "a backlash in the wake of [U.S. or Israeli] air strikes becomes a real possibility."

Speaking To Tehran, With One Voice (NYT)

By Jessica T. Mathews

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

Washington

WITH the Iranian nuclear crisis about to land in the Security Council, the events that led up to the war in Iraq point clearly to what needs to be done.

In the decade preceding the Iraq war, Mr. Hussein was able to defy the major powers when they were divided. Exploiting his advantage as a single actor and Washington's indecision over whether it most wanted nonproliferation or regime change, Mr. Hussein consistently outmaneuvered his diplomatic opponents.

But he also knew that he could not buck the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council when they were serious and united (as, for example, during the toughened United Nations inspections in the months just before the war), and he did not even try.

The situation with Iran today is the same. Washington cannot decide whether the top priority of its Iran policy should be regime change or nonproliferation; as a result, others of the major powers do not trust and will not fully support its antinuclear efforts. Tehran has easily exploited this lack of unity among the major powers to frustrate every attempt to rein in its nuclear program. It has recruited international support through energetic diplomacy to the group of developing countries known as the G-77. Just as Mr. Hussein did, the leaders in Tehran have made diplomatic mincemeat of the big powers.

Iran has been so successful in this that some experts in the West have turned defeatist. Their view is mistaken. The idea that "it's too late" to stop Iran's progress toward building nuclear weapons is technologically wrong. "There's nothing we can do about it" ignores a range of options between economic sanctions, going to war and more of doing nothing. And the argument that "we can learn to live with it" misses the nature of the challenge.

A nuclear Iran is dangerous enough, but this crisis is only proximately about Iran. More important, it is about the likely consequence of an Iranian bomb, namely, that Saudi Arabia, Turkey and Egypt would produce their own bombs, and, thanks to the concomitant international failure to deal with North Korea, the nonproliferation regime would collapse. What is at stake is not a choice between 9 and 10 nuclear weapons states, but a choice between 9 and 30 or more.

The major powers may yet be able to unite to stop Iran at this late hour, but not without a decisive change in American policy. Washington's choice is simple: does it want to stop Iran's acquisition of nuclear weapons badly enough to deal with Iran's present government?

Like the Clinton administration with Iraq, the Bush administration has been unable to make up its mind, locking its policy into a cycle of self-defeating half-steps. The combination of "axis of evil" threats, partial support of European negotiations and publicly announced financial backing for the opposition in Iran ensures only that we will fail either to negotiate an end to the nuclear program or to overthrow the present regime.

The administration must, finally, hold its nose and recognize that the nuclear challenge is the indisputable priority. It must get off the sidelines and into negotiations with Tehran. It must solidify agreement among its fellow permanent council members by working closely with Russia, not least by concluding a long overdue pact on civil nuclear cooperation. Russian participation would make it possible to provide Iran with a credible international guarantee of uranium enrichment and reprocessing services.

With China and the others, the United States needs to make clear that the Security Council can resort to other steps besides economic sanctions to significantly raise the cost to Tehran of its continued defiance, beginning with making International Atomic Energy Agency inspections mandatory rather than voluntary.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice (and her fellow foreign ministers from the council's permanent members) should be flying to Brazil, Indonesia, South Africa and other leading countries of the G-77 to explain why Iran is wrong to claim that the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty gives it the "right" to enrich uranium, and why Iran's abuse of the treaty devalues each of their commitments to give up nuclear weapons.

Given the American record with Iraq and Iran, others will be skeptical that Washington has made a clear choice for nonproliferation and away from regime change. The message will have to be steady and unequivocal. If President Bush and Secretary Rice continue to say one thing and Vice President Dick Cheney and our ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton, say another, the effort will quickly fail.

Members of Congress have a direct responsibility as well. Only they — especially the Democrats — can make such a policy change possible. They will have to forgo the indulgence of slamming the administration from the right and currying favor with pro-Israel voters by vying to see who can be the most anti-Iranian.

All of this, and more, is what serious anti-nuclear diplomacy would look like. It has not yet been tried. Anyone who promotes the use of military force from the present position of American indecision and before the obvious political steps have been taken is repeating the error that led us into Iraq.

The international community's record on Iran's nuclear program (as on North Korea's) has been feckless. Only the United States can change that. If we fail to pursue this effort with unwavering, clear-minded diplomacy, a nuclear-armed world will be the Bush administration's chief legacy, no matter how the war in Iraq and the war on terrorism turn out.

Arab Leader: Hamas Must Deal With Israel (AP-Y2)

By Barry Schweid

AP2, March 21, 2006

An Arab leader said Monday a Hamas-led Palestinian government has no alternative but to deal with Israel.

"They will be obliged to do that because the Palestinians, as a government, deal with Israel," Crown Prince Salman bin Hamad bin Isa Al-Khalifa of Bahrain told reporters after meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

"How can they deal with Israel if they don't recognize Israel?" he asked in an exchange in Arabic.

The United States and the European Union have vowed not to deal with Hamas until it abandons terror and accepts Israel and the agreements that Israel has reached with the Palestinian Authority over the years.

Meanwhile, the Bush administration is reviewing U.S. assistance to the Palestinians. Rice has indicated humanitarian programs will get U.S. support, but not through a Hamas-led government.

"This is an international Palestinian issue," the crown prince said. "But we encourage our Palestinian brothers to be committed to all the agreements they were committed to over all the long years."

Referring apparently to the unresolved conflict between Israel and the Palestinians, he advised Hamas to "hurry up, and we will hurry up with them, to end this great humanitarian catastrophe."

Bahrain is not considering a cutoff in aid to a Hamas-led government nor is it about to establish relations with Israel, he said.

Nunn Urges Congress To Set Conditions On U.S.-India Nuclear Pact (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

In a setback for the administration's efforts to win approval of a landmark nuclear pact with India, former senator Sam Nunn said yesterday that he has serious concerns the deal would harm the "United States' vital interest" in preventing nuclear proliferation and urged Congress to set conditions for its support.

"Congress has a duty to look at the broader framework," Nunn, a moderate and highly respected Georgia Democrat who still has broad influence in both parties on proliferation and military matters, said in an interview. "If I were still in Congress, I would be skeptical and looking at conditions that could be attached."

Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns warned lawmakers last week that congressionally mandated conditions could cause the agreement to unravel. He and other administration officials say the agreement is a groundbreaking achievement that will bring India, which has not signed the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, into the nonproliferation mainstream, while bolstering U.S.-India ties and adding jobs to the U.S. economy.

But Nunn, who was briefed on the deal by State Department officials last week, said he is concerned it would lead to the spread of weapons-grade nuclear material, unleash a regional arms race with China and Pakistan, and make it more difficult for the United States to win support for sanctions against nuclear renegades such as Iran and North Korea. Nunn is a board member of General Electric Co. -- which built nuclear power reactors in India before New Delhi conducted its first nuclear test in 1974 -- but he said he thinks the economic benefits are overstated.

The administration last week proposed legislation that would exempt India from sections of the Atomic Energy Act that restrict trade with countries that are not party to nuclear treaties. The proposal already faces an uphill battle in Congress, where key lawmakers such as Sen. Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and Rep. Henry J. Hyde (R-Ill.), chairman of the House International Relations Committee, have remained neutral. The administration has actively sought, without much success, the support of moderate opinion leaders such as Nunn.

Under the pact, India is to separate its civilian and military nuclear programs over the next eight years to gain U.S. expertise and nuclear fuel to meet its rapidly rising energy needs. India's civilian facilities would be subject for the first time to permanent international inspections, but the agreement does not require oversight of India's prototype fast-breeder reactors, which can produce significant amounts of weapons-grade plutonium when fully operational.

The Bush administration originally sought a plan that would have allowed India to continue producing material for six to 10 weapons each year, but the new plan would allow India enough fissile material for as many as 50 weapons a year. Experts said this would far exceed what is believed to be its current capacity.

Nunn said that among the conditions he would attach to the legislation is the requirement it could not take effect until the president certifies that India pledges not to produce nuclear materials, such as plutonium or highly enriched uranium, for weapons. The current agreement "certainly does not curb in any way the proliferation of weapons-grade nuclear material," Nunn said.

"India was a lot better negotiator than we were," Nunn asserted. While the administration has said it has no intention of aiding India's nuclear weapons program, "the reality could be the opposite," he said. "The administration has a high burden to explain this."

Nunn added that suggestions by some former and current administration officials that it might be in the United States' interest to allow India to build up its strategic capabilities is "totally counterproductive and dangerous reasoning."

Nunn, who served in the Senate for 24 years, is co-chairman and chief executive of the Nuclear Threat Initiative, a nonprofit organization that seeks to reduce the global threats from nuclear, biological and chemical weapons. Lugar is also a board member of NTI, and the two men wrote the Nunn-Lugar Act, which has helped destroy thousands of nuclear warheads in the former Soviet Union.

In an interview published yesterday in the Indianapolis Star, Lugar said he might favor the legislation if he were convinced that the new relationship was in the United States' best interests, that there were "considerable if not complete" safeguards on the spread of nuclear fuel and that it would lead to a reduction of oil consumption.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce has vowed an all-out push to win approval of the agreement, saying it would be a boon for U.S. business. But it has also sparked a backlash from nonproliferation experts who believe it will lead to the unraveling of the Non-Proliferation Treaty, which sought to limit the number of nuclear weapons states.

"Nunn's voice carries weight," said Henry D. Sokolski, executive director of the Nonproliferation Policy Education Center and a Pentagon official in the George H.W. Bush administration, who opposes the agreement. "We have waited for a moderate, respected voice to speak clear sense on these matters. Now that he's spoken, it would be very strange if Congress doesn't listen."

NATO Ready To Help U.N. In Darfur (AP-Y2)

By Barry Schweid

AP2, March 20, 2006

NATO is prepared to support a U.N. force in the Darfur region of Sudan, the alliance's secretary-general told President Bush in a White House visit on Monday.

"I'm quite sure, as I told the president, that when the U.N. comes, the NATO allies will be ready to do more in enabling a United Nations force in Darfur," Jaap De Hoop Scheffer told reporters after his meeting with Bush.

Bush has called for greater NATO involvement in Darfur, which the United Nations has described as the world's gravest humanitarian crisis. The conflict there has left more than 180,000 people dead and 2 million displaced.

But Bush said the African Union must request that its mission in Darfur be converted to a U.N. mission. When that happens, NATO can move in with U.S. help "to make it clear to the Sudanese government that we're intent upon providing security for the people there and intent upon helping work toward a lasting peace agreement," Bush said.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, meeting with the NATO secretary-general, said Monday "NATO can play a very important role in enhancing the capabilities of African Union forces."

De Hoop Scheffer, repeating what he said at the White House while having his picture taken with Rice, said he was "quite sure that when that question comes that the NATO allies will stand ready to support that mission in Darfur."

"I'm not talking about NATO forces on the ground," he said later as he left the State Department. "But could you enable the mission by giving logistical support, by going on in the transport of the forces, by giving training, then I think the NATO allies would take a very positive stand on that."

After talks with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, the NATO secretary-general held a news conference in which he underscored the point that NATO could not act until after the African mission is converted to a U.N. mission.

Declining to predict when all the pieces would fall into place, De Hoop Scheffer said, "I fully share everybody's frustration and indignation about what is happening in Darfur."

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack issued a statement, meanwhile, criticizing the Sudanese government's closing of several U.S.-supported social development, health and food distribution offices.

McCormack urged the government in Khartoum to remove immediately all obstacles to delivery of humanitarian assistance and to provide protection for civilians and aids workers.

Earlier this month Sudan and the African Union agreed to extend the mandate of AU peacekeeping forces in Darfur to September, at which time they would be allowed to be merged into a larger U.N. force. But later Sudan said it will reject the proposed deployment of U.N. forces to Darfur.

Bush praised NATO's role in Afghanistan and its work training Iraqi security forces.

De Hoop Scheffer said all 26 NATO members have been assisting in the Iraqi training mission.

"I want to see NATO-trained Iraqi officers taking their responsibility in fighting the terrorists in their own country," he said.

U.S. Calls Belarus Vote For Leader Invalid (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers And Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

MINSK, Belarus, March 20 — The United States declared the results of the president election in Belarus invalid on Monday and called for a new race, even as President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko defiantly swept aside criticism and declared himself the winner of a third term.

In an impassioned appearance hours after state television announced that he had won nearly 83 percent of the vote, Mr. Lukashenko exuded confidence and said the outcome had "convincingly demonstrated who the Belarussians are and who is the master of our house."

He said he was unafraid of further economic and political isolation after an election that Washington and international observers described as illegitimate, rigged and held under widespread repression.

"The United States does not accept the results of the election," said Scott McClellan, the White House spokesman. "We support the call for a new election."

The principal opposition candidate, Aleksandr Milinkevich, who received 6 percent of the vote, according to the government's initial count, also declared Mr. Lukashenko's presidency illegitimate.

"We are simply not going to recognize the election," he said, calling for a new vote to be conducted with new election commissioners and a campaign free of arrests and harassment.

Several thousand opposition demonstrators once again ignored warnings that they could be arrested or beaten, and returned in the evening to a central square in Minsk to continue peaceful protests against the results.

But the crowd that appeared Monday was smaller than that on Sunday, and Mr. Milinkevich's campaign manager, Sergei Kalyakin, acknowledged the difficulties of challenging the deeply entrenched power of Mr. Lukashenko, often referred to as Europe's last dictator. "The number who came to the square was not enough," he said. "We need 10 times more."

By late Monday the number of protesters dwindled to several hundred, but those who remained appeared determined to stay, pitching tents and locking arms around them. For a second night the police refrained from dispersing them, but blocked others from bringing food, clothing or blankets.

Many in the crowd, and even Mr. Milinkevich himself, said they were disappointed that they had not been able to rally more people. He said they would stay through the night if allowed, but hinted at a concession. "I think that the dictatorship will fall, not on the day of elections," he said on the edge of the crowd. "I can't say when, but I feel its days are coming to an end."

Unsure that it can muster and maintain large crowds in the face of official threats, the opposition here has rested much of its diminishing hope on international disapproval.

Reaction has broken along familiar lines, with Western organizations and officials issuing condemnations and in some cases vowing to seek punitive measures against Belarus, and Russia and other former Soviet states celebrating Mr. Lukashenko's victory.

Echoing the Bush administration, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which brought 400 observers here, sharply criticized the election, noting harassment and arrests of opposition candidates, propagandistic coverage on state media and extensive irregularities in the counting of ballots.

"The arbitrary abuse of state power, obviously designed to protect the incumbent president, went far beyond acceptable practice," the report said.

Senior Bush administration officials said the United States would work with Europe to coordinate sanctions, like travel bans against those in the Belarus government believed to be responsible for the voting process. But American officials noted that they had numerous sanctions of this type in place.

Even as the European group issued its report, Mr. Lukashenko was several blocks away in a government auditorium, gruffly and at times crudely sweeping aside any questions about his victory or his leadership style.

The appearance was part news conference and part testimonial to Mr. Lukashenko's power, as the audience was stacked with his supporters and hand-picked visitors who described themselves as election observers. One pair of these self-described observers presented Mr. Lukashenko with a bouquet of roses.

Between statements of praise and bursts of applause, Mr. Lukashenko belittled the opposition's supporters as "children" paid by foreign governments, and described their demonstration on Sunday night as a display of weakness. "They were 14- and 15-year-old children who were paid 20,000 Belarussian rubles," he said, referring to a sum worth a little more than $9. "So they worked for their 20,000 rubles."

He also took questions from journalists, sometimes appearing to enjoy testy exchanges and other times interrupting speakers or arguing about their questions.

When asked whether he could assure the safety of demonstrators, whom he threatened last week with having their necks wrung, he chided the journalist for posing the question. "I see your neck is in place," he said. "Why are you so concerned?"

As his appearance dragged on, reaching nearly two and a half hours, more denunciations appeared from the West.

Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, secretary general of NATO, said in a statement that Belarussians had been cheated of a choice. "The people of Belarus have the right to choose their leadership through a true democratic process," he said. "That right was again denied to them."

Foreign Minister Ursula Plassnik of Austria, which holds the rotating presidency of the European Union, criticized the "climate of intimidation" that hindered the opposition campaign.

Benita Ferrero-Waldner, the union's commissioner of external relations, said the group would continue with democracy-building programs and relief aid and would not impose economic sanctions because that could hurt the Belarussian people. But she said European Union members were likely to widen a visa ban on top Belarussian officials.

In Moscow, underscoring the widening gap between the West and Russia over the conduct of elections and the state of reform in former Soviet republics, the Kremlin rushed to applaud the result. The Foreign Ministry said, "The elections were testament to a high civic awareness and an interest amongst the Belarussian people for stability."

The statement made no mention of the mass arrests, wide-scale intimidation and the fawning official media coverage of Mr. Lukashenko and his policies.

Belarus Leader Defiant After Reelection As U.S., E.U. Threaten Sanctions (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

MINSK, Belarus, March 20 -- President Alexander Lukashenko, citing official figures giving him 82.6 percent of the vote in this weekend's election, declared Monday that a pro-Western "revolution" had been defeated in his former Soviet republic and scoffed at threats of new sanctions.

The United States will work with the European Union to possibly freeze the foreign assets of Belarusans responsible for electoral fraud or human rights violations, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said Monday. Expansion of existing restrictions on travel by senior Belarusan leaders is also under discussion.

McClellan told reporters aboard Air Force One that the United States "does not accept the results of the election. The election campaign was conducted in a climate of fear. It included arrests and beatings and fraud. We applaud democrats in Belarus for their courage and peaceful stand to reclaim their freedom."

On the streets of the capital, Minsk, opposition leaders struggled for a second night to mount large-scale protests. By midnight, the numbers gathered at a central square had dwindled to about 2,000, but a dozen tents had been set up in freezing temperatures to attempt a long-term protest.

Riot police deployed nearby have not intervened, despite a threat last week from Lukashenko that he would "wring the necks" of demonstrators. Asked by a French reporter Monday what had become of that threat, the former collective farm manager said, "I see your neck is in place."

"You have seen our opposition," the president declared during a 2 1/2 -hour news conference. "And if you are reasonable people, you have been convinced that it's worthless." He said opposition leaders were in the pay of Western ambassadors.

Located between Poland and Russia, the country of 10 million has continued as a holdout of Soviet-style politics since gaining independence in 1991. The secret police, still called the KGB, routinely beat up opposition figures. Independent newspapers are shut down or lose entire press runs to police confiscations.

But large numbers of people here call Lukashenko a hero who saved their country from the upheavals of moving to capitalism. Even opposition figures say he could win a fair vote.

His landslide victory drew condemnation Monday from a variety of Western governments and organizations. Much of the criticism focused on how the campaign was conducted.

"Arbitrary use of state power and widespread detentions showed a disregard for the basic rights of freedom of assembly, association and expression," said U.S. Rep. Alcee L. Hastings (D-Fla.), who leads the parliamentary assembly of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, a 55-nation group that monitors elections.

In the past, the United States has taken action against a Belarus firm involved in arms sales, limited senior Belarusan officials' travel to the United States and barred high-level meetings. It has also tried to structure aid programs to skirt the government and favor nongovernmental organizations.

New steps would not be broad-based sanctions such as those against Iran or Cuba, according to an administration official. "What we're talking about are targeted steps that don't go after the people as a whole," the official said. Lukashenko and his associates are not believed to have many assets in the United States, so the European Union would be key to any attempt to go after him financially.

The E.U., which has three member states that border Belarus, also has steps in place. European officials were discussing options Monday for turning up the pressure. "Some action is now very likely," the E.U. external relations commissioner, Benita Ferrero-Waldner, said Monday.

Official figures showed that Lukashenko's nearest rival, Alexander Milinkevich, a former physics professor, got 6 percent of the vote. Milinkevich called the president's tally "monstrously inflated."

At the Minsk square where protesters had gathered, the crowd was shrinking by midnight Monday. Demonstrators chanted "Long live Belarus" as plainclothes police officers recorded video footage of them from the crowd's edge.

Opposition leaders conceded that the turnouts, 10,000 on Sunday night and somewhat fewer Monday night, were not large enough to threaten the government.

Sergei Kalyakin, who led Milinkevich's campaign, said 100,000 people would be needed for authorities to "hear the voice of the people." With an active opposition that is composed mostly of students, many analysts see significant public backlash as unlikely.

Opposition leaders say they hope the election and its aftermath will seed a movement that will grow to present a real challenge to Lukashenko's autocratic rule.

In what has become a pattern when elections in republics of the former Soviet Union are won by pro-Moscow candidates, observers from Russia said Monday that the vote was free and fair. "There is full ground to believe that the elections complied with universally recognized standards," the Russian Foreign Ministry said in a statement. "There are no doubts about their legitimacy."

Russian President Vladimir Putin sent Lukashenko a telegram congratulating him on his victory.

At his news conference Monday, Lukashenko dismissed the Western threats of sanctions and hinted that Belarus might retaliate by refusing to cooperate with its neighbors on issues such as illegal migration from the east.

"The revolution that so many people talked about and some were preparing has failed, and it could not be otherwise," said Lukashenko, referring to the possibility that a fraudulent vote could trigger the kind of street protests that toppled governments in Ukraine and Georgia.

Mocking the new pro-Western leadership in Ukraine and Georgia, Lukashenko also attacked the United States as a hypocritical, warmongering power. He said it targets governments that refuse to bow to its interests while embracing nations that are clearly not democratic.

"I'm not afraid of isolation," Lukashenko said. "It's very difficult to suffocate us economically or politically."

Belarus Leader's Victory Rejected By U.S. As OSCE Finds Fraud (BLOOM)

By Richard Keil James Neuger

Bloomberg, March 21, 2006

March 20 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. joined European observers in rejecting election results in Belarus that gave President Alexander Lukashenko a third term, after concluding that the declared win was engineered through fraud and intimidation.

``This campaign was conducted in a climate of fear that included arrests and beatings," White House spokesman Scott McClellan said today. ``We call for a new election."

Lukashenko won 82.6 percent of the vote, trouncing his main rival, the opposition leader Alexander Milinkevich, who garnered 6 percent, according to the Belarus Central Electoral Commission. The Vienna-based Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe said about 400 observers found ``substantial empirical evidence" of fraud. The elections were not ``free and fair," the group said.

Lukashenko, in power since 1994, has been assailed by the European Union, U.S. and United Nations for jailing opposition politicians, clamping down on the media, and changing the constitution to scrap a two-term limit for the presidency.

About 10,000 people answered Milinkevich's call to assemble late today in the central October Square of Minsk, demanding that the elections be annulled. State security forces watched the throng from the roof of the Palace of the Republic, which houses the electoral commission.

``I will stay at the helm as long as the people let me," Lukashenko said earlier today in Minsk, according to Russia's Interfax news agency.

Visa Ban

U.S. officials are consulting with their EU counterparts about how best to respond to the election, McClellan said today in Washington. EU governments are likely to widen a visa ban on top Belarus officials and impose ``rigorous sanctions" on them, French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy told a news conference in Brussels.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the U.S. would take ``serious, appropriate measures" against officials who had perpetrated ``election fraud and other human rights abuses."

German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier said the 25-nation EU doesn't want to provoke Belarus, and possibly Russia, by taking drastic steps such as denying diplomatic recognition to Lukashenko's government.

EU diplomats ruled that out because ``such a decision could have very far-reaching consequences," Steinmeier said.

The Russian Foreign Ministry defended Lukashenko's victory, issuing a statement that said ``there is no reason to doubt the results."

Since 2004 the U.S. and the EU have imposed travel restrictions on Belarusian officials the two allies suspect are connected to politically motivated disappearances and rigged elections.

DOJ_NMG_0019807

Ties Strained

The U.S. has had strained relations with Belarus since Lukashenko came to power. Ties soured further a year later, in 1995, when the Belarus air force shot down a hot air balloon that had strayed into Belarusian air space, and killed two American citizens, according to the U.S. State Department.

Six top Belarus officials are barred now from traveling to the 25-nation EU. External Relations Commissioner Benita Ferrero-Waldner said the EU would seek ``targeted" measures to punish the leadership, possibly adding Lukashenko to the blacklist.

``Some action is now very likely," Ferrero-Waldner told a news conference. ``It will be on the visa bans for a list of people. And we have to see if any other measure will be taken." She ruled out economic sanctions because they would hit the broader population.

In Washington, U.S. House Speaker Dennis J. Hastert, an Illinois Republican, denounced the elections for what he called their ``widespread disregard for basic rights of freedom and abuse of state power."

``Our goal must be that the people of Belarus can free themselves of their Soviet past and participate in free and fair elections without fear of intimidation," he said.

EU government leaders will discuss the election at their March 23-24 summit in Brussels, and foreign ministers will consider the next steps at their April 10 meeting.

Lukashenko Scorns International Criticism (FT)

By Neil Buckley, Stefan Wagstyl, And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, March 21, 2006

Alexander Lukashenko, Belarus' authoritarian president, declared on Monday that foreign-backed attempts to overthrow him had failed, claiming a crushing victory in elections that international observers condemned as seriously flawed.

More than 3,000 demonstrators gathered in the capital, Minsk, for a second night-time protest, as Alexander Milinkevich, the main opposition leader, continued calls for a rerun of Sunday's poll.

But the numbers were fewer than the 5,000 people who defied official threats of violence and arrest to rally on Sunday night – the biggest demonstrations in Minsk for a decade.

On Monday night about eight tents were erected in the central square for protesters planning to spend the night. Mr Milinkevich urged those who could to stay as long as possible but the protests seemed unlikely to escalate to the levels that brought about revolutions in Ukraine and Georgia.

Mr Milinkevich said opposition exit polls suggested the Belarus president won less than the 50 per cent required to secure victory in a single round of voting, though official figures yesterday gave him 82.6 per cent. The opposition said their data showed Mr Milinkevich scored 30 per cent, five times his official total.

Mr Lukashenko's victory is likely to increase the international isolation of a regime the US has labelled "Europe's last dictatorship". European Union foreign ministers denounced the elections as "neither free nor fair". Though EU ministers failed to agree on an immediate response, targeted sanctions, including broadening of existing visa bans on top Belarusan officials, as well as possible asset freezes, are likely to be agreed next month.

The US on Monday supported the opposition's call for a new election. Washington also said it would co-ordinate "serious appropriate measures" with the EU to be taken against officials responsible for election fraud and human rights abuses. A State Department spokesman said specific actions would be taken against individuals as well as the regime, but he did not say what those sanctions might be.

The Belarus poll also suggested the pro-democracy revolutions that swept Ukraine, Georgia and Kyrgyzstan had lost momentum. In recent elections in Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan and now Belarus the opposition has failed to overturn regimes accused of authoritarianism.

Diplomats and civil society groups have warned that Mr Lukashenko, in power for 12 years, is likely to use a new five-year term to crush remaining opposition and independent media. "What is important is the trend away from democracy and towards dictatorship and a totalitarian regime," said one senior Western diplomat in Minsk. "The significance of the election lies in the psychological impact it will have on Mr Lukashenko."

The Belarus president on Monday exuded confidence, telling a Soviet-style victory press conference the elections were "honest and free".

"The revolutionary project that was talked about and was prepared in Belarus has not happened," he said. He dismissed demonstrators in Minsk as "freaks" and said the idea of international sanctions against Belarus was "absurd".

But EU ministers endorsed the damning findings of the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe's 476-strong observer mission. The mission's report found Mr Lukashenko had "permitted state authority to be used in a manner which did not allow citizens to freely and fairly express their will".

It said statements by the Belarusan KGB associating the opposition with terrorism and accusing it of planning a coup had led to a "climate of intimidation".

Thousands Protest Lukashenko's Victory (WT)

By Michael Mainville

The Washington Times, March 21, 2006

MINSK, Belarus -- Thousands of opposition supporters gathered for a second night of protests in central Minsk yesterday, heartened by Western condemnation of a weekend election in which authoritarian President Alexander Lukashenko was declared a runaway winner.

About 6,000 protesters -- less than the 10,000 who rallied after the polls closed on Sunday -- called for fresh elections and the end of Mr. Lukashenko's 12-year rule.

"We free people of Belarus will never recognize this election," opposition leader Alexander Milinkevich told the crowd gathered in October Square. "This was not an election. It was an anti-constitutional coup d'etat."

The opposition hopes to re-create the weeks of protests that led to peaceful revolutions in two other former Soviet republics, Ukraine and Georgia.

With overnight temperatures at 28 degrees, protesters set up a dozen small tents and vowed to turn the demonstration into a round-the-clock presence, repeating a tactic used in Ukraine. Most of the tents were draped with historic national flags favored by critics of Mr. Lukashenko, who has scrapped them for a Soviet-style version.

Protesters locked arms in a human chain guarding the tiny encampment. Others tried to bring in blankets, food and hot drinks, but often were detained by police.

Mr. Milinkevich returned to the square at about midnight to visit the campers, who were surrounded by about 1,000 supporters.

He vowed to remain with the campers, saying, "I don't have a tent, so I am going to stay on my feet," and predicted that more demonstrators would be arriving to join them.

"There has never been anything like this in Belarus," he added. "The whole world is watching us."

The protest was peaceful in spite of repeated threats from the authorities to violently suppress demonstrations. Hundreds of police and officers of Mr. Lukashenko's feared secret police -- still known by the Soviet-era acronym KGB -- watched from the sidelines or roamed through the crowd.

Mr. Lukashenko -- who since coming to power in 1994 has reintroduced Soviet-style economic and political controls on this country of about 10 million -- officially was declared to have won 82.6 percent in the vote, compared with 6 percent for Mr. Milinkevich. The president was allowed to seek a third, five-year term after a widely condemned 2004 referendum that removed presidential term limits.

Mr. Lukashenko defended his re-election as "honest and democratic," saying during a press conference yesterday that voters had shown "who's the boss" in Belarus. He also said his opponents had failed in their efforts to topple him in a foreign-backed revolution.

"The revolution that was talked about so much has failed," he said. "You have seen our opposition, and if you are reasonable people you have been convinced that it's worthless."

The United States and the European Union, which have labeled Mr. Lukashenko "the last dictator in Europe," yesterday rejected the election results and threatened further sanctions against the government.

"The United States does not accept the results of the election," White House spokesman Scott McClellan told reporters aboard Air Force One. "The election campaign was conducted in a climate of fear. It included arrests and beatings and fraud."

Mr. McClellan warned Belarusian authorities against "threatening or detaining those exercising their political rights in the coming days and beyond."

The run-up to the election was marked by the arrests of hundreds of opposition activists, official harassment of the opposition and pro-Lukashenko propaganda in the country's state-controlled media.

Among the possible sanctions are a wider ban on foreign travel by Mr. Lukashenko and other Belarusian officials, the seizure of officials' assets abroad and the cutting of foreign aid.

The biggest Western-based monitoring group to observe the election, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), was categorical in its condemnation of the vote yesterday.

"The March 19 presidential election does not meet the required international standards for free and fair elections," said U.S. Rep. Alcee L. Hastings, Florida Democrat, who coordinated the more than 400 OSCE observers during the vote.

Opposition Protests Belarus Vote Results (AP)

By Maria Danilova

AP, March 20, 2006

Thousands of opposition supporters gathered in the center of the Belarus' capital Monday for a second night, hoping their protest would help overturn a presidential election that the U.S. said was flawed by a "climate of fear."

The United States and the European Union called for new elections and threatened sanctions on Belarus, where the numbers of demonstrators was smaller than on election night and prospects for a Ukraine-style "Orange Revolution" seemed remote.

With overnight temperatures at 28 degrees, protesters set up a dozen small tents and vowed to turn the demonstration into a round-the-clock presence. Most of the tents were draped with historic national flags favored by critics of authoritarian President Alexander Lukashenko, who has scrapped them for a Soviet-style version.

"This is our last chance," said Vladimir Fivsky, a 20-year-old student who had wrapped one of the red-striped white flags around his shoulders and wore a pin in the same colors saying: "For Freedom!" He said came to the square to protest because he "had enough" after 12 years of Lukashenko's repressive rule.

The small but assertive move could rally others to the cause. But it could also prove unacceptable to authorities. Officials put on a show of force, with busloads of riot police fanning out into nearby streets and courtyards and preventing people from approaching the main square.

Police had only a small and unobtrusive presence at the protest the previous night, when an estimated 10,000 people braved the freezing cold and snow to register their outrage after Lukashenko was declared the overwhelming winner of Sunday's elections.

Lukashenko asserted Monday that his foes had failed to topple him in a foreign-backed "revolution."

International observers said the vote fell short of democratic standards. Europe's main human rights organization said it was a "farce," and the United States called for a new election. Lukashenko's main opponent refused to accept the outcome, calling the longtime leader an "illegal, illegitimate president."

However, the leverage of the international community seemed limited, and even many of the protesters appeared to have little appetite for a prolonged vigil and a possibly violent confrontation.

The election result, if it stands, would entrench the status of Belarus as one of the least independent of the former Soviet republics.

DOJ_NMG_0019810

Some 5,000 gathered in Oktyabrskaya Square in the capital, about half the number that came out Sunday night for a protest whose size was extraordinary in a tightly controlled country where police have cracked down swiftly on unsanctioned opposition gatherings.

The diminished crowd suggested to many that the opposition was losing momentum.

"There aren't enough people" a young man hollered into a cell phone amid the din of the rally.

But Alexander Milinkevich, the main opposition presidential candidate and symbolic heart of the protests, called on the demonstrators to gird for a lengthy campaign. He is demanding an election rerun.

"Our protest will be long and strong," he vowed. "We will never recognize this election. It's not an election but an anti-constitutional seizure of power."

The crowd thinned as hours passed, but many shared a determination to go to the bitter end.

"We plan to stay here overnight and to stay until the moment when the vote is pronounced falsified, when the authorities admit this and a new election is announced," said a 21-year-old student who gave his name only as Alexander, one of a dozen people sitting among the tents.

A few tents "may not change much, but if people lose their fear they will join us," he said.

Milinkevich visited the growing makeshift tent camp, taking sips of tea from a cup he was offered and saying: "We're together."

As the rally was about to begin, busloads of riot police streamed into Karl Marx Street near the square. Security forces in helmets and camouflage uniforms disembarked from the buses, jogged into neighborhood courtyards and prevented pedestrians from walking toward the square.

On the square, a 45-year-old woman who gave her name only as Irina said she was scared about the prospect of bloody police action, but "if Lukashenko stays in power, it will be even worse."

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said the election was flawed by a "climate of fear," and hinted that penalties such as travel restrictions "are things we will look at."

"We support the call for a new election," McClellan said. "The United States will continue to stand with the people of Belarus."

A cheer went up from the crowd in the square when a speaker reported the U.S. statement.

By contrast, Russian President Vladimir Putin on Monday congratulated Lukashenko in a telegram and said the results would help strengthen the alliance of the two former Soviet nations.

The chief electoral official said Monday that Lukashenko, who has ruled with an iron fist since 1994, won a "convincing victory" with 82.6 percent of the votes — a number Milinkevich called "monstrously inflated."

Lukashenko scorned the opposition, saying voters had shown "who's the boss" in Belarus. "The revolution that was talked about so much ... has failed," he told a nationally televised news conference.

He asserted that Sunday's protest leaders were in the pay of Western ambassadors and claimed there was no crackdown because the opposition is weak.

"Who was there to fight with? Nobody, understand? That's why we gave them the opportunity to show themselves, even though it was illegal."

But the observer mission from the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe said Monday that the election did not meet standards for a free and fair vote.

"Arbitrary use of state power and widespread detentions showed a disregard for the basic rights of freedom of assembly, association and expression," it said.

The EU threatened diplomatic and financial sanctions against Belarus' leaders, notably a wider travel ban.

Lukashenko said Monday he was "not afraid of further isolation." He added: "If the EU wants problems here, it will have them."

Status Quo Wins In Belarus (CSM)

By Fred Weir

DOJ_NMG_0019811

The Christian Science Monitor, March 21, 2006

MINSK, BELARUS - A triumphant Alexander Lukashenko hailed his 82.6 percent victory in widely criticized presidential elections as "the dignified choice of the Belarussian people" Monday and dismissed allegations of fraud as "provocations" by a few Western-linked political forces.

"The revolution that has been talked about for so long, and which some people have been actively preparing, has failed in Belarus," Mr. Lukashenko told a press conference in Minsk's ornate Soviet-era Palace of the Republic. During the 2-1/2 hour meeting Lukashenko tussled - in a sometimes scornful tone - with critical questioners, and repeatedly blamed hostile outsiders and "anti-Russian forces" for Belarus's image in the West as "Europe's last dictatorship."

"These elections took place under conditions of unprecedented international pressure on Belarus, and aggressive antipopular behavior from the so-called opposition such as Belarus has never seen.... But our people have shown that they are master in their own home," he said.

Life appeared to be returning to normal in Belarus, a Russian-allied industrial republic of 10 million, after a bitter election campaign that saw the arrest of over 300 opposition activists, the closure of 16 independent newspapers, and shuttering of several foreign-funded nongovernmental organizations.

Many ordinary Belarussians pronounced themselves happy with the idea of a third term for Lukashenko, who is credited with reviving the country's shattered post-Soviet economy, raising wages, and paying pensions on time. "We're doing very well here, better than most other places," says Nikolai Komash, a pensioner who said he voted "proudly" for Lukashenko. "People should appreciate what they've got, and not go out on the public square to shout and complain."

But activists for opposition candidate Alexander Milinkevich pledge to continue the protest movement they opened with a huge election-night rally in central Minsk and accuse Lukashenko of falsifying the vote to give himself a celestial majority while making the opposition appear nonexistent. Official results gave Mr. Milinkevich just 6 percent of the votes.

Speaking to reporters Monday, Milinkevich said Lukashenko's victory was "monstrously inflated." He described the election as an "unconstitutional coup" and Lukashenko as an "illegal and illegitimate" leader.

"I think it fully likely that Lukashenko got over 50 percent, but 82 percent is just unreal," says Oleg Manaev, an independent sociologist who conducts the only nonofficial opinion surveys in Belarus. "It is of some political urgency to clarify the actual vote the opposition received, which is possibly in the region of 25 percent."

Russia's 500-strong contingent of election observers praised the election as a model of democratic conduct. "There were a few technical imperfections during the elections, but no violations that could have changed the results of the vote," said Sergei Baburin, a Russian Duma deputy.

But 450 observers from the mainly Western Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe issued a statement saying the polls "failed to meet OSCE commitments for democratic elections."

The OSCE slammed Belarus's security service, the KGB, for creating "a climate of intimidation" and "an atmosphere of insecurity" through public accusations that the opposition was planning to launch a "terrorist" coup under the cover of protest rallies on election day. The report cited arrests and harassment of campaign workers, physical assaults on opposition leaders, and coercion of state employees to vote.

Milinkevich and another opposition candidate, Alexander Kazulin, are urging supporters to continue protesting on Minsk's central square. But hopes for a repeat of Ukraine's Orange Revolution, which forced fresh elections after 12 days of mass rallies in Kiev following allegedly fraudulent presidential polls in 2004, appear to be fading fast.

"Now the harsh times are about to start," says Yaroslav Romanchuk, vice chair of the United Civil Party, one of 10 opposition parties that backed Milinkevich. "Many people fear there will be mass arrests once all the foreign observers and journalists leave Belarus. Lukashenko has crossed a line with this election, and we expect him to crack down hard on independent forces now."

Experts say Lukashenko has proven much more adept at controlling the media and hobbling the opposition than his pro-Moscow Ukrainian counterparts in 2004.

In the week before election day, Belarussian police were able to seize all copies of the country's only nonstate daily newspaper, Narodnaya Volya, and to prevent any movement of opposition supporters into the capital to take part in election-day rallies.

DOJ_NMG_0019812

"The only source of information for most people is the state media, in which Lukashenko's opponents' names are never mentioned at all - they are referred to only as 'opposition' or 'so-called democrats,'" says Andrei Bastunets, deputy chair of the independent Belarussian Association of Journalists. "People simply have no sources of alternative information."

The editor of Narodnaya Volya, Svetlana Kolinkina, says she isn't sure whether the paper will ever be allowed to reopen. "This is a police state, with tough repression against any act of protest," she says. "The longer Lukashenko stays in power, the more this country will become a reactionary black hole."

The Struggle For Belarus (WP)

PRESIDENT BUSH'S new national security strategy makes the point that "though tyranny has few advocates, it needs more adversaries." The good news about Belarus's farcical presidential election Sunday is that dictator Alexander Lukashenko has acquired a few. To the long-standing enmity of the Bush administration can be added that of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, whose monitoring mission quickly judged the election as unfair and condemned the "arbitrary use of state power"; the Council of Europe, which called the ballot "a farce"; and the European Union, which said that new sanctions against Mr. Lukashenko and his regime were "very likely."

Most encouraging of all was the appearance in downtown Minsk on Sunday and again last night of thousands of opposition protesters, in spite of snow and a hail of threats by Mr. Lukashenko to break up demonstrations by force. The largest opposition gatherings in his 12 years of rule showed that there is a foundation for a Belarusan freedom movement, like those that eventually triumphed in neighboring Poland and Ukraine.

After years of tolerating a dictatorship on their borders, European countries finally are taking measures against Belarus. Visa sanctions have been applied against some officials of the regime; those now need to be extended to Mr. Lukashenko himself, and complemented with a freeze on bank accounts and other assets. The European Union has begun broadcasting objective news into the country, which could help to counter pervasive censorship. Neighbors such as Lithuania and Slovakia have been working with the opposition, which needs funding for communications and organizing.

All of this might have a decisive impact if not for the countervailing influence of Russia, which still prefers dictatorships in Europe. The new chairman of the Group of Eight -- that would be Russian President Vladimir Putin -- publicly congratulated Mr. Lukashenko yesterday, saying the election "highlighted voters' trust in your course." What of the massive manipulation witnessed by the international election observers? The Kremlin approves of it.

In fact, the G-8 chairman, who has been promoting "energy security" as a topic for discussion during the summit he will proudly host in St. Petersburg, is so pleased with Mr. Lukashenko's government that he is supplying it with gas at one-fifth the price he recently proposed to charge democratic Ukraine. That subsidy, and Russian purchases of the substandard goods of Belarusan state factories, prop up an economy barely changed from the Soviet model. The unambiguous policy of the G-8 chairman is to preserve Russia's domination of its neighbor by backing a dictator who falsifies elections, has murdered leading opponents and enriches himself through arms sales to such countries as Iran and Sudan.

That presumably won't stop President Bush and the six other leaders of Western democracies from toasting their G-8 chairman in St. Petersburg this summer. Too bad the national security strategy seems not to extend that far; Mr. Putin's emerging autocracy also deserves some adversaries.

Recent Shifts Good News For Putin, Russia (AP)

By Henry Meyer, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 21, 2006

The Kremlin may be reclaiming a dominant role in its former Soviet backyard. In Belarus, Moscow-allied strongman Alexander Lukashenko just won re-election by a landslide — at least by the official count. And President Vladimir Putin's allies could return to government in Sunday's Ukrainian parliamentary election, just over a year after the Orange Revolution.

Such developments set back Western hopes of a democratic tidal wave in the former Soviet sphere and could further tarnish Putin's democratic credentials as he tries to cast himself as a statesman capable of brokering deals with Iran and Hamas.

For Putin, however, asserting dominance over Belarus and Ukraine appears to be part of his strategy to re-establish Moscow as a global player during his year of the G-8 presidency.

"Russia wants to restore its superpower status, and that includes putting these countries back into its orbit," said Yevgeny Volk, Moscow director of the conservative U.S think tank Heritage Foundation.

"It is seeking to reclaim its influence over the former Soviet Union, and remove that of the United States and European Union," he added.

Russia was furious at what it saw as Western encroachment on its home turf after Ukraine's November 2004 Orange Revolution — the mass protests over election fraud that brought reformist opposition leader Viktor Yushchenko to power over the Kremlin's favored candidate, Viktor Yanukovych.

Months later, the impoverished Central Asian nation of Kyrgyzstan had its Tulip Revolution, becoming the third former Soviet state within 18 months to see opposition forces topple a Soviet-era leader. Georgia's Rose Revolution started the process in 2003.

Today, however, Russia is once again on the rise as nervous authoritarian regimes from Kazakhstan to Uzbekistan — where rights groups say government troops killed hundreds of civilians in a crackdown on protesters last year — build closer ties to Moscow, partly as a way to cow opposition forces.

Even in Ukraine, disillusionment at political infighting and the economic collapse that followed the Orange Revolution have brought about a political comeback for Yanukovych, whose rigged victory in the 2004 presidential election was annulled by the Supreme Court.

Enjoying strong support in the Russian-speaking east, his party is poised to win the most seats in the new parliament and earn the right to form the government, even if it will probably need to govern in an uneasy coalition with the party of the pro-Western Yushchenko.

"The West's influence that triumphed in the color revolutions has clearly become a dead end for these nations," said Sergei Markov, a Kremlin-connected political analyst. "In Georgia, Ukraine and Kyrgyzstan, people live worse, not better than before."

By contrast, in Belarus, whose authoritarian president is shunned by Western nations as Europe's last dictator, cheap supplies of Russian gas provide a vital lifeline to the inefficient, state-dominated economy.

Analyst Alexei Malashenko of the Carnegie Moscow Center think tank said on Ekho Moskvy radio that while the Kremlin sometimes had tense relations with Belarus, its greatest interest lay in preserving the status quo in Minsk.

He also said that despite loud Western criticism of the Belarus election, there was no serious attempt to help pro-democratic forces, as happened in Ukraine.

"There was a strong fight for Ukraine, but no one fought for Belarus," Malashenko said.

Analysts agree that Russia's trump card in the region is its immense energy resources. They ensure that despite pro-Western inclinations, both Georgia and Ukraine remain dangerously dependent on their larger neighbor.

Ukraine meanwhile had to swallow a twofold increase in gas prices after a bitter New Year's dispute that saw Moscow turn off the gas taps.

"Russia is using strong economic levers. With the growth of oil and gas exports it has become much richer than it was in the 1990s and it is translating this economic might into political influence and power," said Volk.

At the center of the Russian policy in the region is a determination to resist the West's efforts to boost its influence at Russia's expense, in what Moscow says is falsely portrayed as a bid to promote democracy.

Russia on Monday accused the United States of trying to enforce its vision of democracy on others, angrily rejecting President Bush's criticism that the Kremlin has rolled back freedoms.

Putin To Discuss Oil Pipeline With Chinese (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0019814

By Mike Eckel, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 21, 2006

Russian President Vladimir Putin arrived Tuesday for a visit to China that is to include talks on building a pipeline to deliver Siberian oil to fuel China's booming economy — and his fifth meeting in under a year with the Chinese president.

With China's wealth and might on the ascendancy, Putin's meetings with Chinese President Hu Jintao and other officials are expected to be spectacles of symbolism and overtures to Russia's gigantic neighbor.

Officials in both Moscow and Beijing are looking to spur new investment between the former Cold War adversaries and double last year's $29 billion in trade by 2010.

Both Tokyo and Beijing — a leading buyer of Russian oil and gas — have maneuvered hard for the best routing of the 2,550-mile East Siberian-Pacific pipeline. For now, China imports all Russian oil by rail.

China is also Russia's top customer for military weaponry and equipment.

The two countries have also moved to deepen political ties following years of Cold War suspicion. Both have pledged commitment to a "multipolar world" and last year warned other nations against attempts to dominate global affairs and interfere in sovereign nations' domestic matters.

In an interview with China's official Xinhua News Agency, Putin gave a veiled warning over U.S. policies to encourage democracy in the former Soviet republics, saying that attempts to "forcibly export democracy and impose cultural standards and values" result in conflicts.

"We do not impose our viewpoints by force, we never 'flex our muscles', but instead we consistently advocate political and diplomatic approaches to the settlement of conflicts," Putin was quoted as saying.

Last week, the Bush administration released a foreign policy review that expressed dismay at rollbacks in democratic reform in Russia and warned China against denying personal and political freedoms.

In August, the two countries held unprecedented military exercises, underscoring how far the two former adversaries had come since the 1960s, when they fought border skirmishes.

Chinese Assistant Foreign Minister Li Hui said last week that the two sides will also develop five military projects to highlight "friendly cooperation." He gave no details.

Putin and Hu are also expected to discuss disputes over the Iranian and North Korean nuclear programs.

Russia and China, both veto-wielding members of the U.N. Security Council and longtime supporters of Tehran, want a more cautious approach to reining in Iran's nuclear ambitions. Russia has offered to process uranium for Iran in an attempt to break a stalemate in negotiations.

Russia and China are also participants of six-nation disarmament talks on North Korea's nuclear programs, along with the United States, Japan and South Korea. Negotiations have stalled due mainly to a dispute over U.S. sanctions against North Korea's alleged currency counterfeiting and money laundering.

Russia's Putin To Tackle Energy During China Visit (FT)

By Richard McGregor And Andrew Yeh

Financial Times, March 21, 2006

Vladimir Putin, Russia's president, arrives in China on Tuesday for a visit that Beijing hopes will secure it a decisive advantage over Japan in their lengthy battle to secure the route of an oil pipeline from east Siberia.

Despite booming bilateral trade which reached $29.1bn in 2005, up 37 per cent year-on-year, an energy-hungry China has been increasingly frustrated by Russia's prevarication over various oil and gas deals.

Beijing was angered when Moscow abrogated a 2003 agreement to build a pipeline to Daqing, China's oil capital in the north-east, after Tokyo offered a more attractive financial package to re-route it to a Russian port.

Although the Daqing route is shorter and cheaper, the Japanese proposal gave Russia more options to market the oil throughout north Asia and ensure it did not become totally dependent on China.

DOJ_NMG_0019815

However, the pendulum may be swinging back Beijing's way, with China National Petroleum Corp, the country's largest energy company, expected to sign an investment agreement during Mr Putin's two-day trip with Transeft, Russia's oil pipeline monopoly.

"We are full of confidence that the branch pipeline will be built," said Chen Gang, the CNPC chairman, in an interview with the Russian media before the visit.

One possible compromise that has been discussed would see the pipeline go through Daqing to the Chinese port of Dalian, from where the oil could be shipped to South Korea or Japan.

The absence of any pipeline between the two countries means that Russia oil imports, which account for about 5 per cent of China's total foreign purchases, have to come in on an overloaded rail system.

Sergei Razov, Russia's ambassador to Beijing, said in comments before the visit that "energy cooperation was progressing smoothly" and that the pipeline project was being negotiated.

"It's a large-scale project of great vision that requires a high level of investment," he said in a pointed reference to Russia's demand that China pay for most of the project's construction cost.

Mr Razov said Mr Putin's visit takes place when Sino-Russian relations were at "their best time in history."

However, many Chinese officials and commentators are critical about how the warmth in ties between Mr Putin and Hu Jintao, China's president, and other top leaders, have not translated into concrete co-operation.

The Chinese media has characterised the relationship as "hot on the top but cold on the bottom."

"The impetus that improves bilateral relations appears weak due to a lack of communication and understanding and even a misunderstanding between people of the two countries," said the Oriental Morning Post newspaper in Shanghai.

The two sides may also discuss possible gas sales by Russia, but such talks are not expected to progress very far as long as energy regulations in China keep the domestic price lower than the international price, making any such imports uneconomic.

Mexico Weighs In On Migration (DMN)

By Michelle Mittelstadt

The Dallas Morning News, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON – Worried by the sometimes harsh tone of the immigration debate unfolding in the U.S., the Mexican government on Monday took its message directly to the American public: As your neighbor, we want to work with you to fashion a solution.

In full-page ads in The New York Times, Washington Post and other newspapers, the Mexican government acknowledged a shared responsibility to address illegal immigration and to stem its citizens' northward exodus by creating more jobs at home.

While continuing to press for a guest worker program that would confer legal work status on millions of Mexicans living illegally in the U.S. – a long-held goal for Mexican President Vicente Fox – Mexico is now outlining its responsibilities. Among them: enforcing its own migration laws; combating human smuggling and criminal networks; securing its southern border; and promoting the return of Mexican émigrés.

For its part, the ad says, the U.S. should allow Mexico to participate in the "design, management, supervision and evaluation" of a guest worker program that should cover "the largest possible number of workers and their families" currently in the U.S. illegally.

The ad campaign, designed by Dallas-based Allyn & Co., reflects a migration resolution approved in February by the Mexican Congress.

"We thought it was about time to have the American people looking firsthand at what's our position on these issues that are so sensitive and important for both countries," Mexican Ambassador Carlos de Icaza said Monday.

"Our message to the American people is that we are your neighbors, we are your friends, this is a common challenge, and we are part of the solution, not only part of the problem," Mr. de Icaza said.

The public relations effort comes as Congress is grappling with the question of how to treat the 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants living in the U.S. – more than half of them Mexican.

While some lawmakers favor giving illegal immigrants work permits and placing them on a path to eventual citizenship, others are pressing for heightened immigration enforcement that would pressure many unauthorized workers to leave the country.

The Senate Judiciary Committee appears poised next week to approve a guest worker program – setting senators on a collision course with the House, which in December approved a tough enforcement-only approach that was silent on President Bush's call for a temporary worker program. With a wide philosophical chasm between the chambers and within the Republican Party, the chances of an immigration accord this year are slim, many experts say.

The Senate immigration subcommittee chairman, Texas Republican John Cornyn, pressed Monday for a comprehensive immigration accord including increased enforcement and a guest worker program.

Failure to do so would increase the dangers posed by drug- and human-smuggling networks and leave the country vulnerable to terrorism, Mr. Cornyn said in a speech to the World Affairs Council of Dallas/Fort Worth.

"I am not against immigration, I am against illegal immigration," Mr. Cornyn said.

The Mexican ambassador voiced concern with the tone of the immigration debate, which has proved to be a hot topic on talk radio, cable TV news shows and in public forums.

"It's a very emotional debate. And sometimes the debate is encouraging, but on other times, it's discouraging," Mr. de Icaza said. "So we thought it was about time to directly make known which is our position in black and white, written on paper."

In a speech Monday in Cleveland, Mr. Bush renewed his case for a guest worker program matched with tougher border enforcement and sanctions on employers who hire illegal workers.

Asked about immigration during a question-and-answer session, Mr. Bush said the debate "can get harsh."

"My call for people is to be rational about the debate and thoughtful about what words can mean during this debate," he said.

Mr. Bush, Mr. Fox and Canada's new prime minister, Stephen Harper, meet at the end of the month in Cancún, Mexico, to discuss security and economic issues.

Morgan's Chief Economist Warns Against Tariffs On Chinese Imports (WSJ)

By Jason Dean

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

BEIJING -- Morgan Stanley Chief Economist Stephen S. Roach said Tuesday that a successful move by the U.S. Congress to pass sweeping tariffs on imports from China would be "close to economic suicide" for the U.S.

U.S. Senators Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.) and Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.) have proposed a bill that would impose 27.5% tariffs on all Chinese imports unless Beijing sharply revalues its currency. The senators, who are in China this week, have argued that Beijing keeps the yuan's value artificially low, making its exports unfairly cheap and exacerbating a huge U.S. trade deficit with China. A vote on the bill could come next week.

Mr. Roach, in Beijing for meetings with Chinese officials, told reporters Tuesday that he believes that bill would easily pass in the Senate, and could well pass in the House of Representatives as well. He also said he believes the U.S. Treasury Department appears increasingly likely to label China a currency manipulator during an upcoming review.

He said the tariffs proposed by Sens. Schumer and Graham would be a "horrible mistake" that could prompt Beijing to cut back on purchases of U.S. treasuries, leading to a weaker dollar and higher interest rates.

"I do think that the political climate with respect to U.S.-China trade tensions is as bad as I have ever seen it," said Mr. Roach, who said he's been observing the bilateral relationship for two decades. "At a time when the U.S. is more dependent on foreign capital than ever before, to impose tariffs not just on a major provider of goods, but a major lender of capital, I think would be close to economic suicide."

French Protesters Set Strike Date (NYT)

By Craig R. Smith

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0019817

PARIS, March 20 — French students and unions stepped up pressure on the government today, calling for more demonstrations culminating in strikes next week to fight a hotly contested new labor law that makes it easier for companies to fire young employees.

The protesters set March 28 as the fourth "day of action" since street rallies over the new job rules began Feb. 7.

"There was a consensus from the beginning," said Coralie Caron, head of a federation of high school students. "The 28th is going to be like a very large protest everywhere in France."

President Jacques Chirac repeated calls for dialogue between the government and opponents of the law, saying the new edict could be "improved."

Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin, meanwhile, met with business leaders, unemployed youths and students in an effort to find a way out of the impasse that threatens to cripple his political career. The business leaders warned against any roll back in the legislation, saying that could slow the revamping of the nation's labor markets for months, if not years.

But the government hinted at some room for negotiation.

"He is ready to go further than this," a spokesman for Mr. de Villepin said today. "If there are proposals from the unions, he is ready to study them."

The battle over an incremental change in the country's social contract is emblematic of the overwhelming challenge facing much of Western Europe as it tries to loosen rigid labor laws and trim costly entitlements that have built up in the decades since their hybrid capitalist-socialist economic systems emerged after World War II.

Governments recognize the need for fundamental change, particularly as their societies age and the burden of pensions and health care balloon. But few have the political will to force those changes on their societies.

So far, Mr. de Villepin has rebuffed calls to revoke the law. Yet he hasn't demonstrated the iron hand of Margaret Thatcher, who broke the control of British unions and pushed for a more flexible labor market in order to create a competitive Britain.

The French unions have refused to cooperate with Mr. de Villepin.

"For now, the unions reject the government's conditions for a dialogue," said a representative of the C.F.T.C., one of the country's union syndicates, adding that both the unions and the students are demanding that the new contract rules be suspended before talks with the government begin.

"Without this condition, we won't do anything," the union representative said.

Though French unions account for less than 10 percent of the country's work force, their concentration in the public sector, particularly in transportation, gives them the ability to wreak havoc on daily life, putting enormous pressure on the government.

Mr. de Villepin has made three proposals "within the framework of the law," according to his spokesman, who said that rescinding the law, as demanded by student and union leaders, is not really possible.

Those proposals, meant to soften the impact of the new contract rules, include designating a mentor for young employees hired under the new law, a six-month review to give those employees a sense of how they are doing, and free training if they are fired.

"We have to give the C.P.E, a chance," Mr. de Villepin said in an interview with the monthly student magazine, Citato, published today. He was referring to France's "first employment contract," known as C.P.E.

"Everybody knows it's impossible to continue with this model, but nobody in France has found a solution to respond to the problem," said Jean-Daniel Levy, a director at Paris-based polling company CSA. "What they've been able to do is define what they don't want, but they have trouble saying what it is they want."

The new law, passed by Parliament earlier this month, would allow companies to hire people under 26 for a two-year trial period, during which the young workers could easily be fired. It is intended to open up full-time jobs for people entering the work force.

Because of France's heavily regulated labor market, many companies now prefer to hire temporary workers rather than risk putting on the payroll inexperienced people they would not easily be able to lay off. As a result, unemployment among the youth is more than double the national average of about 10 percent. Joblessness is even higher among the second-generation immigrant youth who were behind widespread rioting last fall.

The standoff threatens to weaken Mr. de Villepin, a diplomat and poet, at a time when he wants to be consolidating power for next year's presidential elections, which he hopes to win. Already, his approval rating has plunged to the lowest level since he took over the job last May.

A survey last week by CSA found that two out of three French people are against the labor law.

The Decline Of France (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

The right to assemble is a pillar of free society. But in France it's the only pillar its citizens seem to take seriously. So much so that any public debate of import gets conducted in the streets rather than through the ballot box or institutions of a purportedly mature democracy.

In less enlightened societies, as opposed to the birthplace of the Enlightenment, that's usually called mob rule. But the violent street demonstrations roiling France's cities today, and the unhappy career prospects of Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin, are the latest symptoms of an ailing democracy.

The troubles began with student unhappiness about a new "First Job Contract" law, adopted by the National Assembly two weeks ago. They grew into a protest movement once the unions joined in. A nationwide strike has been called for next Tuesday. The merit of the new law isn't the issue here. One can hate the new law as well as the tactics employed by the mobs to kill it. The bill is designed to reduce the youth jobless rate of 23%. But if France wants to reverse a 30-year pattern of low growth and high unemployment, it needs to tear down labor law barriers across the board, not just for people under the age of 26.

Reasonable people could have had a spirited debate about this policy. So why didn't they before the jobs contract became the law of the land? Parliaments and elections exist so complicated issues can be digested and decisions calmly taken. France went from little discussion to protests in central Paris, blockades at the Sorbonne and a rampage through a McDonald's restaurant. That's "civic discourse"?

The masses on the streets reply that this is the only way to fight a sclerotic political system, and the claim isn't without merit. MPs and the president face voters only every five years. The National Assembly is notoriously unresponsive to voter concerns, though the chicken-and-egg problem is that citizens don't bother even to try to sway their representatives. The jobs bill was pushed through using a special procedure that allowed for little debate or amendment. It is the brainchild of Mr. de Villepin, an official chosen by party rule and heir apparent to deeply unpopular Jacques Chirac.

The roots of the problem go back further. The French have never shied away from guillotining aloof rulers, from Louis XVI to, more figuratively, Charles de Gaulle. Lesser men have fallen to nationwide protests, and Mr. de Villepin may be next. All these small revolutions were inspired by the French Revolution, but France never managed to establish a political system both durable and flexible.

How instructive it would be to send Alexis de Tocqueville through France today. He'd find dependence on the state and the absence of individualism, symbolized by the low levels of private charity and civic engagement. He would not find the bounty of groups and lobbies of healthier democracies. "In every case, at the head of any new undertaking, where in France you would find the government," Tocqueville's "Democracy in America" asserts, "in the United States you are sure to find an association."

Yes, the banners of student groups add color to the street demonstrations. But look closer. The force with real bite is the public-sector employee unions. Blue-collar workers long ago abandoned the union movement, leaving civil servants who, like Charles de Gaulle once said of France's cosseted farmers, are desperate to hold on to their "mediocre but secure" posts.

The government workforce -- one-quarter of the population -- can terrorize the majority by stopping the trains or turning off the electricity. In other words, the state funds its own opposition, which torpedoes even modest efforts to modernize France. By marching with the public-sector unions to defend this status quo, the boys and girls of the Sorbonne are saying they want to be "mediocre but secure," too. What a dream for a 20-year-old. And a useful warning to Americans about the danger of giving public-sector unions too much power as well.

In its post-Revolutionary history, France has been characterized simultaneously by instability and immobility. In the 217 years that America has lived under a single Constitutional order, France has been ruled by 10 different regimes. Yet the France of de Gaulle's "Fifth Republic" has had fewer leaders -- five -- than the Soviet Union did by the time of its dissolution in 1991. Stability and dynamism are surely a better formula for a successful state. And the only proven way to get there is a stronger democracy.

Nicolas Sarkozy, a presidential candidate, wants to make the president more directly accountable by removing the rule against his speaking before the Assembly. Others are calling for a new constitution to replace the current one, which was designed in the troubled days of 1958. A real parliament would help. France's growing protests make the case for a constitutional rethink. When the thousands on the street assert the right to make laws for the millions, a country loses its right to call itself a "democratic republic."

Soft Landing For The Danish, A Job Loss Can Be Learning Experience (WSJ)

By Marcus Walker

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

HJORRING, Denmark -- After graduating from high school, Susanne Olsen spent 10 years at the local slaughterhouse hacking ham off dead pigs. It was arduous, unskilled work that left her ill-equipped for most other jobs.

Then the slaughterhouse closed down last year, leaving 500 people without jobs in a small town that had recently lost its biscuit factory and its mobile-phone factory. All three employers were striving to cut their labor costs amid rising competition from low-wage Eastern Europe and Asia.

But unlike millions of laid-off workers in similar circumstances elsewhere in Europe, Ms. Olsen was sure she was going to find a new job. Now she's an apprentice golf landscaper, with her salary subsidized by the state while she takes four years of training paid for by the government and her new employer. "I miss my old colleagues, but I don't miss the pigs at all," Ms. Olsen says.

Most of Western Europe is fighting to hold on to its traditionally strong job protections while in some cases cutting jobless benefits, as the region struggles to compete in a globalized economy. Denmark has gone the other way.

The government allows liberal hiring and firing as in the U.S. And it has imposed limits on the duration of its high unemployment benefits. But it also invests more than any other country, as a percentage of its gross domestic product, in retraining the jobless -- a combination it calls "flexicurity." Its unusual mix of the free market and big government has helped Denmark cut its unemployment rate in half, from about 10% in the early 1990s to U.S.-style levels of under 5% now. The economy has been relatively robust, growing 3.4% last year. Meanwhile, France and Germany are at or above the Danish jobless rate of a decade ago.

Even though Danes are among the most easily laid-off workers in Europe, polls show the country's workers are the most secure about their future. The European Commission now holds up Denmark as a model for other countries to try to follow. Politicians from other EU countries have made numerous study trips to Copenhagen. France has cited Denmark as a model for its own more modest labor-law reforms, which in recent days have touched off mass public protests.

Meanwhile, Danes change jobs more frequently than any workers in the developed world except Americans and Australians, says the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development. But fewer than 10% say they're concerned about job security, compared with nearly 40% in Germany and more than 60% in Spain. Most Danes believe they can always find work in their fluid labor market. In the interim, they get security from a dole that replaces up to nine-tenths of their last wage, the highest level in Europe.

Critics say the experiment might not be easy to replicate. For one thing, Denmark is small, with just 5.4 million people. And close-knit Scandinavian countries historically have had a higher tolerance for taxes. The system isn't cheap: Denmark spends about 4.4% of its GDP every year on supporting and retraining the jobless, the most expensive labor-market policy in the world. That and Denmark's other welfare generosity keep income taxes sky-high. Tax revenues take up half of gross domestic product, second only to Sweden.

Not everyone benefits equally. Annabeth Garvold, a university graduate who was jobless for much of 2003, says the state computer-training course she took was too basic to be useful, though the program did place her in three months of subsidized work at a tech company, through which she found a job. Workers retrained for new industries also aren't guaranteed to find salaries as good as their old ones. Ms. Olsen's golf-course wage, which started at $20 an hour, won't rise as high as the nearly $30 an hour she made butchering pigs, she says.

Meanwhile, immigrants, including many Muslims, have significantly higher unemployment rates and are unemployed for longer than the native-born, just as in other European countries. Such tensions boiled over when a Danish newspaper published provocative cartoons of the prophet Muhammad, a controversy that has become global.

Denmark has long been accustomed to flexible hiring and firing, agreed between unions and employers back in 1898 in exchange for unions' rights to organize and strike. Rising prosperity in the post-World War II era allowed the state to pay generous benefits to the jobless, the sick, early retirees, parents, and anyone who wanted to take a break from work.

But by the early 1990s, Denmark, like many European welfare states, found itself supporting a rising number of working-age people who lived comfortably on welfare and had little incentive to find jobs. Social problems grew: The children of the unemployed grew up to be unemployed. "Welfare dependency developed into a social state of mind," says Helle Seerup, a labor-market expert at the Danish trade union confederation.

In 1994, the center-left government of Prime Minister Poul Nyrup Rasmussen scrapped indefinite benefits for the unemployed, who suddenly faced state pressure to actively seek work. The prime minister's close ties to trade unions helped him to win acceptance for the change.

The present center-right government, under Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen, has tightened the system further. If a person hasn't found work after a year, their consultant "activates" them, proposing specific training or work experience -- and reducing benefits if they don't comply.

Denmark's different regions run the policy with variations, constantly experimenting and tweaking the system as officials learn what works. The nationwide success rate: About two-thirds of Danes who are laid off have a new job within a year, say labor-market specialists.

The state is so determined to get Danes off the dole that it sometimes designs and funds entire new college courses just to fill a small number of jobs. In the cramped corridors of the Public Employment Service for the Copenhagen area, labor consultant Kim Jorgensen has arranged for a business school to run three courses in the past three years in how to program the business software system Microsoft Axapta, at a cost of $160,000 to the taxpayer. In total, 16 unemployed people were trained this way to fill specific vacancies.

Mudassar Qureshi, 28 years old, couldn't find a job when he graduated from university two years ago. He says his computer-science diploma was too general for employers, who wanted specialists. The Axapta course led to a job at a local software company, HOB Business Solutions, which taught part of the course. For the first half-year at HOB, almost 40% of Mr. Qureshi's starting salary of $3,700 a month was paid by the state. The subsidy led HOB to hire two subsidized trainees instead of one expensive veteran. "It helped to bridge the mental jump of taking on two guys who are inexperienced," said the company's chief executive, Hasse Bergman.

In the same cramped Copenhagen building as the consultants, Kirsten Thomsen prepares the "bottleneck analysis" that makes Denmark's peculiar hybrid possible, in which a big, active government helps the free labor market to flow better. Every three months, Ms. Thomsen has the U.S.-based polling firm Gallup survey employers in the Copenhagen area on what jobs they will need in coming years, and uses the feedback to identify the next labor shortages. Right now they're short of lots of skilled workers, from hospital X-ray technicians to "smorrebrods maids" -- women who prepare Denmark's traditional version of the smorgasbord.

The consultants who deal directly with unemployed people use her reports in picking training courses for individuals. "In our system, we can make supply and demand match," Ms. Thomsen says.

The true test is how the system deals with low-skilled, manual laborers in declining industries. The staff at Ms. Olsen's slaughterhouse in Hjørring, in Denmark's thinly populated far-north, tried hard to persuade the plant's owner, Danish Crown, to keep it open. They even released a protest song called "You Can't Slaughter Us," which made it onto national TV, and features 200 burly meatpackers in blue overalls singing en masse with a rock-band backing.

But Denmark's easy layoff rules meant the plant was doomed. Local workers cost the company more than $32 an hour. Rival German slaughterhouse labor costs only $16 an hour, while Polish workers cost only $6 an hour, according to Danish

Crown. Even German slaughterhouses increasingly use migrant Polish meatpackers to keep their costs down. In recent years Danish Crown has opened two slaughterhouses in northern Germany, at which it employs teams of Poles.

Finding new work for the 500 laid off at Hjørring in the May 2005 shutdown was a double challenge. Most of the workers didn't want to leave their home town. Danes are very rooted people, says Jan Winther, Danish Crown's director of human resources: "If a new job is more than an hour away, Danes say it's too far." In addition, the meatpackers weren't qualified for new employment, says Jim Jensen, a negotiator for the Danish foodworkers' union NNF. "Slaughterhouse workers are not skilled, except that they can get up early and work hard," he says.

Danish Crown went beyond state requirements and paid shop steward Jorn Katballe to stay at Hjørring for a year and help his laid-off colleagues find new jobs. To Mr. Katballe, the task seemed huge at first. "People who've given 20 or 30 years and they've not learned anything else, it's difficult to get them out into the real world," he says.

Standing before the desolate single-story redbrick slaughterhouse, Mr. Katballe looks mournfully at the boarded-up gap in the wall where the pigs used to be brought in. "Normally, by this time in the morning, there were hundreds of people around," he says. He's still up at 5 a.m. each day himself by habit of his old job. "It's like a light in my head that goes 'ding,' " he says.

Despite Hjorring's spate of large-scale factory closures, new vacancies keep appearing in Denmark's flexible labor market. Working with the public-labor consultants, Mr. Katballe has been sending his ex-colleagues in ones and twos to new employers.

Where qualifications are lacking, the state pays for courses at vocational colleges, often sharing the cost with a new employer, and in a few cases even with help from the old employer, Danish Crown. The company invested $9,800 to pay for a one-year diploma in hairdressing for a female former employee. Hairdressing was not on public officials' list of job bottlenecks, but there was a vacancy in town.

In most cases the Public Employment Service was willing to pay for new qualifications because of the scale of the town's layoffs. Two of the former meatpackers, including Ms. Olsen, have ended up working at golf courses. Another became a carpenter. Several have gone to work in Denmark's large wind-energy industry. Two were trained as oil workers on North Sea platforms. Others have become gardeners, security guards, and even computer technicians

Finn Larsen, 46, is training to be a school teacher in math, physics, chemistry and sports. His former job was to slit pigs' throats with knives. "It was tough work on the slaughter line, but we had a good team spirit," Mr. Larsen says.

Even though he will be 49 when he qualifies as a teacher, the state agreed to pay for his books and other costs at Hjorring's teacher training college. The state is paying Mr. Larsen benefits of $2,400 a month for four years to help support his family while he retrains. Although there are no vacancies in Hjorring now, other teachers' retirement will create a shortage by 2009, according to labor officials' bottleneck analysis for the area.

Since becoming a meatpacker 12 years ago, Mr. Larsen has had little use for math, other than helping his two daughters with their homework. "Of course I am a bit rusty," he says. But Mr. Larsen is already being deployed in schools as a trainee teacher, recently teaching algebra to 14-year-olds for several weeks' work experience.

Ten months after the slaughterhouse closed, some 300 ex-workers have found new professions in addition to the 80 who got other jobs as meatpackers. Others from Hjørring are in full-time education, or chose retirement where close to the age of 60. Today, only 60 of the 500 laid-off workers from Hjørring are still on unemployment benefits.

Britain Moves Toward A Ban On Secret Loans (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

LONDON, March 20 -- The government of Prime Minister Tony Blair on Monday proposed banning secret loans to political parties to try to end a financing scandal blamed for sending Blair's popularity ratings to record lows.

Charles Falconer, the cabinet minister in charge of the judiciary, said he would immediately seek to amend campaign finance laws to force political parties to disclose who lends them money. "The system has not been cleaned up enough and we need to change it," he said.

Blair's Labor Party said Friday that it had accepted loans worth more than $24 million from unidentified donors. Under British law, political parties must disclose the source of donations, but they do not have to declare the source of loans.

Blair has been badly hurt by recent disclosures that several wealthy businessmen who privately lent money to his campaign were then recommended for seats in the House of Lords, the upper house of Parliament.

The appearance that seats in the House of Lords were up for sale -- an allegation Blair has denied -- has caused critics to call his government as sleazy as the Conservative government of former prime minister John Major, which Blair ousted in 1997.

Back then, Blair promised to run a government "purer than pure," a statement that increasing numbers of critics are throwing back at him.

Noticeably quiet in the debate has been the opposition Conservative Party, which also appears to have benefited from secret loans from wealthy supporters. Some analysts here said Blair sanctioned the lending simply to keep pace with money the Conservatives were receiving.

Challenged by Labor officials, Conservatives have not yet announced how much money in undisclosed loans the party received last year, nor have they listed the donors.

Thomas Strathclyde, the Conservative leader in the House of Lords, said Monday that the government's move to change the funding rules now was like a burglar "caught in a back garden with a bag of swag, saying he only wanted to polish the silver."

"I have no sympathy at all for the prime minister and his coterie of cronies who are at the heart of this affair," Strathclyde said. "They have dragged politics, their party and sadly this house into disrepute."

Other conservatives joined Labor in seeking new transparent campaign financing rules.

The Labor Party on Monday decided to make public a list of wealthy donors who lent money to its campaign. The list included a $4 million loan from property developer David Garrard, and $3.5 million loans from retail magnate Richard Caring and from Trade and Industry Minister David Sainsbury. Sainsbury is a member of one of the country's wealthiest families, which owns a supermarket chain.

The loans were ostensibly to be paid back, but critics contended that they would quietly be turned into donations.

Two polls published Sunday offered more bad news for Blair.

A YouGov poll for the Sunday Times put Blair's personal approval rating at 36 percent -- its lowest point in his tenure. A separate poll commissioned by the Sunday Telegraph indicated that 73 percent of voters believe Blair's government is "as sleazy or sleazier" than Major's.

The scandal has added fuel to the public debate about when Blair, now in his ninth year in office, should step down.

The prime minister has declared that he will not seek a fourth term and indicated that he wants Gordon Brown, his chancellor of the exchequer, or finance minister, to succeed him. In recent months, there has been growing speculation that Blair will resign to turn the office over to Brown well before 2010, the latest year in which the next election could be held.

A poll for the BBC, released Monday, showed that 50 percent of British voters want Blair to quit either right away or within the next 12 months.

An editorial in the Guardian newspaper, a longtime supporter of Blair's party, said Monday that the prime minister "should go this year."

"Undercover loans from uncertain sources degrade him both personally and politically," adding to his other missteps, including the Iraq war, which is extremely unpopular among the British public, the editorial said.

Rodney Barker, a political scientist at the London School of Economics, said Blair's current problems "make it more likely he will go sooner than later."

Drawing a comparison to lame-duck presidents in the United States, Barker said he saw Blair as a "molting prime minister who is losing a few more feathers every day."

Barker said the loan scandal has hurt Blair, but the Iraq war hurt him more.

"I wouldn't be surprised if he went this summer," Barker said. But he added that history has shown that leaders worldwide tend to want to "hang on and on and on."

Thai Leader Digs In As Protest Swells (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0019823

BANGKOK -- For several weeks, Thai Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra has faced nightly demonstrations demanding his ouster. Tens of thousands of protesters have crowded into the capital, joining ranks with brown-robed monks, Chinese opera performers and tribal children in colorful costumes.

Set initially against the towers of the Grand Palace and more recently outside Government House -- the princely villa the prime minister uses for his offices -- the spectacle so far has remained peaceful, though the potential for violence is growing as Thaksin refuses to budge.

No matter what the outcome, the persistent protests have marked a stunning reversal of fortune for Thaksin, a cellular telephone and marketing tycoon who attained such popularity during his first term that he was reelected in a landslide just last year.

"We're in uncharted territory," said Abhisit Vejjajiva, the leader of the opposition Democrat Party. "This is the first time we've seen mass protests concerning the legitimacy of a person who's been elected."

Simmering discontent, particularly among Bangkok's middle class and intellectuals, turned to outrage two months ago after Thaksin's family sold its controlling interest in the Shin Corp. telecommunications empire to a Singapore investment company for $1.9 billion. Critics said Thaksin, already the country's wealthiest man, had improperly used his influence to enrich himself.

To calm the uproar, Thaksin has called snap elections for April. Meanwhile, even though the kingdom's electoral system remains healthy compared with most in Southeast Asia, its cultural and political divisions have plunged Thailand into crisis.

In the largely impoverished countryside, Thaksin's populist policies have brought him tremendous loyalty. But in Bangkok, the modern capital, many people expect more from democracy than elections. Thaksin's foes accuse him of progressively undermining the parliament, mass media and other checks on his power.

Opposition parties, deeming elections a losing proposition, have announced a boycott of the vote. At the same time, the anti-Thaksin protests have gained momentum since the prime minister's onetime mentor, Chamlong Srimuang, moved to the forefront.

"In this country, we expect ethics from our prime minister," the ascetic former general said during a recent rally. Chamlong introduced Thaksin to politics after leading a 1992 popular uprising against military rule. Now he heads the Dharma Army, associated with a Buddhist splinter group, and dresses in simple blue garments.

Thaksin insists that Thailand's constitution lays out a clear solution in the form of a popular vote. His aides, while clearly taken aback by the extent of the uprising, blame it on old-time politicians and public employees embittered by government reforms.

"The opposition should come back and play the game and join the election. You have to accept the rules," said Suranand Vejjajiva, a minister in Thaksin's cabinet.A Falling-Out

For years, Thaksin has been accustomed to scripting his own dramas. In the fall of 2003, Thailand hosted the presidents of the United States, Russia and China at the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit in Bangkok, and Thaksin welcomed them in grand style.

As dignitaries from 21 countries watched, a nighttime procession of 50 royal barges floated down the Chao Phraya River, rowed by 2,000 oarsmen. Across the river rose the illuminated facade of the Grand Palace and its glittering temples. Monks chanted, and hundreds of lanterns drifted skyward.

"All the world's leaders were captivated by Thai history and by the Thai leader," said Thitinan Pongsudhirak, a political analyst at Chulalongkorn University. "Thaksin was sky-high. He was untouchable at home and seen as bold and credible abroad."

Thailand's economy was among the fastest-growing in Asia, and Thaksin declared that the country would be a benefactor to its poorer neighbors in Indochina. By the end of 2003, President Bush had officially recognized Thailand as a major non-NATO ally. But within months, cracks appeared. A Muslim insurrection in southern Thailand erupted, and the government seemed at a loss how to respond.

Thaksin's deftness after the December 2004 tsunami led to his decisive reelection, but grievances continued to mount. Detractors criticized the military's brutal response to the insurgency and official efforts to muzzle the news media.

Still, it took a falling-out between Thaksin and a former business associate, the media mogul Sondhi Limthongkul, to bring people into the street.

"The irony is I used to support him," recalled the tall, bespectacled Sondhi. "I naively trusted him when he told me, 'I'm rich and wealthy and want to do something for the country.' But he does everything for himself, his family and his cronies."

Sondhi hosted a talk show on state-owned television and had used it as a platform to defend Thaksin. But last fall, he criticized Thaksin's business dealings during a broadcast. The show was canceled, so Sondhi took his critique to the streets, staging rallies that drew hundreds, then thousands, of people.

The sale of Shin Corp. to Temasek Holdings of Singapore fueled the nascent movement. Critics alleged that Thaksin had pushed through a change in foreign ownership laws, that his family had avoided paying taxes on the transaction and that the sale betrayed his credentials as an economic nationalist.

"It went against everything Thaksin stood for," said Thitinan, the political analyst.

The prime minister said the sale was legal and motivated by his desire to eliminate any conflict of interest in retaining the business.

"When the prime minister sold his shares, people didn't understand it was a private matter," said Suranand, the cabinet minister. "We were quite off-message at first."Rural Loyalty

In the Thai heartland, Thaksin's performance is seen through an entirely different prism. In late January, eager to display his popularity, the prime minister spent five days in the poor northeastern province of Roi Et, instructing television cameramen to follow as he counseled villagers, drove a tractor and camped in an army tent.

In advance of his arrival in Nonsomboon village, authorities cleared away debris and repaired the dirt road. Local women were paid to cook a repast of prawns, fish and straw-baked chicken. Though the scene was partly contrived, the villagers' affection for Thaksin seemed genuine.

Thaksin had long targeted rural voters with his policies. Among them are a health program that provides medical care for 75 cents and a revolving fund offering small loans.

"I like his good heart," said Orn Pancharee, 67, as she and her sister sat outside their stilted wooden house, their faces deeply etched from years of rice farming.

"Because of him, if I go to the doctor, I don't have to pay much," said Orn's sister, Thongsai Yothanan, 73. "Since Thaksin became prime minister, we get compensated for damages when our rice paddies flood. Before him, never."

The sisters said they had heard little about the Shin Corp. sale and understood even less.

"For us, it's not important," Thongsai said as chickens pecked in the dirt nearby. "I watched the television news, and I feel pity for him."

Orn nodded in agreement.

"Previous prime ministers never visited the countryside," she said. "He's the best because he cares about the poor."

Ethiopia Gripped By Fear Of Regime (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, March 21, 2006

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia -- A climate bordering on fear has taken hold of the Ethiopian capital as journalists, lawyers and politicians carefully measure their public remarks and contacts in the face of widespread arrests and prosecutions.

"Oh, no, that would not be wise," said a law professor when asked if a reporter could observe a class where students were to discuss the ongoing trial of 131 opposition leaders, publishers, journalists and human rights activists. Despite boasting about the openness of debate in his class, the professor declined to give his name.

DOJ_NMG_0019825

Tens of thousands more have been arrested on a variety of charges, according to Amnesty International, most of these stemming from violent political demonstrations in November. Advocates say it is impossible to know how many are still being held.

Human Rights Watch offers anecdotal reports of farmers denied fertilizer and seed because of their political affiliations, nighttime sweeps by federal police and beatings at checkpoints.

Most independent newspapers have been shut down. The few remaining news outlets carefully tailor their coverage to not run afoul of stringent government censorship. The longtime Associated Press correspondent was expelled last month. And visas are rarely issued to human rights advocates or investigators.

In its annual human rights survey this month, the State Department reported a sharp increase in civil rights violations by the Ethiopian government during 2005.

"We can say we've regressed since the May elections; there is no independent voice in Ethiopia right now," said Yoseph Badwaza, chief of the monitoring division of the Ethiopian Human Rights Council, which lost three senior investigators when warrants were issued for their arrest.

He said critics of the government are subject to intimidation, and many are arrested without charges, denied access to lawyers or contact with their families, and tried by judges who are "not independent."

"This is a dictatorship in the guise of democracy," Mr. Badwaza said. "The recent crackdown is not the first of its kind, but we've never witnessed such widespread punishment and retribution."

The turning point was the November general strike, called by frustrated members of the Coalition for Unity and Democracy (CUD), an opposition umbrella group.

The CUD and other opposition parties had captured an unprecedented 220 seats in the 547-member Parliament, up from 12 seats previously, but felt cheated out of an absolute majority despite the finding of international observer groups that the election was generally fair.

Politicians advocated peaceful resistance, but protest demonstrations in June led to 36 deaths and another 46 were killed in the three days of protests in November, including seven policemen and soldiers. More than 100 were injured.

In an interview with The Washington Times last month, Prime Minister Meles Zenawi defended the use of force, but said a government inquiry would release its findings, possibly in April.

The Bush administration has carefully modulated its criticism of Addis Ababa, reluctant to alienate a strategically located country of more than 60 million people that is an avowed ally in the war on terrorism. That has frustrated some European diplomats and many Ethiopians, who had hoped for a more outspoken response.

"The last year or so has been one of promise and disappointment," said a U.S. diplomat in Addis Ababa, acknowledging that the government "has been operating more or less as a one-party state."

Mr. Meles came to power with the military defeat of Mengistu Haile Mariam's communist administration in 1991. His backing comes mainly from the Tigreans, an ethnic group in northern Ethiopia that allied itself with the Eritreans' decades-long struggle that ended with independence for Eritrea.

The opposition is centered on the nation's Amhara ethnic group, who have traditionally ruled Ethiopia; they are supported in the south by the Oromos, long oppressed by successive Ethiopian regimes.

Mr. Meles took office with promises to rebuild a shattered economy and transform the country into a model of democracy.

His government has made strides, especially by the yardstick of eastern Africa: International observers gave the May elections high marks for the quality of open debate between the parties, and the apparent lack of coercion at the polls.

But while the opposition parties have become a much larger bloc in the parliament, they say the rules of procedure have changed to make it harder for them to air their issues.

Beyene Petros, chairman of the United Ethiopian Democratic Forces party, says the ruling party has silenced them with a rule change that requires 51 percent agreement to introduce any issue. "And when we do have a question period, they cut it off after maybe 15 minutes," he said in an interview.

DOJ_NMG_0019826

Politicians aligned with the CUD also say they cannot work effectively, with their offices shuttered and party leaders under arrest. Jailed CUD candidates include the mayor-elect of Addis Ababa, a former prosecutor in the U.N. tribunal for Rwanda and a former high court judge.

Extraditing Charles Taylor (NYT)

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

Last week, Liberia's new president, Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, called for Nigeria to extradite the former president and warlord Charles Taylor to face war crimes charges. Mr. Taylor, who has been living in a Nigerian government guesthouse since 2003, is wanted on a range of charges relating to his decade-long West African rampage, which unleashed campaigns of torture, rape and dismemberment in Ivory Coast and Sierra Leone and on his home turf, Liberia.

In a just world, Mr. Taylor would have already been tried, condemned and sent up the river.

But the world has never been just, and this case is complicated. When Mr. Taylor was under siege by rebel forces in 2003, the United States, Britain and Nigeria arranged for him to get asylum in Nigeria, under the correct assumption that his quick exile would reduce the bloodshed. Nigeria gave Mr. Taylor a safe harbor on the condition that he stop sending his minions out to rape, pillage and plunder.

A report last year gave some weight to the argument that Mr. Taylor hadn't stopped his bad ways. The Coalition for International Justice charges that Mr. Taylor tried to destabilize Liberia, influence last year's elections and build a regional army. Specifics are vague, but it is true that Mr. Taylor's ex-wife, Jewel, was elected to the Liberian legislature in the same elections that swept Ms. Johnson Sirleaf to power.

There's no law against Jewel Taylor's running for office. And it's tempting to think that it may be better just to let this sleeping dog lie. After all, Mr. Taylor still has many loyalists in Liberia with no qualms about taking to the streets again.

But Ms. Johnson Sirleaf is taking a courageous, very risky step. It is incumbent upon America and Europe, which say they support justice in West Africa, to make sure that she and the new Liberian government get the necessary security aid, including United Nations troops if necessary, to handle any pro-Taylor backlash.

For West Africans, who have endured more than a decade of war, there's no justice without peace.

TERRORISM NEWS:

FBI Agent Slams Bosses At Moussaoui Trial (AP-Y2)

By Michael J. Sniffen

AP2, March 20, 2006

The FBI agent who arrested Zacarias Moussaoui in August 2001 testified Monday he spent almost four weeks trying to warn U.S. officials about the radical Islamic student pilot but "criminal negligence" by superiors in Washington thwarted a chance to stop the 9/11 attacks.

FBI agent Harry Samit of Minneapolis originally testified as a government witness, on March 9, but his daylong cross examination by defense attorney Edward MacMahon was the strongest moment so far for the court-appointed lawyers defending Moussaoui. The 37-year-old Frenchman of Moroccan descent is the only person charged in this country in connection with al-Qaida's Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

MacMahon displayed a communication addressed to Samit and FBI headquarters agent Mike Maltbie from a bureau agent in Paris relaying word from French intelligence that Moussaoui was "very dangerous," had been indoctrinated in radical Islamic Fundamentalism at London's Finnsbury Park mosque, was "completely devoted" to a variety of radical fundamentalism that Osama bin Laden espoused, and had been to Afghanistan.

Based on what he already knew, Samit suspected that meant Moussaoui had been to training camps there, although the communication did not say that.

The communication arrived Aug. 30, 2001. The Sept. 11 Commission reported that British intelligence told U.S. officials on Sept 13, 2001, that Moussaoui had attended an al-Qaida training camp in Afghanistan. "Had this information been available in late August 2001, the Moussaoui case would almost certainly have received intense, high-level attention," the commission concluded.

But Samit told MacMahon he couldn't persuade FBI headquarters or the Justice Department to take his fears seriously. No one from Washington called Samit to say this intelligence altered the picture the agent had been painting since Aug. 18 in a running battle with Maltbie and Maltbie's boss, David Frasca, chief of the radical fundamentalist unit at headquarters.

They fought over Samit's desire for a warrant to search Moussaoui's computer and belongings. Maltbie and Frasca said Samit had not established a link between Moussaoui and terrorists.

Samit testified that on Aug. 22 he had learned from the French that Moussaoui had recruited someone to go to Chechnya in 2000 to fight with Islamic radicals under Emir Ibn al-Khattab. He said a CIA official told him on Aug. 22 or 23 that al-Khattab had fought alongside bin Laden in the past. This, too, failed to sway Maltbie or Frasca.

Under questioning from MacMahon, Samit acknowledged that he had told the Justice Department inspector general that "obstructionism, criminal negligence and careerism" on the part of FBI headquarters officials had prevented him from getting a warrant that would have revealed more about Moussaoui's associates. He said that opposition blocked "a serious opportunity to stop the 9/11 attacks."

The FBI's actions between Moussaoui's arrest, in Minnesota on immigration violations on Aug. 16, 2001, and Sept. 11, 2001, are crucial to his trial because prosecutors allege that Moussaoui's lies prevented the FBI from discovering the identities of 9/11 hijackers and the Federal Aviation Administration from taking airport security steps.

But MacMahon made clear the Moussaoui's lies never fooled Samit. The agent sent a memo to FBI headquarters on Aug. 18 accusing Moussaoui of plotting international terrorism and air piracy over the United States, two of the six crimes he pleaded guilty to in 2005.

To obtain a death penalty, prosecutors must prove that Moussaoui's actions led directly to the death of at least one person on 9/11.

Moussaoui pleaded guilty last April to conspiring with al-Qaida to fly planes into U.S. buildings. But he says he had nothing to do with 9/11 and was training to fly a 747 jetliner into the White House as part of a possible later attack.

Samit's complaints echoed those raised in 2002 by Coleen Rowley, the bureau's agent-lawyer in the Minneapolis office, who tried to help get a warrant. Rowley went public with her frustrations, was named a Time magazine person of the year for whistleblowing and is now running for Congress.

MacMahon walked Samit through e-mails and letters the agent sent seeking help from the FBI's London, Paris and Oklahoma City offices, FBI headquarters files, the CIA's counterterrorism center, the Secret Service, the Immigration and Naturalization Service, the Federal Aviation Administration, an intelligence agency not identified publicly by name in court (possibly the National Security Agency), and the FBI's Iran, Osama bin Laden, radical fundamentalist, and national security law units at headquarters.

Samit described useful information from French intelligence and the CIA before 9/11 but said he was not told that CIA Director George Tenet was briefed on the Moussaoui threat on Aug. 23 and never saw until after 9/11 a memo from an FBI agent in Phoenix about radical Islamists taking flight training there.

For each nugget of information, MacMahon asked Samit if Washington officials called to assess the implications. Time after time, Samit said no.

MacMahon introduced an Aug. 31 letter Samit drafted "to advise the FAA of a potential threat to security of commercial aircraft" from whomever Moussaoui was conspiring with.

But Maltbie barred him from sending it to FAA headquarters, saying he would handle that, Samit testified. The agent added that he did tell FAA officials in Minneapolis of his suspicions.

Agent Faults FBI On 9/11 (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 21, 2006

The man who caught Zacarias Moussaoui testifies that higher-ups blocked his efforts to determine whether there was a larger plot.

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — The FBI agent who arrested Zacarias Moussaoui weeks before Sept. 11 told a federal jury Monday that his own superiors were guilty of "criminal negligence and obstruction" for blocking his attempts to learn whether the terrorist was part of a larger cell about to hijack planes in the United States.

His testimony appeared to undermine the prosecution's case for the death penalty. Prosecutors argue that had Moussaoui cooperated by identifying some of the 19 hijackers, the FBI could have alerted airport security and kept them off the planes.

Moussaoui is the only person to have been convicted in the United States on charges stemming from Sept. 11. His sentencing trial began several weeks ago, but the prosecution's case was nearly gutted when it was learned that a lawyer for the Transportation Security Administration had improperly coached key aviation security witnesses. U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema decided to allow the government to present a limited amount of aviation testimony and evidence.

Samit's recollections Monday were the first ground-level account of how FBI agents in Minneapolis — where Moussaoui was arrested on a visa violation 3½ weeks before the attacks — were appalled that their Washington supervisors denied their requests for search warrants in the effort to find out why the Frenchman was taking flying lessons and what role he might have in a wider plan to attack America.

"They obstructed it," a still-frustrated Samit told the jury, calling his superiors' actions a calculated management decision "that cost us the opportunity to stop the attacks."

The government considers Samit's testimony essential to its case. On March 9, the agent told the court about his arrest of Moussaoui, now 37, and his desperate efforts to win the suspect's cooperation.

Yet much of his testimony Monday might have backfired on the government. The jury easily could have been left with the impression of an FBI so at odds with itself that it not only missed critical clues of an impending terrorist attack, but did not even know how best to coordinate efforts to stop it.

His suspicions were backed up by Coleen Rowley, then an FBI lawyer in Minneapolis, who in a May 2002 memo to FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III complained that Washington had blocked efforts to determine what Moussaoui was really doing. Rowley is not scheduled to testify during the sentencing phase.

Moussaoui pleaded guilty last year to being a part of the Sept. 11 conspiracy. His lawyers maintain that the government had plenty of leads in the summer of 2001 that a major terrorist action was afoot, even without Moussaoui's cooperation. They point to a memo by an FBI agent in Phoenix warning of Middle Eastern men taking flying lessons, and the fact that then-CIA Director George J. Tenet was apprised of Moussaoui's arrest.

Samit testified Monday that he never knew of the Phoenix memo or of Tenet's interest in the case. He also said he was kept in the dark about the Aug. 6, 2001, presidential daily briefing given to Bush during his vacation in Texas. That briefing, titled

"Bin Laden Determined to Strike in U.S.," noted "patterns of suspicious activity in this country consistent with preparations for hijackings or other types of attacks."

Defense lawyer Edward B. MacMahon Jr. also used his cross-examination of Samit to suggest that law enforcement officials never took such threats seriously then anyway.

Under MacMahon's daylong questioning, Samit said that officials at the FBI headquarters in Washington rejected a series of attempts to obtain a warrant to search Moussaoui's personal belongings.

Had the belongings been opened before Sept. 11, agents would have found numerous small knives, jumbo-jet pilot manuals, rosters of flight schools and other clues that might have helped them understand the Sept. 11 plot.

Samit wanted to seek a criminal search warrant, and later one from a special intelligence court. But officials at the FBI headquarters refused to let him, because they did not believe he had enough evidence to prove Moussaoui was anything but a wealthy man who had come to this country to follow his dream of becoming a pilot.

He said that as Washington kept telling him there was "no urgency and no threat," his FBI superiors sent him on "wild goose chases."

For a while, Samit said, they did not even believe Moussaoui was the same person whom French intelligence sources had identified as a Muslim extremist. Samit said that FBI headquarters wanted him and his fellow agents to spend days poring through Paris phone books to make sure they had the right Moussaoui.

Samit said that when he asked permission to place an Arabic-speaking federal officer as a plant inside Moussaoui's cell to find out what Moussaoui was up to, Washington said no.

And he said that when he prepared a lengthy memo about Moussaoui for Federal Aviation Administration officials, Washington deleted key sections, including a part connecting Moussaoui with Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden.

Samit said he was so frustrated and so convinced that attacks were imminent that he bypassed FBI officials in Washington and met with an FAA officer he knew in Minneapolis. But he said FAA agents never got back to him, and never asked to see a pair of small knives, similar to box cutters, that Samit had found in Moussaoui's pocket and in his car.

Samit further described how he took it upon himself to cable the Secret Service that the president's safety might be in jeopardy. He recounted in the cable how Moussaoui had told him he hoped to be able to one day fly a Boeing 747 from London's Heathrow Airport to New York, and how he also hoped to visit the White House one day.

Samit said he warned the Secret Service that those desires could spell disaster. "If he seizes an airplane from Heathrow to New York City," Samit alerted the Secret Service, "it will have the fuel on board to reach D.C."

Samit said he never heard back from the Secret Service either.

And yet, the agent said, he never officially complained to the FBI hierarchy.

"Street agents don't call headquarters and request that supervisors be removed from cases," he said. "I didn't agree with them, but they are in charge."

Samit said he once overheard Jones on the phone with headquarters, telling FBI superiors that Minneapolis was trying to keep Zacarias Moussaoui "from flying an airplane into the World Trade Center."

After the Sept. 11 attacks, Samit said he asked Jones about that conversation, and Jones said he had just made up the scenario as a hypothetical to try to get Washington moving. "He pulled it out of the air," Samit said. "It was a lucky guess."

F.B.I. Discounted Suspicions About Moussaoui, Agent Says (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va., March 20 — The F.B.I. agent who arrested and interrogated Zacarias Moussaoui just weeks before the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, told a jury today that his efforts to confirm his strong suspicions that Mr. Moussaoui was involved in a terrorist airline hijacking plot were thwarted by senior bureau officials in Washington who acted out of negligence and a need to protect their careers.

Harry Samit, under intense cross-examination by Mr. Moussaoui's chief court-appointed lawyer, detailed his frustration over the days before the hijacking as he made numerous requests to look into what Mr. Moussaoui had been up to at the time of his arrest. Mr. Moussaoui was arrested on immigration violations in Minnesota, where he was learning to fly a jetliner.

"I accused the people in F.B.I. headquarters of criminal negligence" in an interview after Sept. 11, Mr. Samit acknowledged under questioning by Edward B. MacMahon Jr. He said that the senior agents in Washington "took a calculated risk not to advance the investigation" by refusing to seek search warrants for Mr. Moussaoui's belongings and computer. "The wager was a national tragedy," Mr. Samit testified.

Mr. Samit said that two senior agents declined to provide help in getting a search warrant, either through a special panel of judges that considers applications for foreign intelligence cases or through a normal application to any federal court for a criminal investigation.

As a field agent in Minnesota, he said he required help and approval from headquarters to continue his investigation. He acknowledged that he had written that Michael Maltbie, an agent in the F.B.I.'s radical fundamentalist unit, told him that applications for the special intelligence court warrants had proved troublesome for the bureau and seeking one "was just the kind of thing that would get F.B.I. agents in trouble." He wrote that Mr. Maltbie had told him that "he was not about to let that happen to him." During that period, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court, had complained about improper applications from the bureau.

Mr. Samit also acknowledged that he had written that David Frasca, a supervisor of the radical fundamentalist unit, had similarly blocked him from seeking a search warrant under the more common route in a criminal investigation. Some of the special court's complaints dealt with the idea that law-enforcement officials were sometimes using the lower standard required for warrants in intelligence investigations and then using the information they obtained in criminal cases.

Mr. Frasca, Mr. Samit explained, believed that once the Moussaoui investigation was opened as an intelligence investigation, it would arouse suspicion that agents had been trying to exploit the intelligence law to get information for an investigation they now believed was a criminal one.

(An F.B.I. spokesman, Bill Carter, said the agency did not comment on pending trials or litigation.)

The distinction between the two standards for obtaining warrants has since been eliminated following the Sept. 11 attacks.

The government is trying to prove to a jury that Mr. Moussaoui should be executed because he bears some responsibility for the deaths from Sept. 11. Prosecutors have argued that if Mr. Moussaoui had told Mr. Samit and other investigators what he knew about Al Qaeda plots to fly planes into buildings, the attacks might have been foiled.

Although Mr. Samit was a government witness who sought to bolster the government's case that he could have uncovered the plot had Mr. Moussaoui spoken to him truthfully, his responses to Mr. MacMahon today appeared to provide a lift for the defense. Mr. MacMahon sought to show that the problem was not with Mr. Moussaoui but with senior F.B.I. officials in Washington who would not budge no matter how hard Mr. Samit pressed them.

The F.B.I.'s handling of clues to the impending Sept. 11 attacks was sharply criticized in a report by the Justice Department's inspector general's office in 2004. Citing a memo from a Phoenix agent who had become suspicious of several students taking flying lessons in Arizona, the report said the agent's memo did not get the timely attention it deserved, not so much because of individual lapses within the F.B.I. but because of "critical systemic failings" that kept information from being effectively evaluated and shared.

The slow and incomplete attention given the memo from Phoenix was illustrative of a system "in which important information could easily 'fall through the cracks' and not be brought to the attention of the people who needed it, the inspector general's office concluded.

FBI Was Warned About Moussaoui (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Timothy Dwyer

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

An FBI agent who interrogated Zacarias Moussaoui before Sept. 11, 2001, warned his supervisors more than 70 times that Moussaoui was a terrorist and spelled out his suspicions that the al-Qaeda operative was plotting to hijack an airplane, according to federal court testimony yesterday.

Agent Harry Samit told jurors at Moussaoui's death penalty trial that his efforts to secure a warrant to search Moussaoui's belongings were frustrated at every turn by FBI officials he accused of "criminal negligence." Samit said he had sought help from a colleague, writing that he was "so desperate to get into Moussaoui's computer I'll take anything."

That was on Sept. 10, 2001.

Samit's testimony added striking detail to the voluminous public record on the FBI's bungling of the Moussaoui case. It also could help Moussaoui's defense. Samit is a prosecution witness who had earlier backed the government's central theory of the case: that the FBI would have raised "alarm bells" and could have stopped the Sept. 11 attacks if Moussaoui had not lied to agents. But under cross-examination by the defense yesterday, Samit said that he did raise those alarms -- repeatedly -- but that his bosses impeded his efforts.

The testimony came as the sentencing hearing resumed for the only person convicted in the United States of charges stemming from the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. Jurors in Alexandria will determine whether Moussaoui should live or die. The proceeding was derailed last week by the misconduct of government attorney Carla J. Martin, who improperly shared testimony with upcoming witnesses and coached them.

An angry U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema halted the hearing for a week. She barred the testimony of the witnesses Martin had contacted and all aviation evidence, gutting the government's case. But after prosecutors offered a compromise, Brinkema issued a revised order Friday saying they could use new aviation witnesses not tainted by Martin's conduct.

Brinkema began the day yesterday by welcoming jurors back to court and quizzing them about whether they had seen or read any of the extensive media coverage, which she had barred them from doing. When they shook their heads no in unison, the judge said, "You've been wonderful."

Nowhere to be seen was Martin, the Transportation Security Administration lawyer whom Brinkema has blamed for the disruption. She could face contempt of court or other criminal charges, and Moussaoui's attorneys had urged her to explain her actions at a special hearing yesterday. That hearing was never convened, and Brinkema did not mention it. Martin's attorney has said she would not testify.

Paul Bresson, an FBI spokesman, declined to comment on the testimony from Samit, who remains an agent in the FBI's Minneapolis office. The primary supervisor Samit accused of impeding his investigation, Michael Maltbie, said in a phone interview yesterday that the issues raised in court "have been looked at extensively by Congress, the Justice Department, my own people."

"The [FBI] director has given me a chance to respond to some of these issues that have come up," said Maltbie, a former counterterrorism supervisor at headquarters in Washington and now a supervisory special agent in Cleveland.

Moussaoui, 37, pleaded guilty in April to conspiring with al-Qaeda in the Sept. 11 attacks. He was sitting in jail on that day of terror because of his arrest a month earlier after his activities raised suspicion at a Minnesota flight school.

The FBI's missteps have been examined in depth by congressional investigators and the independent commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks.

Yesterday, as jurors watched images of FBI documents flashing on TV screens, defense attorney Edward B. MacMahon Jr. walked Samit through a recital of government mistakes, framing nearly every question with the words: "You wanted people in Washington to know that . . . right?"

MacMahon zeroed in on increasingly urgent warnings Samit issued to his FBI supervisors after he interviewed Moussaoui at a Minnesota jail in mid-August 2001. Moussaoui had raised Samit's suspicions because he was training on a 747 simulator with limited flying experience and could not explain his foreign sources of income.

By Aug. 18, 2001, Samit was telling FBI headquarters that he believed Moussaoui intended to hijack a plane "for the purpose of seizing control of the aircraft." A few days later, he learned from FBI agents in France that Moussaoui had been a recruiter for a Muslim group in Chechnya linked to Osama bin Laden.

But when Samit tried to use the French intelligence in his draft application for a Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act warrant to search Moussaoui's belongings, he said, Maltbie edited out the connection with bin Laden because it did not show that a foreign government was involved.

"How are you supposed to establish a connection with a foreign power if it's deleted from the document?" MacMahon asked.

"Well, sir, you can't," Samit replied.

Samit said he also sent an e-mail to the FBI's bin Laden unit but did not receive a response before Sept. 11, 2001. By late August, the agent had concluded that Maltbie and other FBI officials were no longer interested in investigating Moussaoui. Samit acknowledged that he told the Justice Department's inspector general's office that his supervisors engaged in "criminal negligence" and were trying to "run out the clock" because they wanted to deport Moussaoui rather than prosecute him.

Most portions of the inspector general's report dealing with Moussaoui have never been made public.

"You thought a terrorist attack was coming, and you were being obstructed, right?" MacMahon asked.

"Yes, sir," Samit answered.

Samit said he kept trying to persuade his bosses to authorize the surveillance warrant or a criminal search warrant right up until the day before the planes hit the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

"You never stopped trying, did you?" MacMahon said.

"No, sir," Samit replied.

Agent Warned FBI About Moussaoui, Hijack Plan (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, March 21, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va.—The FBI agent who arrested confessed al-Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui testified Monday that three weeks before the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the agent warned his supervisors that Moussaoui likely was part of a plot to take over a commercial jet using small knives to subdue the crew.

The testimony by Special Agent Harry Samit in Moussaoui's sentencing trial shed new light on how the U.S. government failed to seize upon a range of clues that suggested the 9/11 plot was unfolding.

Samit said Monday that he wrote at least 70 pages of memos during the three weeks before the attacks expressing concern that Moussaoui was involved in a hijacking plot, but the Minnesota-based agent said his superiors never acted on the repeated warnings.

Samit's warnings included an Aug. 18, 2001, memo in which he unsuccessfully sought permission from FBI headquarters to search the belongings of Moussaoui, a French citizen who had been arrested on immigration charges.

The agent's warnings proved to be a forecast of the Sept. 11 attacks, in which 19 suicide hijackers used box cutters and utility knives to take over four jets in attacks that killed nearly 3,000 people in New York City and Shanksville, Pa., and at the Pentagon.

Samit's testimony is key in Moussaoui's trial, which is being held to determine whether the al-Qaeda operative — who has pleaded guilty to terrorism conspiracy — should be executed or receive a life sentence. The U.S. government says that the Sept. 11 attacks could have been prevented if Moussaoui had warned agents about the plot, and that he should be executed because he didn't.

Moussaoui claims he was part of another plot and didn't know about the one for 9/11. Samit's testimony appeared to support the defense's contention that authorities had many clues about a possible hijacking plot and failed to act on them.

Samit testified that before the attacks, FBI officials in Washington refused to support his search requests despite Samit's increasingly “desperate” attempts to learn more about Moussaoui, who had raised suspicions among his instructors while training as a flight student.

“God help us all if the next terrorist incident involves this kind of plan,” an investigative associate identified in court only as “Cathy” wrote a frustrated Samit on the day before the attacks.

Samit's FBI superiors at the time did not believe he had enough evidence to support a warrant for either a criminal or intelligence investigation. Since then, the USA Patriot Act has made it easier for federal authorities to obtain such warrants in terrorism investigations.

Samit's testimony marked the resumption of Moussaoui's trial, which U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema had suspended for nearly a week after learning that a government lawyer had violated court rules by leaking court transcripts to help coach upcoming government witnesses.

Brinkema responded by ruling that prosecutors could not present evidence that aviation authorities could have helped avert the 9/11 attacks if Moussaoui had told agents about the plot. The judge later amended her ruling to allow aviation witnesses who were not tainted by the actions of government lawyer Carla Martin.

'Criminal negligence' by superiors foiled chance to thwart 9/11, he says

ALEXANDRIA, Va. – The FBI agent who arrested Zacarias Moussaoui in August 2001 testified Monday that he spent almost four weeks trying to warn U.S. officials about the radical Islamic student pilot but that "criminal negligence" by superiors in Washington thwarted a chance to stop the 9/11 attacks.

FBI Agent Harry Samit of Minneapolis originally testified as a government witness on March 9, but his daylong cross examination by defense attorney Edward MacMahon was the strongest moment yet for the court-appointed lawyers defending Mr. Moussaoui. The Frenchman of Moroccan descent is the only person charged in this country in connection with al-Qaeda's Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

Mr. MacMahon displayed a communication addressed to Agent Samit and FBI headquarters Agent Mike Maltbie from a bureau agent in Paris relaying word from French intelligence that Mr. Moussaoui, 37, was "very dangerous," had been indoctrinated in radical Islamic fundamentalism at London's Finsbury Park mosque, was "completely devoted" to a variety of radical fundamentalism that Osama bin Laden espoused, and had been to Afghanistan.

The communication arrived Aug. 30, 2001. The Sept. 11 commission reported that British intelligence told U.S. officials on Sept. 13, 2001, that Mr. Moussaoui had attended an al-Qaeda camp in Afghanistan. "Had this information been available in late August 2001, the Moussaoui case would almost certainly have received intense, high-level attention," the commission concluded.

But Agent Samit told Mr. MacMahon he couldn't persuade FBI headquarters or the Justice Department to take his fears seriously. No one from Washington called Agent Samit to say this intelligence altered the picture the agent had been painting since Aug. 18 in a running battle with Agent Maltbie and Agent Maltbie's boss, David Frasca, chief of the radical fundamentalist unit at headquarters.

They fought over Agent Samit's desire for a warrant to search Mr. Moussaoui's computer and belongings.

Agent Maltbie and Agent Frasca said Agent Samit had not established a link between Mr. Moussaoui and terrorists.

Agent Samit testified that on Aug. 22 he had learned from the French that Mr. Moussaoui had recruited someone to go to Chechnya in 2000 to fight with Islamic radicals under Emir Ibn al-Khattab. He said a CIA official told him on Aug. 22 or 23 that Mr. al-Khattab had fought alongside Mr. bin Laden. This, too, failed to sway Agent Maltbie or Agent Frasca.

Under questioning from Mr. MacMahon, Agent Samit acknowledged that he had told the Justice Department inspector general that "obstructionism, criminal negligence and careerism" on the part of FBI officials had prevented him from getting a warrant that would have revealed more about Mr. Moussaoui's associates.

He said that opposition blocked "a serious opportunity to stop the 9/11 attacks."

To obtain a death penalty, prosecutors must prove that Mr. Moussaoui's actions led directly to the death of at least one person on 9/11. He pleaded guilty last April to conspiring with al-Qaeda to fly planes into U.S. buildings. But he says he had nothing to do with 9/11 and was training to fly a 747 jetliner into the White House as part of a possible later attack.

FBI investigator who arrested Moussaoui says he wrote some 70 memos about possible threat

ALEXANDRIA, Va. -- The FBI agent who arrested Zacarias Moussaoui testified yesterday that Moussaoui's pose as a flight student never fooled him, but said he was blocked from pursuing his suspicions of a terrorist hijacking plot by supervisors he characterized as "criminally negligent" careerists.

As Moussaoui's death-penalty sentencing trial resumed here after a week's delay to investigate witness tampering by government lawyer Carla Martin, Minnesota Special Agent Harry Samit said on cross-examination that he wrote FBI headquarters about 70 memos about Moussaoui's likely terrorist plans between his arrest on Aug. 16 and Sept. 11, all to no avail.

Prosecutors are trying to show that Moussaoui should get the death penalty because his lies prevented agents from thwarting the Sept. 11 attacks, while Moussaoui says he knew no details of the plot. Defense lawyer Edward MacMahon spent his five-hour cross-examination trying to show that the FBI's failure to act on Samit's instincts was to blame.

"Your investigation here was to uncover the facts that Moussaoui was in fact a terrorist ... and you uncovered those facts didn't you?" MacMahon asked. "I uncovered enough facts to generate suspicion in my mind that he was a terrorist," Samit said, "But that's a far distance from being able to prove it."

Moussaoui, 37, a French-Moroccan, was arrested after his behavior at a Minnesota flight school aroused suspicion. He pleaded guilty a year ago to being part of a broad al-Qaida hijacking conspiracy, but not the Sept. 11 plot. Samit's testimony yesterday was the most detailed public recounting of how Washington supervisors thwarted the field office's efforts to find out more about him in 2001.

Samit said that Moussaoui's evasiveness, flight training, and fundamentalist beliefs made him look like a terrorist suspect. But supervisors felt they couldn't get an intelligence warrant to search his belongings, and thought it would be legally risky to seek a traditional criminal warrant after starting an intelligence investigation.

Michael Maltbie, the supervisor handling the case at the FBI's Radical Fundamentalist Unit, told Samit that getting an intelligence warrant could be bad for an agent's career if it was fouled up, Samit testified. He said Maltbie told him he wanted to "preserve the existence of his advancement potential" in the FBI.

By the end of August, there was more evidence. French intelligence had learned that Moussaoui had been to Afghanistan and had recruited jihadists. But Maltbie wasn't sure it was the same Moussaoui, and demanded that FBI agents overseas search the French white pages for other Zacarias Moussaouis.

Samit acknowledged that he had accused Maltbie and other supervisors of taking a "calculated risk" with 3,000 lives to protect their careers in testimony to the Justice Department. Maltbie now heads the Joint Terrorism Task Force in the Cleveland FBI office.

Witness Flap Casts Doubt On Call For Death In Moussaoui Case (LAW)

By Sarah Kelley And Jason Mclure, Legal Times

DOJ_NMG_0019837

Legal Times, March 21, 2006

This was the government's first, and likely only, chance to prosecute a suspect in the Sept. 11 plot in a U.S. court. And from the start, doing so would present a monumental challenge to federal prosecutors. With the world watching, the pressure would be enormous.

Pursuing a death sentence meant raising the stakes in what already was considered the highest-profile criminal case ever in the United States. For the team of three federal prosecutors it meant facing an unprecedented task: convincing a jury that Moussaoui should be executed even though -- by their own admission -- he wasn't directly involved in the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

"I think they have had a difficult hand dealt," says Larry Mackey, a former prosecutor who played a lead role in the trials of Oklahoma City bombers Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols.

The government's decision to seek death was scrutinized from the outset and continued to be so even after Moussaoui pleaded guilty, in April 2005, to participating in a conspiracy to commit acts of terrorism in the United States. But last week it became clear just how precarious the argument for death was. The government's case was in jeopardy of crumbling midway through the penalty phase of the trial after Transportation Security Administration lawyer Carla Martin allegedly tampered with government witnesses.

Martin, a veteran government lawyer who served as the prosecution team's liaison to a number of key witnesses from the Federal Aviation Administration, is accused of coaching witnesses on their testimony and giving them transcripts of the trial -- a direct violation of an order by U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema.

If the blunder results in Moussaoui being sentenced to life in prison rather than death, a large dose of the blame will fall on Martin but also -- fairly or unfairly -- on federal prosecutors Robert Spencer, David Novak and David Raskin.

For the question remains, if the witnesses Martin dealt with were so critical to the case, why did prosecutors allow her to operate with little oversight? And if the government's case for death was so convincing, how could her conduct completely blow it apart?

The three Assistant U.S. Attorneys have spent thousands of hours managing the case, and though they took pains to distance themselves from Martin last week, the prosecution clearly worked closely with her. Her name appears on at least one government filing in the case.

"At the end of the day all responsibility rests at their doorstep," says Mackey of the trial lawyers. "Having said that, they must be tearing their hair out that another government lawyer could do this."

DECISION FOR DEATH

The fact that Martin's missteps could unhinge a case that was years in the making is telling. Many believe the case was weak from the start. It's possible the prosecutors didn't agree with the decision to seek death in the first place.

"These are political decisions," says John Zwerling, a criminal defense attorney in Alexandria, Va. "The shots are being called at the very highest level of our government -- the president, the vice president, and the attorney general. The prosecutors have to march to their orders, and whether or not they believe in it is irrelevant."

In March 2002, three months after Moussaoui's indictment on terrorism charges and just six months after the attacks, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft signed off on the decision to seek the death penalty, reaffirming a commitment to "carrying out justice."

At the time, Moussaoui's possible connection to the attacks was still unclear, though he was repeatedly referred to in news articles and government statements as the alleged 20th hijacker. Having been arrested on immigration charges in August 2001, Moussaoui was sitting in a jail cell when terrorists carried out the deadliest terror attack ever in the United States.

Moussaoui, who has repeatedly proclaimed his allegiance to Osama bin Laden, denies any involvement in Sept. 11. Instead, Moussaoui claims he was to take part in a second wave of terror attacks by crashing a plane into the White House.

As the case progressed, the government's argument for death emerged: Had Moussaoui divulged his knowledge of the attacks, the government could have thwarted the plot, saving thousands of innocent victims.

Despite the obvious legal hurdles, many Americans supported the decision, believing Moussaoui should die for his close ties to the Sept. 11 conspiracy. But some objected, claiming the move was politically motivated -- a way for the Bush administration to hold someone accountable for the attacks. Others said it was an effort to avenge the victims on behalf of their families, and, indeed, the Moussaoui penalty phase has often been referred to as the families' "day in court."

Now, more than four years later, the debate continues over whether the government overstated its case against Moussaoui to justify seeking death. Once he pleaded guilty, if the government had simply signed off on sending him to prison for life, the current trial in Virginia would not have been necessary. And in the minds of some, life in prison would avoid making him a martyr.

Neal Sonnett, a former Criminal Division chief for the U.S. Attorney's Office in the Southern District of Florida, believes the case for a death sentence is weak.

"Had everything gone perfectly, the burden that the prosecution has to meet to get the death penalty is a very strong burden, and it was unlikely that they were going to meet it here," says Sonnett, now a white-collar criminal defense attorney based in Miami.

ASSEMBLING A TEAM

Before the Sept. 11 attacks, the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of New York in Manhattan had handled nearly every major terrorism trial of the modern era -- from the 1993 World Trade Center bombing to the American embassy bombings in East Africa. But after the attacks, the Justice Department decided to make the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Eastern District of Virginia the hub of terrorism prosecutions.

There were several reasons for the choice. Virginia juries had a reputation for being sympathetic to prosecutors, the federal court in Alexandria was known for quickly moving cases through its "rocket docket," and Alexandria lay just across the Potomac from Washington -- where prosecutors would have easy access to their colleagues at Main Justice and the myriad federal agencies that would become involved in any trial. There also was a sentiment that the federal courthouse in Manhattan, which sits just blocks from the World Trade Center site, would not be an easy venue in which to hold a fair trial.

"There was the usual competition for cases, and somebody has to win and somebody has to lose," says Andrew McCarthy, a former terrorism prosecutor in the Southern District of New York. "The thing you have to remember ... at the time those decisions had to be made, there were other things going on that were a lot more important than the usual turf fighting that we had in the 1990s."

Moussaoui's December 2001 indictment was signed by three officials representing each DOJ arm involved. There was Paul McNulty, the Eastern District of Virginia's new and politically connected Republican U.S. Attorney (who has since been nominated to the DOJ's No. 2 spot); Mary Jo White, the outgoing Clinton-era U.S. Attorney in New York whose office had overseen the first World Trade Center bombing and East African embassy bombings; and Michael Chertoff, the head of the Criminal Division at Main Justice in Washington and a former U.S. Attorney in New Jersey.

McNulty has appeared in the courtroom at key stages of the case and from the start saw the trial as an opportunity to prove that the federal court system could effectively handle terrorism cases. He was alongside the prosecution when Moussaoui pleaded guilty, and again last week when the judge chastised the government for making egregious errors in the case. But observers say that McNulty has served more as a liaison to Main Justice in the matter, rather than as a day-to-day manager. A spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office declined to comment.

The line prosecutors ultimately chosen for the trial team reflected the division of labor between the two U.S. Attorney's offices. Two of the federal prosecutors on the team would come from Virginia, and one from New York.

Leading the prosecution is Robert Spencer, chief of the Eastern District's Criminal Division. Spencer joined the federal prosecutor's office in Alexandria in 1995 as an Assistant U.S. Attorney, handling high-profile murder and violent gang cases. Spencer presented the government's opening argument on day one of Moussaoui's trial.

One former colleague says that Spencer is "among the most ethical and persuasive assistant U.S. attorneys in the nation."

Spencer has prosecuted a number of other terrorism cases, including that of Ahmed Omar Abu Ali, an American college student convicted last year of conspiring with al Qaeda and plotting to kill President George W. Bush. He also played a role in prosecuting the "Virginia Jihad Network," which resulted in numerous convictions and guilty pleas from Islamic extremists living throughout the Washington metropolitan region who underwent training to join the Taliban.

The second prosecutor from Virginia is David Novak, considered a specialist at the Justice Department in death penalty cases. Throughout much of the case, Novak personally has interviewed many of the victims' family members. Last week it was a visibly shaken Novak who stood for the prosecution in court to explain how Martin had violated the judge's order on witnesses.

Novak himself is no stranger to ethics issues. In 1993, while he was working as a federal prosecutor in Texas, a defense attorney for Rogelio Rodriguez, an alleged Mexican money launderer, filed a formal complaint with Justice's Office of Professional Responsibility charging Novak with a number of ethical breaches during trial. The defense attorney, Kent Schaffer, a Houston solo practitioner, accused Novak of misrepresenting Rodriguez's statements to an undercover agent about a planned trip. He also charged that Novak lied to the judge about Rodriguez's desire to cooperate with the government, in an effort to meet with the defendant without his lawyer present.

Novak was exonerated in the investigation, according to Schaffer, who last week called the OPR's decision in the matter a whitewash. Rodriguez was later acquitted of the charges. Novak declined to comment for this article.

OPR investigations are generally kept confidential, but this one entered the public domain when Novak filed a libel suit against Schaffer in 1995, calling Schaffer's letter "defamatory." Novak would also file a second libel suit that year, against a defense witness in another Texas money-laundering case who had written to then-Attorney General Janet Reno to accuse

Novak of "misplaced vindictiveness" in his prosecution of defendant Antonio Giraldi. Both suits were dismissed within months of each other, in the spring of 1995.

The New York U.S. Attorney's Office was initially represented on the trial team by Kenneth Karas, a Southern District terrorism veteran who had taken a lead role in the prosecution of the embassy bombings case. But in 2003, Karas was nominated to a seat on the federal bench in New York. He was replaced on the team by David Raskin, an up-and-coming prosecutor who had joined the Southern District in 1999 and quickly earned a spot in its elite organized crime and counterterror unit.

An avid amateur baseball player and former catcher on his college team at Ithaca, N.Y., Raskin was known for pulling long hours and had been part of the prosecution team that took down 70 members of the Genovese crime family in New York. Those who worked with Raskin praise him for his judgment and dedication to his job. "Often in the Southern District you'll get some fairly cerebral types," says David Burns, a former Southern District prosecutor who worked with Raskin. "Dave is one of those former-athlete types."

Throughout the Moussaoui case, Raskin has written a number of the briefs filed and presented key arguments along the way.

WHO TO BLAME?

Seeking the death penalty for Moussaoui has been an uphill battle from the start. Early on in the case, Brinkema took capital punishment off the table, but the prosecution fought the decision, and the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals agreed to restore execution as an option.

With the help of hundreds of government lawyers from various federal agencies, the prosecution team interviewed thousands of witnesses and sorted through more than 1 million documents to build the case against Moussaoui.

Then, last week, the prosecution was dealt a blow that threatened to derail the entire case.

Citing the misconduct of the TSA's Martin, Brinkema sanctioned the government by excluding from trial key witnesses and all aviation evidence, which the prosecution acknowledged is the bulk of their case. In a March 14 conference call with the judge, Spencer said without that evidence, "we don't know whether it's worth proceeding at all."

Prosecutors filed a motion asking the judge to reconsider, and on Friday, Brinkema agreed to a compromise. The judge upheld the decision to bar all witnesses and aviation-related evidence with which Martin was involved. But she agreed to allow the government to call aviation witnesses "not tainted by Ms. Martin." The trial is scheduled to resume March 20, and the defense has requested a hearing to further investigate Martin's conduct.

As the prosecution scrambled to salvage its case, the finger-pointing and posturing had already begun.

Last week, the TSA was referring media calls about Martin's violation to Main Justice. Justice, in turn, was referring calls to the Eastern District of Virginia.

For now, the prosecution team is pinning the blame squarely on Martin, whose misconduct shut out the government's key witnesses and crucial evidence.

"In this sea of government attorneys and agents who have assiduously played by the rules, Ms. Martin stands as the lone miscreant," the prosecution wrote in court papers filed last week. Last week, Brinkema informed Martin she could face civil or criminal contempt charges. She also has been placed on administrative leave at the TSA.

But portraying Martin as a clueless, rogue lawyer from another agency won't be a slam-dunk. She was a regular in court, signed her name to at least one of the briefs in the case, and gained prosecution experience during a six-month detail to the U.S. Attorney's Office in the District of Columbia in 1993.

And Martin appears ready to push back. "Ms. Martin has now been viciously vilified by assertions from the prosecution," Roscoe Howard Jr., Martin's attorney and a former U.S. Attorney in the District of Columbia, wrote in a statement on her behalf. "When her opportunity comes, her response will show a very different, full picture of her intentions."

9th Circuit Slams DOJ Over Detention (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, March 21, 2006

Ahilan Nadarajah was detained as a terrorism suspect for nearly five years before he got to argue his case before the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. It only took a three-judge panel 10 days to order his release.

In a unanimous decision Friday, Judge Sidney Thomas wrote that federal immigration officials can't detain an asylum seeker indefinitely after an immigration court orders his release. Thomas wrote that the government's interpretation that a Supreme Court opinion allowed indefinite detention was "patently absurd."

"The general immigration detention statutes do not authorize the Attorney General to incarcerate detainees for an indefinite period," Thomas wrote. He was joined by Judge Richard Tallman and Senior U.S. District Judge James Fitzgerald of the District of Alaska, who sat by designation.

"By any analysis," Thomas wrote, "a five-year period of confinement of an alien who has not been charged with any crime, and who has won relief at every administrative level, is unreasonable under the standards set forth by the Supreme Court. Nor are we persuaded by the government's argument that because the Attorney General will someday review Nadarajah's case, his detention will at some point end, and so he is not being held indefinitely. No one can satisfactorily assure us as to when that day will arrive. Meanwhile, petitioner remains in detention."

Nadarajah's lawyer, Ahilan Arulanantham of the ACLU Foundation of Southern California, argued the case to the panel on March 7, and asked the judges to rule quickly, given the long detention at issue.

"We're very pleased with it," Arulanantham said Friday. "The court was concerned, like the immigration courts and all the courts who heard it in the United States, that the government was wrong.

"Because these are immigration courts," Arulanantham said, "the government basically said, 'we can resist their findings.'" A Justice Department spokeswoman would only say the case may continue to the Supreme Court.

Immigration and appeals courts found that Nadarajah had been beaten, burned and hung upside down, his head submersed in gasoline, by Sri Lankan authorities.

But the Justice Department insisted that Nadarajah was a member of the rebel Tamil Tigers, which it classifies as a terrorist group. And after missing two hearings, a Department of Homeland Security agent appeared in an immigration court to provide evidence of Nadarajah's terrorist links.

That evidence was based on information gathered from the Canadian Mounties and an anonymous letter writer who said it was unlikely that Nadarajah could have left the area of Sri Lanka where he had lived without the permission of the Tamil Tigers. An informant had also said that Nadarajah made a call from jail ordering a murder.

An immigration judge, unconvinced, ruled in Nadarajah's favor. But immigration officials refused to release him, even after he posted $20,000 bail.

Thomas noted that Congress has set up special avenues for the Justice Department to seek prolonged detention of terrorists, which were not taken in Nadarajah's case.

"Indeed, the government does not claim that the detention provisions for terrorists under the Patriot Act justify Nadarajah's detention," Thomas wrote.

"Given that Congress has placed specific limits on the Attorney General's authority to detain suspected terrorists, those statutory provisions must govern such detentions, instead of the general detention provisions that apply to all aliens coming into the United States," he continued.

Judge Orders Release Of Edited FBI Video In Lodi Terror Trial (AP)

By Don Thompson

AP, March 21, 2006

SACRAMENTO - The judge overseeing the federal trial of two Lodi men charged in a terrorism-related case approved releasing an edited version of their videotaped FBI interviews on Monday.

U.S. District Court Judge Garland Burrell Jr. rejected objections from the attorneys for Hamid Hayat, 23, and his father, Umer Hayat, 48.

Instead, he ordered portions of the tapes deleted. Edited out of the videotapes to be released will be mentions of two Islamic religious leaders who were deported to Pakistan last year and segments in which Umer Hayat speculates that four Lodi men could be preparing to commit terrorist acts.

None of the men they mention was charged with a crime.

Both Hayats have pleaded not guilty. Their attorneys say they made false confessions after hours of leading questioning by FBI agents. The interviews and confessions were recorded on videotape.

Oakland television station KTVU sought release of the tapes. NBC and ABC affiliates in Los Angeles, San Diego and Sacramento later joined the request.

The station will edit the videotapes and turn those versions back to Burrell for review. The approved versions will then be released publicly.

"Most of the information that's being redacted is already in the public record, but we understand the judge's concerns," KTVU attorney Grace Won said after the ruling. "We think they could be ready for broadcast within the next week or two."

DOJ_NMG_0019841

Hamid Hayat faces three counts of lying to the FBI and separate charges of providing material support to terrorists by attending the camp. He faces up to 39 years in prison if convicted on all counts.

His father is charged with two counts of making false statements to the FBI and faces up to 16 years in prison if convicted.

KXTV-TV, March 21, 2006

The judge in the Hayat terrorism trial has agreed to release portions of the interrogation tapes to the media over the objections of the defendants' attorneys.

Judge Garland Burrell approved the release of an edited version of the videotapes that were shown to jurors during the trial of Umer and Hamid Hayat. Burrell is ordering the deletion of parts of the interrogations. For example, he will not release portions in which the Hayats mention two Islamic religious leaders who were deported to Pakistan last year. Segments in which Umer Hayat speculates that four young Lodi men could be preparing to commit terrorist acts will also be excluded.

News10 was party to the lawsuit that petitioned Burrell to release the tapes. When they are available, News10 will show them on News10 and News10.net.

Onetime Clerk Is At Center Of Lodi Trial (LAT)

By Rone Tempest, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 21, 2006

Naseem Khan has gone from a quiet job at an Oregon convenience store to the witness stand as FBI informer.

BEND, Ore. — At the convenience store where he worked in this central Oregon resort town before he became an undercover operative for the FBI in California, Naseem Khan was known to his co-workers as "Mike."

The picture of Khan that emerges from interviews with friends, co-workers and landlords in Bend, a picturesque former logging town of 70,000 in the shadow of snow-capped Mt. Bachelor, is of a quiet, hard-working, mostly solitary young man with an interest in law enforcement.

Khan is now the key witness in the terrorism trial of a Lodi, Calif., ice cream truck driver and his son. Last week, he shocked the Sacramento courtroom when he said he saw Al Qaeda's No. 2 figure in 1999 at a mosque in the San Joaquin Valley farming community. He is expected to take the stand today for the first time since he made that claim, which terrorism experts discount as highly improbable.

Khan was first approached by FBI agents in October 2001 in Bend after someone reported him as a possible terrorism suspect, according to friends and court testimony. "He was originally a target," recalled Anne Kimler, who describes herself as a close friend. "They even confiscated his computer."

Quickly cleared of those suspicions, the $7-an-hour manager of the K Market convenience store was hired by the FBI to infiltrate the large Muslim community in Lodi, where he once lived, and was paid more than $200,000 in salary and expenses for his three-year undercover assignment.

The clean-cut, square-jawed Pakistani immigrant took readily to the job of secret agent. "He knew the culture and sometimes he objected to what they asked him to do," said a former girlfriend. "But he really liked the work. It fit his dream of someday going into law enforcement." The girlfriend, who lived with Khan until a recent breakup, asked not to be named because of concerns for her safety.

Jesse Johal, Khan's employer at K Market, which caters to skiers en route to Cascade Range slopes, said he was not surprised by Khan's turn to undercover work. He said Khan took criminology courses at the local community college and sometimes went with police officer friends to the local pistol range. "He was a nice quiet guy," said Johal. "We were a good team."

For a few months after the FBI hired him in December 2001, Khan continued to work at the convenience store. Johal said agents would sometimes visit the informant, code-named "Wildcat," in the store.

Ted and Edie Henderson, managers of the 88-unit apartment complex on Powers Road where Khan lived alone from September 2000 to June 2002, described him as a model tenant who always paid his $420 monthly rent on time.

"He just kept to himself," said Ted Henderson. "I never saw anyone come in or out of his place." Edie Henderson said, "When he left I've never seen such a clean apartment in my life."

In his first round of testimony in Sacramento earlier this month, Khan said he was born in Peshawar, Pakistan, in 1973, to a Pashtun tribal family. After his father died when Khan was still a child, he was raised by his mother and grandmother.

At 16, speaking very little English, he immigrated to the United States with his mother and two cousins, living briefly in Kentucky, New York and Texas, where he attended high school and took the first in a series of low-paying jobs in fast-food franchises and convenience stores.

DOJ_NMG_0019842

Records show he moved to California in 1992, living mostly in the Sacramento Valley cities of Marysville and Yuba City. In 1993, when he was 19, court records show he was convicted in Sutter County on a bad-check charge for which he spent two days in jail and was fined $211.

In July 1999, he moved to Lodi, home to several generations of Pakistani Americans, many of whom share his Pashtun ethnicity — including Umer Hayat, 48, and Hamid Hayat, 23, who are on trial. The younger Hayat is charged with attending a terrorist training camp in Pakistan in 2003; both are charged with lying to federal agents.

Khan lived alone in an apartment that overlooked the Lodi mosque. He worked at a pizza delivery business and a convenience store.

Separated from other family members living in Texas, Khan lacked the extensive family base enjoyed by many in the town's Muslim community.

So late one night in 1999 when he was working in the Lodi convenience store, he was open to the suggestion of a garrulous traveler that he come up to Oregon to "check it out."

The traveler, Kimler, a 50-year-old U.S. Forest Service employee from Prineville, Ore., said she took an instant liking to Khan and invited him to stay with her and her family if he came to Oregon.

"We just liked each other and became friends," Kimler recalled.

Khan took her up on the offer and stayed with the family in Prineville for several months before he landed a job as assistant manager at a Taco Bell and went out on his own.

On Sundays, Kimler recalled, Khan would cook up Indian curries and sweet Pakistani deserts such as carrot halwa.

"He always said they were something different," Kimler said of the curries, "but they all tasted the same. Good, but very hot. The kids couldn't eat them."

When Khan found his own apartment, Kimler went with him to help him pick out furniture. She became his confidant and advisor in a conservative Oregon community with no mosque and only a handful of practicing Muslims.

"There's another Muslim in Bend? That's news to me. I thought I was the only one," said Mohammed Elwefati, a Libyan American who manages food and beverages at a popular local steakhouse. Elwefati said he never met Kahn.

Kimler thinks it was this cultural isolation in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks that caused a wave of xenophobia in central Oregon that eventually reached Khan.

K Market owner Johal recalled a man buying cigarettes in the store who asked Khan menacingly if he was planning to "make a bomb."

Kimler suspects one of her own friends, hysterical with fear about terrorism, alerted the FBI about Khan. "I told her, 'Naseem a terrorist?' " she recalled. " 'You have to be kidding.' "

Whatever the cause, court records show that on Oct. 17, 2001, an FBI agent showed up at Khan's Powers Road apartment asking about his knowledge of Osama bin Laden and several Muslim fundraising organizations.

Since his testimony in the trial, Khan has been unavailable for comment.

Apparently convinced that he had no terrorism connections and impressed with his cooperation, agents from Oregon and California visited him again on Oct. 26, asking him to review photographs of suspected terrorists and asking him questions about the Lodi community where he once lived.

Khan told agents he remembered seeing Al Qaeda's No. 2, Ayman Zawahiri, and two other men, Ahmed Mohammed Hamed, a suspect in the 1998 embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania, and Abdelkarim Hussein Mohamed Al-Nasser, a suspect in the 1996 Khobar Towers bombing. He said he saw the three men at the Lodi mosque in 1998 and 1999.

Terrorism experts, even government officials, doubt the accuracy of the Zawahiri sighting, saying that the Al Qaeda figure, Bin Laden's personal physician, almost certainly did not travel to the United States after 1995.

Nothing has surfaced in the Lodi trial that indicates the agents seriously pursued these leads.

Nonetheless, Khan won the confidence of the FBI's Sacramento office and was immediately put to work as an undercover operative and sent out to secretly tape-record conversations with members of the Muslim community. Months into the investigation, Khan was trusted enough to transcribe and translate his own secret recordings, which are the foundation of the Lodi case.

Even after he began working for the FBI, Khan continued working part time at the Bend convenience store and living in the one-bedroom apartment. Sometime in the spring of 2002, he met a woman through a computer dating service who became his steady girlfriend.

The couple later moved into a Deschutes County home that the girlfriend bought. Khan, who told his Lodi contacts that he was a computer consultant who traveled frequently, sometimes stayed away from Bend for weeks at a time.

When he came home, the girlfriend said, he worked on landscaping the property. "He would cook Indian food, and we would listen to Indian music," she said. Other than the fact that he was working undercover for the government, she said, she knew little else about his activities.

She said the couple lived together until about five months ago when she found a goodbye note from Khan wishing her good luck in her future life. She said she contacted the FBI to get in touch with Khan but never heard back from him.

"I loved him. I loved him very much," she said, talking to a reporter in the slush-covered driveway of her home. "I guess this is what happens when you are in government work."

Young Lawyer Gets First Big Test During Federal Terrorism Trial (AP)

By Don Thompson

AP, March 21, 2006

SACRAMENTO - It was a Sunday last June when leaders from Lodi's Pakistani community paid a frantic visit to Basim Elkarra, executive director of the Sacramento area's Council on American-Islamic Relations.

FBI agents had been interrogating a father and son from the Central Valley agricultural town who they suspected were lying about the younger man's attendance at an al-Qaida training camp in Pakistan. They needed a criminal lawyer for the men, and Elkarra wasn't sure who he could reach on such short notice.

What he did have was the cell phone number of a young Muslim lawyer of Afghan descent. He knew he could reach her, even on a weekend.

Within hours, Wazhma Mojaddidi found herself representing the 23-year-old son, Hamid Hayat, who is now on trial in U.S. District. He could spend most of the next four decades in prison if he is convicted of charges that he attended the camp in 2003 and lied about it to investigators.

It's the kind of high-profile case that rarely gets handed to a lawyer 18 months removed from law school.

"Getting a case of this magnitude for somebody who just recently graduated from law school is pretty unusual," said Eric McElwain, director of international programs at the University of Pacific McGeorge School of Law in Sacramento. "I assume it's just a case of being in the right place - I hope it's the right place - at the right time."

Mojaddidi is working as a team with veteran defense attorney Johnny Griffin III, a former prosecutor who is representing Hamid Hayat's father. Umer Hayat, 48, is charged with lying about his son's attendance at the camp and faces up to 16 years in prison.

Mojaddidi and Griffin, who are scheduled to begin the defense portion of the trial next week, have made an unlikely but complementary team.

Griffin, 46, spent 13 years as a state and federal prosecutor before beginning a private practice in 1998. He dwarfs the 31-year-old Mojaddidi, who says she stands 5-foot-2 1/2.

While she does not wear the traditional Muslim headdress, Mojaddidi favors stylish, colorful clothes that contrast with the dark suits and judicial robes of the courtroom.

U.S. District Judge Garland Burrell Jr. often is impatient with her for her evident inexperience in cross-examinations and rules of evidence, frequently schooling her on how she should phrase questions to a government witness.

Despite her inexperience, Mojaddidi has stood her ground. She sparred with the prosecution's expert on Islamic religion and law, debating the interpretation of a Muslim prayer, the opinions of 13th century Muslim scholars and obscure rhetorical histories dating to the Prophet Muhammad himself.

She challenged an FBI linguist about the significance of news articles praising al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden and Afghanistan's fundamentalist Taliban government. Her client clipped the stories from newspapers and magazines that are widely circulated in Pakistan.

Mojaddidi, a naturalized U.S. citizen who is fluent in several languages, also could interpret the original Urdu in hundreds of hours of secretly recorded conversations between the Hayats and the FBI's informant. She consults with the Hayats, also U.S. citizens, in their native language.

"This has really been a good blend," Griffin said. "She brings the whole cultural knowledge of the whole community. I know there have been some rough moments, but she has, in my view, stepped up to the plate."

Griffin was brought into the case quickly, but the lawyers arrived too late to prevent both Hayats from giving confessions - captured on videotape - to FBI agents during lengthy interrogation sessions last June. They were called in for questioning shortly after Hamid Hayat returned from Pakistan.

DOJ_NMG_0019844

Persuading jurors to discount the confessions is among the defense team's biggest challenges. Mojaddidi and Griffin say the Hayats gave the statements after they were worn down by hours of questioning and were telling agents only what they thought they wanted to hear, unaware of the legal consequences.

At the same time, the lawyers are trying to exploit weaknesses with the government's case. Prosecutors so far have not presented firm evidence that Hamid Hayat actually attended the terror training camp, and questions have been raised about the credibility of the informant.

The case represents a leap for Mojaddidi, who previously was using her command of Urdu, Farsi and Pashto to help immigrants with family law cases.

"There aren't many Muslim attorneys," Elkarra said. "She speaks the language and she knows the culture. People feel comfortable with a Muslim attorney."

Mojaddidi was operating her own law practice in Sacramento when Elkarra called her for the Hayat case.

"It was a little bit of an intimidating situation," Mojaddidi said. "Essentially, I walked into a small conference room with about 10 Muslim religious leaders, all men, whom I had not met before."

In an interview with The Associated Press, she described her family's flight from Afghanistan when was 5, what she described as a middle-of-the-night escape into Pakistan in 1979 after the Russian invasion.

The family immigrated to Virginia and later moved to Concord, a suburb in the eastern San Francisco Bay area.

She met her husband, a Pakistani, while attending the University of California, Davis, and soon picked up his native Pashto language. Both are American citizens but speak their native languages to their three U.S.-born children, although Mojaddidi said her son prefers English.

She has never returned to Afghanistan but has visited Pakistan twice with her husband, an aeronautical and mechanical engineer.

"I must say, my first time was a culture shock to me," she said. "Most of the poor are Afghan refugees. To think that could have been me."

McElwain, the McGeorge professor, remembers Mojaddidi as a student and said he expected her to excel.

During a competition in Austria in 2002, he recalled, her team received good reviews but finished 21st among the 108 international universities, too low to qualify as a finalist. At the time, Mojaddidi said she was convinced her team's effort was sabotaged by a judge and wanted to appeal.

"That's just typical of Wazhma," McElwain said. "She's a very strong personality, the kind of person who takes things into her own hands if she doesn't like the way things are going. You just know she's going to go out and make waves wherever she goes."

A Possible Clue On NSA Spying (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

Did President Bush mention the government's secret warrantless surveillance program to the president of Pakistan more than four years ago? A brief passage of a 2002 book seems to raise that possibility.

Bush started by talking about plans for a quick victory in Afghanistan but then turned to another topic, according to the passage on Page 303:

"He had become fascinated with the ability of the National Security Agency to intercept phone calls and other communications worldwide," Woodward wrote, referring to Bush. "If they got the key phone calls, future terrorism might be stopped, certainly curtailed. Bush summarized his strategy: 'Listen to every phone call and close them down and protect the innocents.' "

By this time, Bush had already issued his order allowing the NSA to intercept communications between the United States and overseas locations without warrants. The program was never divulged publicly, however, until press reports last December.

Of course, Bush could have been referring merely to the NSA's traditional surveillance programs, which have long involved intercepting large amounts of communications overseas.

Woodward, an assistant managing editor at The Washington Post, said this month that he does not know what Bush may have had in mind during his conversation with Musharraf. Woodward noted that he has not referred to the NSA's warrantless spying program in his books or reporting.

DOJ_NMG_0019845

By Karl Vick

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

ISTANBUL, March 20 -- The al-Qaeda operative accused of organizing the 2003 Istanbul bombings and a botched attempt to sink an Israeli cruise ship appeared in a Turkish courtroom on Monday -- and did his best to take it over.

Louai al-Sakka, 32, who by his own account worked beside insurgent leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in Iraq, first told the court he was someone else, then was hustled out of the morning session after refusing to stand to address the judge.

"I performed jihad and killed Americans! Why should I stand up in front of you?" Sakka shouted as guards tugged him toward the door. "Should I stand in front of these liars?"

Sakka, a Syrian described by Turkish officials as a senior figure in al-Qaeda, is accused of providing other operatives with about $170,000 from the group to carry out four truck bombings that killed 57 people over two days in November 2003.

Monday was the opening day of trial for Sakka, who is being prosecuted along with 72 Turks. With the Turks' trial winding down after more than two years, defense attorneys argued unsuccessfully Monday that adding Sakka to the case would cause even further delay.

"I'm not holding a bomb. I just want to talk," Sakka told Judge Zafer Baskurt in the afternoon session, after being summoned from a back row where he had been mugging and joking with other defendants. He again refused to stand, indicating he acknowledged only Islamic law.

The judge responded by recessing the proceedings for two months.

Further complicating the trial, Sakka's attorney was ordered off the case Monday because he faces charges himself. Turkish prosecutors accuse Osman Karahan, a proponent of militant Islam in good standing with the Turkish bar, of aiding and abetting a terrorist organization. Karahan, who also represented 14 other defendants in the Istanbul case, said the indictment falsely links him to last year's bombings of the London transit system.

"All these efforts are to prevent Sakka from talking, because if he talks, a few states would collapse," Karahan said. Sakka already faces prison in Jordan, where he and Zarqawi were convicted in absentia for plotting to blow up hotels and tourist landmarks in the so-called millennium plot. Turkish police arrested him in August while he was allegedly completing plans to steer an explosives-laden yacht into an Israeli cruise ship off the Turkish coast. The plan was discovered when fire broke out in the apartment where he and an accomplice were constructing the bomb, authorities said.

Karahan has quoted Sakka as saying he planned to die attacking the cruise ship. He supposedly believed he would be captured otherwise; his identity was known despite efforts to alter his face through plastic surgery.

On Monday, however, his identity was at issue. More than 20 journalists failed to recognize Sakka as he entered the court building. Cleanshaven and skinny at the time of his arrest, the defendant had put on substantial weight in prison and grown a full beard. He insisted to the judge that his name was Ekrem Ozel, the name on the identity card he was using when arrested, and demanded he be fingerprinted to prove it.

Karahan said he was not sure of his client's identity, either. He said that Sakka, who specialized in moving Islamic militants through Turkey with false papers, had moved in and out of Turkey 55 times on 18 different passports.

"This is going to be a case of worldwide importance, so we need to determine scientifically exactly who he is," Karahan said.

PATRIOT ACT:

Freezing Nuns A Result Of Patriot Act Move (WT)

By Jen Haberkorn

The Washington Times, March 21, 2006

When checks began bouncing at Holy Name Monastery of the Benedictine Sisters last year, Sister Jean Abbott knew something was fishy.

Her calls to the bank revealed that the St. Leo, Fla., account was frozen for five days because one of the account's signatories -- an 80-year-old nun -- didn't have an identification card on file.

The bank blamed the USA Patriot Act for the account freeze.

"The local bank said it was the Patriot Act," said Sister Abbott, who declined to identify the bank. "Someone at the main office of the bank had done, according to the local bank, a spot check on the account, which they do periodically."

The Patriot Act strengthened the Bank Secrecy Act, which requires financial institutions, including banks, creditors and even casinos, to inform the U.S. Treasury Department of transactions they find to be out of the ordinary. But even the Patriot Act cannot close an account -- only a bank can do that.

The number of suspicious transactions that financial institutions are reporting to the government has nearly tripled since the Patriot Act was passed in 2001.

A suspicious act could be a business that doesn't normally use cash but suddenly starts making large cash deposits, or a person who normally deposits just a paycheck and suddenly makes a few deposits of tens of thousands of dollars.

Both could be legitimate transactions, but they also could be a sign of money laundering or other illegal activity.

So both cases will draw a red flag from a bank, prompting it to file a Suspicious Activity Report (SAR), which is sent to the Treasury Department to determine whether the transaction is fraudulent and to start a paper trail that investigators can use later if necessary.

Most consumers will never have their accounts frozen and likely will never know if a report is filed on them, according to the Treasury Department and the American Bankers Association (ABA). It's illegal for a bank to tell consumers that a SAR has been filed on them.

The average consumer "should not be concerned as long as the transactions they're doing are legit," said Anne Marie Kelly, a spokeswoman for the Financial Crimes Enforcement Network, the Treasury Department bureau responsible for administering the Bank Secrecy Act.

Privacy groups say the law is invasive without being effective.

"This law is causing so many problems without any demonstrable successes," said J. Bradley Jansen, director of the Center for Financial Privacy and Human Rights, part of the Liberty and Privacy Network in the District. "The Banking Secrecy Act has been on the books since the 1970s. It did not prevent 9/11. It's not designed to prevent anything."

Ten years ago, banks filed 62,473 SARs annually. By 2000, that figure reached 163,184, and two years later, after the Patriot Act revisions, the number of SARs nearly doubled. It reached a peak of 689,414 in 2004 and dropped to 435,167 last year.

More financial institutions are required to file now, boosting the number of SARs. But regulators also have cracked down on banks over noncompliance -- Riggs Bank N.A. faced a $16 million fine last year for failing to file timely and accurate SARs.

"The banks take it very seriously," said John Hall, a spokesman for ABA. "Since those fines were enacted, some regulators feel that the banks are filling them out a little too often."

In Texas, where bankers deal with many immigrants sending money back to their countries, bankers think they have to file SARs on transactions even if they don't look too suspicious.

"Bankers know that even though the Washington regulators say they're not going to second-guess the bankers, the bankers are getting second-guessed," said Karen Neeley, general counsel of the Independent Bankers Association of Texas. "If you want to be safe, you have to file."

After the SAR is filed, it's up to the bank to determine whether to let the transaction proceed, freeze the funds or even close the account, Ms. Kelly said.

"We don't do anything about whether an account is closed or open. That's a business decision by the financial institution," she said.

The Treasury Department refers suspicious transactions to the appropriate law-enforcement agency.

The ABA says banks don't give out account information unless ordered to by law.

"Banks do guard the privacy of their customers. Customer trust is paramount to our industry," Mr. Hall said.

Librarian Is Still John Doe, Despite Patriot Act Revision (NYT)

By Alison Leigh Cowan

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

The hotel ballroom was packed as a sensibly dressed, well-read crowd from around the country gathered in San Antonio on Jan. 21 to celebrate one of their own.

Yet, as many expected, the guest of honor was a no-show, despite the $500 intellectual freedom prize that awaited.

Attendees at an American Library Association gathering blamed Washington for the empty chair. Lawmakers may be giving themselves credit for having improved safeguards on civil liberties when they reauthorized the nation's antiterrorism law, otherwise known as the USA Patriot Act, earlier this month.

But many librarians and civil liberties lawyers say the revisions did nothing to enable the guest of honor to take the stage and discuss the Patriot Act without risk of prosecution.

Known as John Doe in court filings, the guest of honor was the Connecticut librarian who was visited by the Federal Bureau of Investigation last year and presented with what is known as a national security letter demanding patron records.

The subpoena, issued as part of a counterterrorism investigation, not only barred him from disclosing the target of the inquiry, but also forbade him and others at his place of work to ever discuss the letter or even to acknowledge its receipt.

Though some 30,000 national security letters are issued a year without arousing public protest, the librarian was reluctant to comply because of professional ethics aimed at keeping library records confidential.

On the advice of the American Civil Liberties Union, his employer went to court to challenge the constitutionality of the subpoena, the provisions of the Patriot Act that broadened the use of national security letters after Sept. 11, 2001, and the order permanently forbidding discussion of the F.B.I.'s demand.

As the Bush administration pushed for the act to be reauthorized, a handful of Democratic and Republican lawmakers argued that it went too far in encroaching on civil liberties. In the end, they persuaded the White House to accept a compromise that placed library records beyond the reach of a national security letter if they were gathered by libraries operating in what many people understand to be their traditional roles.

While those concessions have allowed lawmakers to say that new safeguards on civil liberties have been put in place, another powerful provision in the Patriot Act, known as Section 215, remains on the books. It gives law enforcement another confidential way to demand information but has seldom been used because it requires judicial approval. National security letters, in contrast, require merely the signature of an F.B.I. official.

Between Section 215 and the new language governing national security letters, some opponents of the new version of the Patriot Act are skeptical that the revisions will provide much protection against unwanted invasions of privacy or infringements on free speech.

"The revised law provides almost no protection whatsoever for libraries," said Ann Beeson, the civil liberties union lawyer representing the organization that brought the suit in Connecticut. "It's virtually meaningless."

The section of the new law that addresses "privacy protection for library patrons" states that library records are beyond the reach of national security letters so long as the library is not operating as an "electronic communication service." Elsewhere, that term is defined as "any service which provides to users thereof the ability to send or receive wire or electronic communications."

But much of what a modern library does courses through its computers. Patrons can research topics on the Web. They can even reserve books from home. "A national security letter can be used to get any library record that is maintained via an electronic communication service," Ms. Beeson said. "That definitely includes Internet access and e-mail records and can also include patron borrowing records."

The new law does establish the recipient's right to challenge the nondisclosure orders that typically accompany national security letters and Section 215 requests. But the recipient would have to wait a year before raising the question anew if the government continued to assert the need for secrecy.

"If you're a business that has resources to challenge it every year, you can," Ms. Beeson said. But she said a judge would be hard pressed to rule against a government request to keep the information secret for reasons of national security. In the Connecticut John Doe's case, she said, "nothing in the new law permits John Doe to disclose his identity."

Though government lawyers demanded that John Doe's identity be shielded in court filings, the government failed to completely conceal the name in those filings, which revealed the plaintiff to be the Library Connection of Windsor, Conn., a nonprofit organization that provides back-office services to some two dozen libraries in the Hartford area.

Eager to testify publicly about the Patriot Act, the group's officers won the right last summer to identify their organization as the recipient of a national security letter after Judge Janet C. Hall of Federal District Court in Bridgeport found that the government had unjustly imposed a prior restraint on free speech. But her decision was stayed while the government appealed, and the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, in Manhattan, has yet to rule.

"I am rather appalled that our country's laws silence John Doe and require him to remain anonymous for standing by his professional ethics, for standing up for the principle that it is nobody's business what you read, or listen to, or look at in the library but yours," Judith F. Krug, the executive director of the Freedom to Read Foundation, told the crowd in San Antonio, as she accepted the University of Illinois's annual Robert B. Downs Intellectual Freedom Award in John Doe's absence.

Alice S. Knapp, a Stamford librarian who is this year's president of the Connecticut Library Association, said she was there "taking pictures left and right." But the Library Connection's executive director, George Christian, and the vice president of its board, Peter Chase, did not attend. Mr. Chase's absence was especially odd since he was to be the Connecticut Library Association's advocate on intellectual freedom this year.

Without commenting on John Doe's likely identity, Ms. Knapp confirmed that she had assumed many of Mr. Chase's speaking duties this year. For moral support, she has been nominating John Doe for other awards.

"We nominate them for everything we can," Ms. Knapp said. "Never mind the pressure they're under. Just the sheer act of bravery to decide not to comply and to decide to make an issue of it was incredibly huge, and within the library community, there is a lot of respect for them."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Homeland Security Targeting Some Plants (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

The AP, March 21, 2006

Chemical plants with lax protections from attacks and accidental leaks are being targeted by the Homeland Security Department — before they can be targeted by terrorists.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Monday his department will crack down on chemical manufacturers and storage facilities that he described as "free riders" — those that haven't beefed up their security measures.

"They're counting on the fact that the industry in general has a good level of investment, and they figure they'll hide among the leaves and essentially freeload on this security work done by others," Chertoff said.

"That's not acceptable," he said. "Progress on this has stalled for too long."

Counterterror experts put the chemical industry at the top of the list of likely terror targets. Congressional investigators have revealed spotty results in how well the chemical industry is prepared to respond in the event of an attack.

At issue is federal regulation of security plans at the nation's 15,000 privately operated chemical plants — one-fifth of which are close to cities and other heavily populated areas.

The chemical industry generally has resisted federal regulation, and large manufacturers have voluntarily taken steps to improve security that they deem adequate. Small chemical firms and plants have largely ignored beefing up safeguards to avoid having to pay for them.

Homeland Security "wants and deserves authority to set federal standards for chemical security, and then enforce those standards," said Chris VandenHeuvel, a spokesman for the American Chemistry Council, which represents large chemical manufacturers. "Four and a half years after 9/11, they still don't have that."

Legislation is pending in the Senate to authorize Homeland Security to shut down facilities that do not comply with minimum safety standards. But the bill by Sens. Susan Collins, R-Maine, and Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., would largely let the chemical industry draw up its own security plans for the federal government to approve or reject.

Chertoff has not endorsed the plan, but he is expected on Tuesday to outline elements that he said would need to be in acceptable legislation. Congressional staffers said it likely would not encourage facilities to substitute safe substances for hazardous chemicals, as environmentalists have demanded.

Without that provision, "there isn't any security that would be good enough," said Rick Hind of Greenpeace. "A small plane or a high-powered weapon would bypass any gate or fence."

Chemical Plants May Be Called To Boost Security (WSJ)

By ROBERT BLOCK

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Reversing course, the Bush administration says it will now work with Congress to require the chemicals industry to better protect its facilities from terror strikes, requiring companies to draft detailed antiterrorism plans and penalizing those that don't comply.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, in remarks today to the American Chemical Council, an industry trade group, is expected to detail the minimum requirements he would like to see Congress include in legislation to bolster security at U.S. chemical plants.

"The fact of the matter is: chemical plants and, in fact, transportation of chemicals, remains a vulnerability," Mr. Chertoff said in a speech yesterday at the Heritage Foundation, previewing his remarks today. "Progress on this has stalled for too long. We do need legislation and congressional action and leadership on this point."

A chemical plant security bill is pending in the Senate, drafted by Sens. Susan Collins (R., Me.) and Joseph Lieberman (D., Conn.). Mr. Chertoff said the administration will work with them to refine and advance the bill into law. The goal "is to have flexibility, appropriate risk management, smart use of technology and not heavy-handed strangulation or overregulation."

Following the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks, lawmakers and some top Bush administration officials pointed to the vulnerability of U.S. chemical plants to similar strikes.

Former Environmental Protection Agency administrator Christine Whitman wanted to use existing EPA authority to compel the chemicals industry to adopt stricter protective measures that would make it more difficult for terrorists to attack plants and tank cars. Fearing overregulation, industry officials convinced the White House to shift plant security to the newly created Department of Homeland Security, but without any power beyond making recommendations.

DOJ_NMG_0019849

The Department of Homeland Security wouldn't provide advance details of Mr. Chertoff's remarks. But Chris VandenHeuvel, a spokesman for the American Chemistry Council, said he expects Mr. Chertoff will say legislation must give his department authority to work with the industry to set minimum security standards. He also wants real enforcement power.

"DHS does not have authority it needs to compel the industry to stake steps necessary to protect against terrorists and terrorism, and Mr. Chertoff wants that to change," Mr. VandenHeuvel said.

A 'Unified Command Structure' In Search Of A Leader (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

As Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff sat down for lunch yesterday on the seventh floor of the Heritage Foundation, a vivid scene from the post-9/11 world was unfolding outside the conference-room window.

Two blocks away at Union Station, a small grease fire had erupted on the grill at McDonald's. The blaze was quickly extinguished, but not before jittery security personnel ordered the terminal evacuated. Hundreds of shoppers, diners and rail passengers, heeding shouted warnings to flee the premises, flowed into the plaza outside, where emergency response vehicles joined the usual duck boats and tourist trolleys.

Chertoff aides watched the mayhem from the Heritage windows, but Chertoff himself missed the hullabaloo; one of his lunch partners explained that his security guards had ordered the blinds drawn.

It was just as well -- the secretary has enough crises to worry about these days.

A year after he took over from Tom Ridge at Homeland Security, Chertoff is getting much of the blame for the woeful Hurricane Katrina response, insufficient supervision of the Dubai port deal and domestic defenses that remain, by most accounts, unacceptably weak.

Earlier this month, the conservative magazine Human Events quoted administration officials as saying that Chertoff had "only a few days left" in the Cabinet. The White House denied it, but the rumors -- and calls for his head -- continue.

Yesterday, an hour before Chertoff addressed the International Association of Fire Fighters at the Hyatt on Capitol Hill, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) won vigorous applause from the firefighters for demanding Chertoff's ouster for his role in a "dangerously incompetent" administration.

All of this must have Chertoff, a former star prosecutor and top Justice Department official, wondering why he gave up his seat as a federal appellate judge for a position that earns him -- deservedly or not -- unending criticism.

"You gave up a lifetime appointment for this?" Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) marveled to Chertoff at a Senate hearing last month at which the secretary was getting abuse over Katrina.

"My wife reminds me of that periodically," Chertoff replied, ruefully.

Chertoff's problem is not, as Biden suggests, that he's incompetent. The secretary is highly accomplished. His problem, if anything, is he's a model technocrat in a position that sometimes demands a commanding leader.

A strikingly thin man with a high-pitched voice, pointy ears and droopy eyelids, Chertoff speaks of "the critical points of triangulation" and calls for a "properly risk-managed approach to critical infrastructure." He talks about the need for "total assets visibility" and favors "an integrated, sensible, systems-based approach." He desires "better information about the constituents of the supply chain." And instead of telling people that he's protecting them, he says that his department has "done a lot to elevate the general baseline of security in this country."

Relax, America: Your general security baseline is elevated because of a systems-based approach to critical triangulation points.

These kinds of statements -- all voiced at Heritage yesterday -- make the wiry Chertoff a big target for those building a case that the administration is lax about homeland security. The firefighters' president, Harold Schaitberger, began yesterday's conference with a speech complaining that "the administration and OMB have recommended drastic cuts" in first-responder programs.

Biden asked the crowd, almost all men, whether the administration was protecting Americans. "Well folks, the winds of Katrina and the shoddiness of the Dubai port deal . . . have answered the question," he said.

Chertoff, suffering from a cold, cleared his throat 10 times as he spoke to the firefighters and 20 more when talking at Heritage. He offered a series of explanations for the Katrina problems: "catastrophe of the century . . . a disaster is always an ugly thing . . . Mother Nature can be awfully tough to deal with."

He blended that with his technocratic explanations of DHS ("internal integration into a unified command structure") and attempts at high rhetoric that fell short. Pointing to photos of the Sept. 11, 2001, wreckage, Chertoff said: "You are really part of the war on terror, as well as the war against all hazards."

War Against All Hazards: WAAH?

Chertoff, pursued by reporters, was whisked from the building and into a waiting Chevy Suburban by a knot of aides and bodyguards -- and away to the relative safety of Heritage. There, after lunch, former attorney general Ed Meese introduced him by praising his "dynamic leadership."

Chertoff displayed that dynamism by giving the audience an earful about the need to "integrate all of your organs of power" to achieve "the totality of effort." A few of his listeners allowed their eyes to close.

Chertoff made a beeline for the exit after 30 minutes. "Because of the secretary's schedule, he's not able to take questions," Meese tried to explain. In the war against all hazards, a Q&A session probably would not elevate the general baseline of Chertoff's job security.

U.S. Eyes Privatizing Cargo Security Work (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, March 21, 2006

Homeland Security officials are looking to have private companies validate the security procedures under which cargo travels from foreign ports into U.S. terminals.

The program, which would give speedier entry to U.S. ports to ships and suppliers that meet the security standards, is now in the hands of 80 Homeland Security inspectors who have to plow through more than 10,000 applicants.

Although Homeland Security plans to hire an additional 40 inspectors in the coming months, the department also is looking to outsource to private companies some of its duties, in particular the validation process, which has dragged for years and involves on-site inspections of ships and cargo abroad.

More than 5,800 companies currently get some shortcuts by being "certified." But only 1,545 have been "validated" to receive the full benefits of the program after first-hand inspections, such as fewer on-site checks at U.S. ports, said Jayson P. Ahern, assistant commissioner of field operations for Customs and Border Protection.

Mr. Ahern says the manpower shortage has the department exploring other options, including contracting the work to the private sector.

"I am not happy where our progress has been," Mr. Ahern told a House panel last week.

The Customs-Trade Partnership Against Terrorism (C-TPAT) was initiated after the September 11 attacks to secure the cargo chain from port to port. Companies that open their doors to full security inspections get fewer checks at ports of arrival and faster processing.

Although critical of the program's sluggish pace, Rep. Loretta Sanchez, California Democrat, endorsed the idea of outsourcing.

"We are relying on companies that we haven't even gone out to check to see if in fact they have the security things in place that you said they had," says Miss Sanchez, ranking member of the House Homeland Security subcommittee on economic security, infrastructure protection and cybersecurity.

"I mean, you have 80 people that can't possibly check these 10,000 companies. What about having somebody else check them?" said Miss Sanchez, who formally asked the agency to consider privatizing the work.

"We have, to this point, resisted the notion of third-party validators. We think it is a responsibility that we should be doing in the government, and not necessarily contracting it out. However, given the current situation ... we want to have more parties involved with a trusted program. We want to have the largest corporations in the industry, the importers reaching back to their suppliers, vendors, manufacturers, putting levels of security in place throughout the supply chain," Mr. Ahern said.

"So perhaps we are coming to a point in time where, in certain environments with certain countries that may not be of a significant risk, maybe [using] the third-party validator has a [place] for us. So we are going to be evaluating that with new eyes, but to this point we have been opposed to it," Mr. Ahern said.

Suzanne Trevino, a spokeswoman for CBP, said yesterday that her agency is looking at the prospect of hiring third parties to validate security.

"At this point, the only thing we will say is that we will look at it, but we have not started a formal process. We don't have the resources to complete the validation necessary or that Congress wants," Mrs. Trevino said.

Last March, the Government Accountability Office criticized the program and cited weaknesses in the validation process, which it said "is not rigorous enough to achieve its stated purpose, which is to ensure that the security procedures outlined in members' security profiles are reliable, accurate and effective."

As of Nov. 2, 2004, more than 7,300 applications had been filed. Of them, 4,153 had been certified and slightly more than 400 validated. Almost 3,000 applications have since been filed.

Peter Tirschwell, publisher of the Journal of Commerce, called the Homeland Security idea an "outsourcing of security."

DOJ_NMG_0019851

"They exist in a commercial environment to facilitate commercial transactions. Something as important as our national security, asking them to perform what is a government role -- it's hard to see how that could be successful," he said.

The move comes on the heels of furor over a plan for a Dubai company to operate terminals in six U.S. ports. Asked whether the current mood against foreign companies operating in matters of national security might affect this proposal, Mr. Tirschwell said, "I think it would not be looked at favorably."

Seth Stodder, former director of policy and planning for Customs and Border Protection, said private validation firms can serve as a "force multiplier" but the final responsibility has to lie with the government.

"The devil's always in the details, but in the abstract, I think it's a good idea to help CBP get more validators out there, and that's critical," said Mr. Stodder, who works with the lobbying firm Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld LLP.

"There is a need to step up validation and make it faster, but there are hurdles to think about when using third parties -- training and management, vetting employees," Mr. Stodder said.

Dubai Will Delay Another Acquisition Involving U.S. Plants (NYT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

The Dubai government delayed its $1.2 billion purchase of a military equipment maker yesterday, the second time in a month that a takeover by the Middle East emirate has been jeopardized by American security concerns.

Dubai International Capital, owned by the government of the Persian Gulf emirate, said that it would delay its acquisition of the Doncasters Group, a British company that has nine plants in the United States, by as much as two months from March 31 while government agencies review the purchase.

"After what happened with Dubai Ports, the government is looking at this deal more closely," Sameer al-Ansari, Dubai International's chief executive, said in an interview.

Dubai International is buying Doncasters from the Royal Bank of Scotland Group, its owner since 2001. Shaun Gamble, a spokesman for the Royal Bank of Scotland in London, declined to comment yesterday.

Dubai's purchase of Doncasters, which was agreed to on Dec. 14, may ignite a political debate in the United States similar to that caused last month by the $6.8 billion purchase of the Peninsular & Oriental Steam Navigation Company by DP World, a Dubai-owned company. Succumbing to political pressure over that deal, DP World had to agree to sell its interests in United States terminals. Revenue from Doncasters's American plants, which make parts for tanks and military aircraft, account for about 40 percent of total sales.

"If this deal isn't approved by the U.S., it wouldn't proceed," said Angus Blair, chief executive of Mena Financial, a company in London that advises foreign companies about doing business in the Middle East. "Forty percent is too big to ignore," Mr. Blair said.

The Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, a federal body that considers the sale of American assets to foreign companies, started a detailed 45-day investigation into the Doncasters agreement at the end of February, Mr. Ansari said.

Currency Flow And Trade (WT)

By Michael R. Czinkota

The Washington Times, March 21, 2006

The policy eclat over the acquisition of selected U.S. port operations by Dubai appears to be over. There were threats byCongress to pass legislation prohibiting such ownership, countered by statements that President Bush would veto any such legislation. Now, the Dubai owners have decided to spin off the U.S. operations from the global conglomerate which they have purchased. Yet, there may be significant long-term consequences for currency values and trade practices.

Most of the public discussion of this sordid affair has reflected the growing sensitivity in the United States to ownership and control of assets by non-domestic entities. The debate has focused heavily on possible discrimination against Muslim investors, protection against terrorism in U.S. ports and retaliation against U.S. investors abroad.

What appears to be not yet widely understood are the potential effects that these and similar policy decisions (such as the Unocal walk-away by China) can have on the value of global currencies and on trade flows. Congress' law of unintended consequences may strike again: The short-term direct effects of this action are likely to be far outweighed by the long-run indirect effects.

The United States has experienced more than 20 years of current-account deficits. It imports more than it exports. In past years, every month has brought more news about growing trade deficits, now up to $68.5 billion per month. It is hard to remember that President Nixon decided to abandon the fixed-exchange rate system for the Western world because of an annual imbalance of $5 billion. But we do see in more recent times that, typically, nations with a current-account deficit above 5 percent of gross domestic product (GDP) have experienced grave domestic and international consequences.

Even though the current imbalance is approaching 6 percent of GDP, these harsh consequences have not occurred in the United States. There the conditions are special: They are influenced by a high willingness of other countries to hold U.S. dollars, a substantial ability of foreign individuals and institutions to lend those dollars to the United States and a high U.S. capability to embed the dollar as a global currency. As a result, there is a surface picture of tranquility which has abounded in global trade and currency markets.

However, we know that this trend will have to change. Eventually, the United States will have to export more and import less. The key questions are how to achieve such change, how long to wait for such change and whether it should occur through market forces or through government intervention. It does appear that in addition to growing international competitiveness of U.S. firms, changes in the value of the U.S. dollar are needed to reverse the astounding trade imbalances.

The Dubai withdrawal may well be the watershed that triggers shifts in exchange rates now. The congressional debate, the national posture and the global repercussions may well form the basis of new Plaza Agreement-type conditions, which will gradually drive down the value of the dollar for the long term.

The pronouncements by Congress, the growing public debate and the withdrawal plans of the foreign investors directly play to the emotions of investors. The message is clear: Investments and ownership by foreign capital holders will be scrutinized with new rules, and may well be attacked, rejected or publicly scorned. This will be done regardless of plans made by the administration or commitments made to global agreements.

In other words, confidence in the U.S. dollar has been challenged by the U.S. itself. We know that money is just a piece of paper. What matters most in setting its value is the psychology behind it -- the trust, outlook and confidence in the government that has issued the money. Investors may be shaken by the public response to the port-acquisition plans, but Mr. Bush's steadfast embrace of foreign funds is an important counterpoint which reduces the urgency of the concerns, lets any shift come slowly and results in a soft landing.

The uncertainty and therefore the risk for anyone holding dollars or dollar-based assets has now increased. Such a change influences the perceptions of investors and their actions. Fewer investments from abroad into the United States and a decrease in dollar holdings will depreciate the price of the dollar, making imports more expensive and exports cheaper. In addition, continued discussions may affect U.S. public opinion and eventually change the views, brand preferences and country-of-origin sensitivity of American buyers.

This almost kabuki-like political interaction on port ownership may well presage a long-delayed and necessary shift in trade outcomes. What appears to be an unfulfilled policy debate on foreign investment may yet stimulateimportant changes in trade patterns which are based on market forces rather than government intervention.

The AP, March 20, 2006

A House committee said Monday it would review several post-Katrina hurricane contracts for waste and abuse, citing recent concerns about limited oversight and the haste in which they were awarded.

The Government Reform Committee will hold at least one hearing in April, said Robert White, a spokesman for chairman Tom Davis, R-Va. Witnesses and the specific contracts that will be scrutinized have yet to be determined, he said.

Last week, the Government Accountability Office reported in its first preliminary overview of Katrina contracts that the government wasted millions of dollars, including at least $3 million for 4,000 beds that were never used. The report blamed in part mismanagement and poor planning by agencies.

Rep. Henry Waxman (news, bio, voting record), the senior Democrat on the panel, suggested earlier Monday that Davis to hold hearings on Katrina contracting. Waxman has proposed creating an independent, anti-fraud commission and has criticized congressional oversight of the hurricane recovery effort.

A House select committee also chaired by Davis issued a report last month saying waste in government contracts was due largely to poor planning. In one case, Mississippi officials requested from the Federal Emergency Management Agency 450 trucks of water and ice. After FEMA could not immediately deliver it, state officials were forced to buy from the commercial market at an untold cost, the report said.

"We spent five months investigating Katrina, including the contract issues," White said. "We understand there needs to be further review — GAO report or no."

New Orleans Mayor Backs Building Plan (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, March 20 -- Mayor C. Ray Nagin (D) finished work Monday on a plan to rebuild New Orleans, endorsing a proposal that would allow all residents to rebuild their homes in neighborhoods shattered by Hurricane Katrina.

The mayor's advisory commission, formed after Katrina struck Aug. 29, recommended in January that some flooded neighborhoods be replaced with parks and that the city take a go-slow attitude in rebuilding low-lying areas. But that suggestion was greeted with jeers and outrage at public meetings.

Nagin, who is running for reelection on April 22, distanced himself from that plan.

On Monday, he offered to let residents rebuild anywhere but warned that homeowners in flood-prone areas would do so at their own risk. "I'm confident that the citizens can decide intelligently for themselves," Nagin said.

The report also recommended revamping schools, and a wish list of projects included new light-rail systems, new riverfront development and better flood protection.

"It has been controversial in some respects, but I am pleased by the results," Nagin told hundreds of residents who gathered to hear about the plan.

The release of the report came hours after civil rights groups took aim at the state's plan for rebuilding. Critics said that plan gives short shrift to poor and low-income victims, focusing too much on bailing out homeowners and encouraging high-end development at the expense of low-income renters.

If a White House proposal is approved by Congress, the bulk of Louisiana's reconstruction would be funded with $9.2 billion in federal grants using a plan by Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D).

Blanco's plan still needs approval by the state legislature, the Department of Housing and Urban Development, and the Louisiana Recovery Authority.

More Katrina Fatalities Could Be Found (LAT)

By Ann M. Simmons

The Los Angeles Times, March 21, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — The discovery of two bodies in the wreckage of a neighborhood devastated by Hurricane Katrina seven months ago has served as an unsettling omen to families still searching for missing relatives.

Eight bodies have been found since March 1, and with about 1,400 people still unaccounted for, Louisiana state officials said they could not rule out the possibility of finding others.

Until recently, recovery teams were unable to retrieve bodies from the neighborhoods that were rendered uninhabitable and designated off-limits to residents.

The two bodies found Sunday in the rubble of a collapsed home in the city's Lower 9th Ward have not been identified.

Investigators with the Orleans Parish coroner's office, which recently took over the process of identifying and releasing the remains of Katrina victims, would not say precisely where they found the bodies or comment on their condition.

"All I can say is we picked up two bodies," said John Gagliano, the coroner's chief investigator. "I don't have any more information as to the identification. We haven't done anything with them yet."

The hurricane left 1,287 people dead in Louisiana.

Until early March, the federal government's Disaster Mortuary Operational Response Team was in charge of alerting families when a deceased relative had been identified, and then releasing the remains to the appropriate funeral home. That task now falls to the parish coroner.

The New Orleans Fire Department has been using dogs to sniff out human remains in targeted areas.

The state-contracted Find Family National Call Center has received 11,601 phone calls since September to report people missing after the storm. As of Monday, 1,445 had not been accounted for, according to Kristin Meyer, public information officer with the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals.

However, officials said that most of the unaccounted-for were probably alive.

"We expect 300 to 400 will be really, truly missing," said Melissa Walker, another state health department spokeswoman. "Some might have died and been washed out to sea, and we'll never ever know." Others might be intentionally missing, she said.

"They've moved on with their lives and don't want to be found," Walker added.

Walker said that between 30 to 50 people, initially thought to be missing, were being located every day.

DOJ_NMG_0019854

Meyer said that in many cases, people moving from evacuation shelter to trailer to other temporary housing haven't been able to contact family. When they finally do connect, relatives who filed a missing-persons report don't always inform authorities that their loved one has been found.

Walker said the Baton Rouge-based Find Family National Call Center receives about 150 calls a day from families looking for relatives. Between 10 and 15 of them are new callers.

Relatives are required to fill out an eight-page report with detailed information, including unique physical identifiers such as birthmarks and tattoos.

A file is opened on each person reported missing. The name is run through several missing-persons databases, including that of the state police and groups such as the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children.

Still, residents and community activists said it was crucial to monitor the demolition of homes — which recently started in some neighborhoods — to ensure that proper searches were being made and that remains of victims could receive a decent burial.

"We have people who go out to where they're planning to bulldoze a home and make sure they've checked with cadaver dogs first," said Lisa Fithian, a spokeswoman for Common Ground, an all-volunteer grass-roots relief organization. "We try to make sure that whatever bulldozing is done, is done correctly."

Sunday's discovery sent chills down Valerie Schexnayder's spine. Until January, most of her immediate family had been scattered across several states, and there were moments of worry that some might be lost.

"I feel very grateful to the Lord that my family is reunited together," said Schexnayder, 60, whose house in the Lower 9th Ward was damaged beyond repair. "But I have some cousins, and we can't find them all. I hope they're all alive and well."

New Orleans Lacks Emergency Shelter As Storm Season Nears (USAT)

By Anne Rochell Konigsmark And Mimi Hall

USA Today, March 21, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — As hurricane season approaches, the city doesn't have an emergency shelter, and local officials are asking for federal help to get people out of harm's way if another disaster strikes.

Residents who can't leave town on their own ahead of an oncoming storm during hurricane season, which begins June 1 and runs through November, will be asked to board buses at the city's downtown convention center. They'll then be shuttled to shelters in outlying areas.

“The emphasis will be on survivability, and that means getting out of the impact area,” said Terry Ebbert, the city's director of homeland security.

Ebbert said he fears that without federal help, citizens could be stranded in the city with nowhere to go. Neither New Orleans nor Louisiana has the resources to evacuate and shelter large numbers of residents, and the federal government has not yet committed needed aid, Ebbert said.

Ebbert sent written requests for help recently to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and R. David Paulison, the acting director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, both of whom he criticized for not reacting quickly enough. “The silence has been deafening,” Ebbert said.

The federal Homeland Security Department is working on hurricane preparation in Louisiana, said the department's preparedness chief, George Foresman. “As they identify their gaps and shortfalls … that's where we're going to make sure there's a contingency plan in place,” he said.

Foresman and FEMA will be in the region this week to get a “clear, blunt assessment” of what's needed, Chertoff said Monday.

The city has dropped the idea of using the Superdome or any other city structure as a shelter. During Hurricane Katrina, which hit New Orleans on Aug. 29, the Superdome became a nightmare for 20,000 residents who rode out the storm there. The roof peeled off and it rained inside; the building lost power and it became dark and hot; toilets stopped working; and food and water became scarce.

“I am never going to do a shelter of last resort again,” New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said.

If there is a massive evacuation of southeast Louisiana, as there was ahead of Katrina, “there won't be enough buses,” said Jeff Smith, acting director of the Governor's Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparedness. “The federal government needs to step in. But they have been very slow to respond.”

Chertoff said his department has finished early assessments of state preparedness and evacuation plans and will work closely with the Gulf Coast states to make sure they have whatever they need to handle the next storm season. Homeland Security also has to “get our own house in order,” Chertoff said.

DOJ_NMG_0019855

To that end, the department is working on plans to better track supplies sent in to victims, handle hundreds of thousands of phone calls in the aftermath of a bad storm and better manage debris removal. Chertoff also urged citizens to do more to prepare on their own: "You cannot count on help coming in the first 24 to 48 hours (after) a catastrophe."

WAR NEWS:

President Offers Iraqi City As Proof Of Success In War (ABJ)

By Carl Chancellor And Lisa A. Abraham

Akron Beacon Journal, March 21, 2006

CLEVELAND - Iraq is the central front in the war on terror and the United States will not abandon that front until democracy is established, President Bush said Monday.

Bush came to the City Club of Cleveland to lay out his vision for peace and democracy in the Middle East in an effort to bolster support for the war in Iraq, now entering its fourth year.

``In the face of continued reports about killings and reprisals, I understand how some Americans have had their confidence shaken," he said. ``Others look at the violence each night on their television screens and wonder how I can remain so optimistic about the prospects for success in Iraq. They wonder what I see that they don't."

Bush said he sees the successes, and spoke in detail about the liberation of Tal Afar -- an Iraqi city that he said was roughly the size of Akron -- some 35 miles from the Syrian border.

Bush said the city had become a stronghold for terrorists, who brutalized residents and intimidated them through violence.

The town, liberated in September 2004, quickly fell into the hands of al-Qaeda again when local police weren't able to maintain order.

Terrorists planned to use the city as a strategic base where al-Qaeda could plan new attacks on the United States, he said.

But Bush said the United States was able to change its tactics to reclaim the city again -- this time for good -- by using the new strategy of ``clear, hold and build."

Bush admitted that, in the past, coalition troops would go into a town like Tal Afar and drive out insurgents. And when coalition troops eventually left, the insurgents would return.

When troops returned to Tal Afar in 2005, he said, they drove out the terrorists, but this time Iraqi troops remained in place -- a move that has ensured the continued stability of the city.

``The people of Tal Afar have shown that Iraqis do want peace and freedom," Bush said.

The president said the United States must continue to fight the war on terror on whatever front necessary, including Iraq and Afghanistan.

``If we were not fighting this enemy in Iraq, they would not be idle," he said. ``They would be plotting and trying to kill Americans across the world and within our own borders."

Bush said more days of sacrifice and fighting are ahead, but he predicted that freedom would prevail, in the same way that Germany and Japan were turned into democracies after World War II. He said a democratic Iraq would one day serve as an inspiration for freedom throughout the Middle East.

``The United States will not abandon Iraq," Bush said. ``We will not leave that country to the terrorists who attacked America and want to attack us again. We will leave Iraq, but when we do, it will be from a position of strength, not weakness.

``Americans have never retreated in the face of thugs and assassins and we will not begin now."

Bush Asks U.S. To Look Past Iraq Bloodshed (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, March 20, 2006

Beginning the fourth year of an unpopular war, President Bush defended his Iraq record on Monday against skeptical questioning. He said he could "understand people being disheartened" but appealed to Americans to look beyond the bloodshed and see signs of progress.

Bush fielded questions for nearly an hour at the City Club, a forum known for its tough interrogations of world leaders. Not only was he grilled on Iraq, but he also was asked to justify his warrantless wiretapping program, U.S. relations with Pakistan and his domestic priorities.

The president was asked why he deemed Iraq — which turned out not to have weapons of mass destruction — as enough of a threat three years ago to launch an invasion, in contrast to nuclear-ambitious Iran today.

DOJ_NMG_0019856

"One difference was that, in Iraq, there was a series of unanimous (U.N. Security Council) resolutions that basically held the Iraqi government to account, which Saddam Hussein ignored," Bush said. Still, he said Iran was a concern, on the question of nuclear weapons and on its role in Iraq.

The White House has accused Iran of meddling in Iraqi politics and of supporting armed militias in Iraq by sending men and weapons, including components for increasingly lethal roadside bombs. Iran and the United States have agreed to talk about Iraq, but Bush said, "It's very important, however, for the Iranians to understand that the discussion is limited to Iraq. We feel like they need to know our position."

As the president delivered the latest installment in an upbeat defense of his Iraq policy, opponents used the day after the third anniversary of the invasion to step up their criticism.

Three potential 2008 presidential candidates — Democratic Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel (news, bio, voting record) of Nebraska — offered critical assessments at the International Association of Firefighters' legislative conference in Washington.

Biden said it was time for Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to "be told to go home" and for Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "be given his walking papers." Richardson said U.S. involvement in Iraq had been "badly mismanaged by the administration."

Hagel, in an interview at the conference, said many of the predictions and promises made by the administration have fallen short, such as that oil revenues would pay for the war and the conflict would be short. He also pointed to Vice President Dick Cheney's assertion last May that the insurgency was in its "last throes."

"There's been a credibility erosion for three years," Hagel said.

On Capitol Hill, some Democrats said there had been progress in Iraq, as Bush asserted, but they said it was clouded by problems across the country. They said Bush had gone to war without enough troops.

"Some positive signs do not mitigate this administration's gross miscalculations and stunning incompetence in Iraq," said Rep. Steny Hoyer (news, bio, voting record) of Maryland, the No. 2 Democrat in the House.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said the "policies of the Bush administration and the civilian leadership of our military have made America less safe and left Iraq on the precipice of all-out civil war."

Bush pointed to success in stabilizing an insurgent stronghold in Tal Afar, a northern Iraqi city of 200,000 near the Syrian border.

"The strategy that worked so well in Tal Afar did not emerge overnight," Bush said. "It took time to understand and adjust to the brutality of the enemy in Iraq."

"The example of Tal Afar gives me confidence in our strategy," the president said.

One woman asked Bush whether he saw terrorism as a sign of the biblical Apocalypse, and a man followed up with how he could restore confidence in U.S. leadership after several reasons for going to war with Iraq later proved false.

"Like you, I mean, I asked that very same question: Where'd we go wrong on intelligence?" Bush said. He said he was working to improve intelligence gathering because "the credibility of our country is essential."

As for the Apocalypse, Bush said, "I haven't really thought of it that way. ... I guess I'm more of a practical fellow."

Bush bantered with the audience at times. And despite the probing questions, he received several rounds of enthusiastic applause.

"Anybody work here in this town?" Bush joked to laughter as he responded to question after question.

The White House made no attempt to screen either the audience or the questions, said spokesman Scott McClellan.

However, much of downtown near the hotel where Bush spoke was barricaded off. About 100 anti-war protesters chanted for the Republican president to leave the heavily Democratic city, held signs with peace messages and banged on drums.

Inside, not all the questions challenged Bush's war rationale.

One member of the audience invited him back for the Cleveland Hungarian Revolution 50th Anniversary next October. Others complimented him on his vision for a nuclear treaty with India and for his "very enlightening" comments about Iraq.

Cheney, attending a political fundraiser in Hanoverton, in northeast Ohio, also defended U.S. involvement in Iraq and said decisions on troop levels would be made without political consideration.

"Our coalition is also helping to build an Iraqi security force that is well trained and well equipped," Cheney said.

Old Forecasts Come Back To Haunt Bush (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0019857

Three years of upbeat White House assessments about Iraq that turned out to be premature, incomplete or plain wrong are complicating President Bush's efforts to restore public faith in the military operation and his presidency, according to pollsters and Republican lawmakers and strategists.

The last two weeks have provided a snapshot of White House optimism that skeptics contend is at odds with the facts on the ground in Iraq.

Vice President Cheney said Sunday that his 10-month-old claim that the insurgency was in its "last throes" was "basically accurate" and reflects reality. Since Cheney's original comment, on at least 70 days there have been violent attacks that in each instance killed more than 10 people. Two weeks ago, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said the United States is making "very, very good progress" -- less than 48 hours before the U.S ambassador warned of a possible civil war breaking out. And Bush yesterday said his optimism flows in part from success in Tall Afar, a city in northern Iraq, though local residents there said sectarian violence is spreading.

Pollsters and some congressional Republicans said the administration's sunny-side-up appraisals, instead of lifting the public mood, may now complicate the task of sustaining support for a long-term military commitment in Iraq. The loss of trust, they said, is affecting Bush's presidency more broadly, as polls show his public support at a nadir.

Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.) said in an interview that Cheney was wrong about the insurgency being in its last throes and that she sent word to the White House recently to level with the American people about the challenges. "We need to assume that things are going to be very hard because when you do, you plan accordingly," said Wilson. "I am always cautious about always seeing things in the best light because war is not like that" and the public knows it.

Michael Dimock, associate director of the nonpartisan Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, said a recent survey by his group showed the public skeptical toward Bush, about both his administrative competency and his personal credibility. Only 40 percent of respondents said Bush was trustworthy, a 22-point drop from September of 2003, six months after the invasion of Iraq.

Dimock said the cumulative effect of the past three years has made Bush's public-relations challenge imposing, and perhaps impossible. "When you give a speech and try to persuade people that they are only hearing the bad and things are going better than the media is saying, if a majority of people say they do not find you trustworthy, it is hard to be persuasive," he said.

Frank Newport of the nonpartisan Gallup polling organization said White House efforts to turn around public opinion are complicated now because Bush is waging the wrong argument. His polling shows a majority of Americans agree with Bush that troops should not be pulled out immediately and that Iraq is better off now and will be in the future as a result of the invasion, two points the president made yesterday. Yet 6 out of 10 said the war was not worth it because, Newport said, the public does not see an upside for the United States. "The focus for Americans is Americans," he said.

Newport, whose survey found a 26-point drop in the number of people who find Bush trustworthy since the 2003 invasion, said Bush can restore his standing on Iraq, on his credibility and on other issues by improving his overall popularity -- a feat past slumping second-term presidents have found difficult to pull off. The erosion in the public's support for Bush at a personal level is a striking reversal for a president who for most of his first term was described by the public as a strong and trustworthy leader, especially on national security measures.

This erosion in trust is not a new phenomenon for a wartime president. Lyndon B. Johnson's upbeat appraisals of progress in the Vietnam War proved wrong so often that by 1967 commentators spoke of his "credibility gap" with the public, a liability that soon helped push him out of office.

In recent months, Bush has moved to talk more candidly about the problems in Iraq and yesterday said repeatedly that he understood the public's concerns. But it has not stopped his slide in the polls.

There also has been a steady drumbeat of criticism -- from Democrats in particular -- that the administration should have been more forthright about the war and its cost from the outset. There were the famous claims by Cheney and others that U.S. troops would be greeted as liberators after the invasion. Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), a strong supporter of the war, said that was true -- to a point. "The same people who cheer when you get rid of someone they hate might not be so happy" when you occupy their country for three-plus years, he said.

Other statements were proved wrong. The weapons of mass destruction the administration said Saddam Hussein possessed before the war have never been found -- and many experts believe never existed. White House officials hammered then-chief economic adviser Lawrence B. Lindsey for claiming the war could cost as little as $100 billion, saying the estimate was too high. The actual tally is fast approaching four times that amount, according to the Congressional Research Service, which estimates a $360 billion price tag to date.

Perhaps the most famous rosy statement came nearly three years ago when Bush proclaimed: "We have seen the turning of the tide" under a banner that read "Mission Accomplished." Since then, more than 2,300 Americans have died in Iraq.

Bush Defends Iraq Policy Before Tough Questioning (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson

Knight Ridder, March 20, 2006

CLEVELAND - Hoping to shore up support for the Iraq war, President Bush opened himself to questions at a rare public forum Monday and got an earful from skeptics who questioned his motives and his credibility.

Speaking to the City Club of Cleveland, Bush acknowledged that many Americans don't share his confidence that Iraq can become a stable democracy. The freewheeling question-and-answer session that followed his prepared remarks gave skeptics a chance to confront the president directly.

Bush seemed taken aback when the first questioner asked him whether he views the conflict in biblical terms, as an apocalyptic struggle for the Middle East. Some of the president's critics have speculated that his Christianity and a wish to protect the Holy Land are behind his desire to transform the Middle East.

"The answer is, I haven't really thought of it that way," he replied. "First I've heard of that, by the way. I guess I'm more of a practical fella."

Bush said his primary concern was protecting Americans from another terrorist attack.

Another questioner suggested that the president had damaged his credibility in the run-up to war by linking Iraq to terrorism and weapons of mass destruction.

"That's a great question," Bush said before taking issue with the assertion that he had tied Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein to the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001.

"I was careful never to say that Saddam Hussein ordered the attack on America," he said.

While that's true, the president did link Iraq to 9-11 in other ways.

For example, in a letter to Congress at the start of the war, Bush said the use of force against Iraq "is consistent with the United States and other countries continuing to take the necessary actions against international terrorists and terrorist organizations, including those nations, organizations or persons who planned, authorized, committed, or aided the terrorist attacks that occurred on September 11, 2001."

As for weapons of mass destruction, the president said the incorrect assumptions about Iraq's arsenal were an international intelligence failure.

"I asked that very same question: Where'd we go wrong on intelligence?" he said. "The credibility of our country is very important. I agree with you."

Another questioner asked why Bush had ordered an invasion of Iraq but is relying on diplomacy in the dispute over Iran's nuclear programs. The president said he felt he had exhausted diplomatic options with Iraq.

"The Iran issue is just beginning to play out," he added.

But Bush stressed that he's willing to go to war with Iran to protect Israel.

"I've made it clear, and I'll make it clear again, that we will use military might to protect our ally, Israel," he said.

A college student expressed concerns about the cost of the war, suggesting that the money spent in Iraq could be better used to help pay college tuitions at home.

"We can do more than one thing at one time," the president said.

The tough questions - all delivered in polite and respectful terms - were striking because Bush typically appears before audiences dominated by screened Republican supporters.

The City Club, a 94-year-old civic organization, bills itself as a "citadel for free speech" and insists that guest speakers take questions. Despite the obvious skepticism of some audience members, the president appeared to win over the crowd with his friendly banter and willingness to engage critics.

"He's got to get out and do more of this," retired radiologist Ted Castele said after the 90-minute session. "There are a lot of concerns, serious concerns."

Polls show that most Americans think the war was a mistake and don't expect a good outcome.

"I understand how some Americans have had their confidence shaken," Bush said. "They wonder what I see that they don't."

The president devoted most of his speech to declaring progress in Iraq, and cited the long campaign to rid the northern city of Tal Afar of terrorists as an example. Yet he also conceded:

"I wish I could tell you that the progress made in Tal Afar is the same in every part of Iraq. It is not." But "the example of Tal Afar gives me confidence in our strategy," he said.

Audience Peppers Bush With Questions About Iraq (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0019859

By David Jackson
USA Today, March 21, 2006

President Bush has often appeared before invitation-only audiences that tend to lob him softballs during question-and-answer sessions. But not Monday, when he took some tough questions from residents in Cleveland.

Most of the queries dealt with the Iraq war as it entered its fourth year — the financial costs, disputed rationales, and even whether the conflict is a sign of a coming apocalypse.

"Anybody work here in this town?" Bush joked during the 91-minute session that began with a speech about his Iraq strategy, but switched to Q&A.

Bush has opened himself up to audience questions more frequently in recent months, starting with a December speech on Iraq before the Philadelphia World Affairs Council. Last week, he took critical questions on his prescription-drug program at a senior citizens center in Maryland.

Bush clearly enjoys the repartee. Adam Levine, a former Bush assistant press secretary, says the president is "at his best" in a give-and-take. More important, this lets him bypass the media.

"When the noise level gets to a certain point, it's important for the president to communicate directly with people," Levine says.

About time, some political analysts say. "Going public, that's the strategy that seems wisest," given Bush's low approval ratings, says Shirley Anne Warshaw, professor of political science at Gettysburg College in Pennsylvania. "Americans are very forgiving of their leaders." Bush's approval rating was at 36% in a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll taken March 10-12.

Audience members, invited by the City Club of Cleveland, pressed him on the war. A woman cited a book whose author says the Bush administration has reached out to "radical" Christians who see the war and terrorism as signs of a coming apocalypse. "Do you believe this?" she asked.

Bush won audience sympathy with his halting answer: "The answer is," he said and paused. "I haven't really thought of it that way," he said finally, to audience laughter. "First I've heard of that, by the way." Bush then repeated his oft-stated contention that victory in Iraq is a key to success in the overall war on terrorism.

A man asked about what he said were the administration's prewar claims that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction, sponsored the9/11 terrorists, and had purchased nuclear-bomb materials. "All three of those turned out to be false," the questioner said. Bush disputed him: "I don't think we ever said — at least I know I didn't say — that there was a direct connection between September the 11th and Saddam Hussein. We did say he was a state sponsor of terror."

A questioner who said he was a high school student asked: "Mr. President, with the war in Iraq costing $19,600 per U.S. household, how do you expect a generation of young people such as ourselves to afford college?"

Bush questioned the student's premise: "Hold on, we can do more than one thing at one time," he said, insisting the economy was robust enough for national defense and student loans.

Before the Q&A, Bush devoted his speech to the "clear, hold and build" strategy in Iraq. He focused on the city of Tal Afar, where he said U.S.-led forces have cleared out terrorists and helped build democratic institutions. He called that an "example of progress in Iraq that most Americans do not see every day in their newspapers or on their television screens."

In an aside about Iran's nuclear ambitions and threats against Israel, Bush promised to use "military might to protect our ally Israel, (though) our objective is to solve this issue diplomatically."

There were some friends there. A man who said he represented the Cleveland Hungarian Revolution 50th Anniversary Committee noted that his group has a major event coming up in October.

"I'm not sure what I'm doing in October," Bush said to more laughter. "Put me down as a 'maybe.' "

Bush Urges U.S. To Take Long-Term View Toward Iraq (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang
The Los Angeles Times, March 21, 2006

CLEVELAND — Three years after the United States launched the invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein, President Bush said today that the overhauled U.S. strategy of clearing insurgents from the cities and then using Iraqi and U.S. forces to rebuild was succeeding.

The president cited the rebound by the city of Tal Afar, which U.S. forces abandoned in the autumn of 2004 after successfully battling insurgents, only to see the fighters return in two months. Bush said that with concerted military efforts followed by rebuilding the civic structures and holding elections, "the terrorists are becoming marginalized."

"The strategy is working," the president said.

Today's speech was the second in a series of at least three that the president is delivering to mark the anniversary of the start of the Iraq war. Each is intended to draw attention to one aspect of the conflict that, according to the administration, demonstrates that the United States is meeting its goals there — the daily reports of chaos and death notwithstanding.

Facing polls that increasingly indicate that the American people are turning away from their earlier support for the invasion and war, Bush acknowledged that the images of bombings, beheadings and other attacks on Iraqi civilians were horrific.

"Nobody likes beheadings," the president said.

And he said it was "not easy to capture in a short clip on the evening news" the signs of progress. They are not as visually dramatic, he said, as a bombing in a marketplace.

Last Monday, Bush acknowledged that the violence continued to tear the country apart. He said U.S.-trained Iraqi forces were increasingly taking a leading role in securing the nation and would be responsible for more than half the country by the end of the year.

Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), a critic of Bush's Iraq policy, pointed out Sunday that this includes vast stretches of uninhabited desert.

"The fighting has been tough," Bush told the Cleveland audience. "The enemy that we face has proved to be brutal and relentless There will be more days of sacrifice and tough fighting before the victory is achieved."

But, the president said, with the new control exercised over Tal Afar and other towns and cities, "most of the country has remained relatively peaceful."

The president's audience, gathered at midday at a downtown hotel, was the City Club of Cleveland, a nonpartisan organization founded in 1912 that says it is the oldest "continuous free speech forum" in the United States. It responded with only occasional displays of enthusiasm, interrupting Bush's speech with applause for the first time nearly 28 minutes after he began speaking, when he said, "The decision to remove Saddam Hussein was the right decision."

The president spoke for an hour and a half, with nearly an hour of it spent answering questions from the audience. For a president whose public appearances are usually carefully choreographed, the questions were penetrating and critical.

The first was about "prophetic Christians" who see the war in Iraq as an early sign of the apocalypse.

To a question about the false premises for going to war — that Iraq was developing weapons of mass destruction, that it was buying materials for nuclear weapons from Niger and that it was becoming a haven for terrorists — Bush said, "I asked the very same question: Where did we go wrong on intelligence?"

A high school student, asserting that the war was costing $19,600 per household, wondered whether that money could be put to better use as college tuition aid.

"We can do more than one thing at a time," Bush replied.

Bush's speeches reflect a two-fold campaign: To lower expectations and at the same time hold out prospects for a successful outcome. Unless pressed by a questioner, the president makes no mention any more of one of the original reasons for the invasion: the suspicion that Hussein was developing unconventional weapons. No evidence of such a program has been found.

Rather, Bush focuses on the effort to establish democracy in a part of the world where it is rare, and on placing Iraq at the center of his effort to secure the United States from terrorist attacks.

He has also avoided the optimistic language that Vice President Dick Cheney has used. Ten months ago the vice president said that the insurgency was in its "last throes" and three years ago, as the invasion began, he predicted that U.S. troops would be greeted as liberators.

White House aides have concluded that Bush would lose credibility with such a rosy scenario.

The speech today was intended, said White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan, to demonstrate "how we have adapted to circumstances on the ground — we've seen problems and we've changed our approach to meet the realities on the ground."

In Tal Afar, which Bush said here in Ohio was roughly equivalent in population to Akron's 200,000 or so, the United States took a new approach. Rather than fighting terrorists, expelling them and leaving, Bush said, it executed a policy of "clear, hold and build." Military units expelled insurgents from the city and surrounding towns, and U.S.-trained Iraqi troops stayed behind to hold the city and work with local leaders to rebuild the economy.

"Spreading democracy and liberty is at the heart of our strategy of defeating the terrorists," Bush said.

By citing such examples, Bush is seeking to refute the sense that the United States is slipping deeper into a sinkhole from which it has no exit strategy.

DOJ_NMG_0019861

That view has been reinforced by the increasing displays of sectarian violence dividing Sunni and Shiite Muslims. Today, McClellan disputed the assessment of the former Iraqi prime minister, Ayad Allawi, once a strong U.S. ally, that the fighting had turned into a civil war.

In a CNN/USA Today/Gallup national survey released last week, 55% of Americans said that chaos and civil war were the most likely outcomes in Iraq; 40% said they expected that a stable government would be formed. Only 37% of those polled said they believed the war in Iraq had been worth the cost — a sharp decline from 46% in January. Fully 60% of those surveyed said the war had not been worth the cost, equaling the highest percentage Gallup has ever recorded on that question.

And a poll released last week by the Pew Research Center found that public support for keeping U.S. troops in Iraq had reached its lowest point since the 2003 invasion. Half of the respondents said they wanted to bring U.S. troops home as soon as possible, compared with 44% who said the troops should stay "until the situation is stabilized."

Elsewhere today, the war's critics also took note of the anniversary.

Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware, the senior Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, noted that the invasion "got rid of a brutal dictator. And that's good. But we may be on the verge of trading him for chaos and a new terror haven in the Middle East.

"That's a bad bargain for America's security," the senator said.

He said such an outcome was looking increasingly likely "because of the dangerous incompetence of this administration."

The president's recent visits to Ohio have generated political controversy.

Sen. Mike DeWine, a Republican running for reelection, did not join Bush today, prompting Phil Singer, the spokesman for the Democratic Senate Campaign Committee, to say, "George Bush has become an albatross around the neck of the Republican Party."

Bush Concedes Iraq Grim But Sees Signs Of Progress (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush entered the fourth year of war in Iraq on Monday with a dramatically detailed and graphic accounting of violence there and allowed that many Americans have trouble accepting the successes he claims in a conflict that promises more "sacrifice and tough fighting."

With some analysts in Baghdad and Washington alike maintaining that sectarian violence in Iraq is devolving into civil war, the president is taking a new tack of balancing a sober and chilling recognition of persistent bloodshed with an unrelenting optimism for eventual victory.

Bush fielded a long series of often-critical questions from an audience in Cleveland, unusual for the often-shielded president. But he seized on progress that has been made against insurgents in one Iraqi city, Tal Afar, as an example of what he views as a turning tide in Iraq.

In his recounting of the successful battle for control of Tal Afar and the continuing struggle in Iraq, Bush maintained that insurgents' attacks were tailor-made for televised shock value because the insurgents cannot defeat the U.S. military.

"I understand how some Americans have had their confidence shaken," Bush said during his speech in the political battleground of Ohio, where he also had traveled to make his case for war before the U.S.-led invasion. People "look at the violence they see each night on their television screens, and they wonder how I can remain so optimistic. … They wonder what I see that they don't."

The president sees places such as Tal Afar, a northern Iraqi city of 250,000 where about 1,500 insurgents had taken control in 2004 and subjected Iraqis to a barrage of bloodshed. Now it is in the control of Iraqi military and police forces.

What much of the public sees is the overthrow of former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein gone awry, with a majority of Americans—57 percent in the latest Gallup Poll—telling pollsters they now consider the March 2003 invasion a mistake.

Bush: Despair understandable

"I understand people being disheartened when they turn on TV screens and see the loss of innocent life," Bush said. He recited some of the bloodshed that had beset Tal Afar—such as mortar shells lobbed into soccer fields where children were at play—before security was established in the city last year. "Nobody likes beheadings [or] … when innocent children get car-bombed."

As he has before, Bush presented the violence as a strategic campaign by terrorists to shake the resolve of U.S. forces that the president vows will not retreat from intimidation. But for a president hoping to frame an optimistic picture of Iraq, he delved into difficult details.

"In one grim incident, the terrorists kidnapped a young boy from the hospital and killed him, and then they booby-trapped his body and placed him along the road where his family would see him," Bush said. "When the boy's father came to retrieve his son's body, he was blown up. These weren't random acts of violence."

Bush took questions for nearly an hour from an audience at the City Club of Cleveland that had not been screened by the White House. In doing so, the president confronted critical questions not only about the conduct of the war, and the impact its cost is having on domestic programs such as education, but also about his program of domestic surveillance of suspected terrorists.

One man asked why the public should have confidence in a government that misjudged the threat Hussein posed before the invasion.

"I asked that very question—'Where did we go wrong on intelligence?'" Bush replied. "The part that's really important is how do we regain credibility when it comes to intelligence."

The administration has lost its credibility, Democratic critics maintain.

Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.), accusing the Bush administration of being "tone deaf" to suggestions for improvement, called on Bush to wage a Camp David-style diplomatic initiative to establish a stable government in Iraq.

'Pull out all the stops'

"We need to plan now for the real possibility that we may not be able to salvage the situation in Iraq," Biden, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said at a news conference Monday. "We must pull out all the stops … and run the risk of doing everything in [Bush's] power to get a coalition government" running in Iraq.

"This president has to take a political risk," said Biden, who is weighing a presidential campaign in 2008. "This war is Bush's war, by his own definition. His presidency will be defined and judged by its outcome. If his war fails, then America is hurt—America fails."

Anthony Cordesman, a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, made his own assessment of the situation in Iraq. Despite gains in creating a stable government, Cordesman said: "We face a scale of problems that we still tend to deny. There is a real risk that Iraq will degenerate into full-scale civil war or a level of divisiveness that will paralyze or limit Iraq's progress for years to come."

Bush Bluntly Defends Iraq Strategy, But Admits Missteps (NYT)

By John O'Neil

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

President Bush gave a blunt defense of the American strategy in Iraq today, while acknowledging that ordinary Iraqis had been left exposed to terrorism during the war's earlier stages.

As the debate continued over where the war is headed at its third anniversary, a leading Democrat, Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., called on Mr. Bush to throw himself into an all-out effort to forge a government of national unity in Iraq and to begin planning for the civil war that was likely to follow if the effort failed.

Mr. Bush delivered an account from the Iraq war today that was both characteristically optimistic and unusually candid about shortcomings in the war's earlier phases and the suffering it caused for ordinary Iraqis.

Speaking to the City Club in Cleveland, the president told how Tal Afar, a city in western Iraq, had been freed from the control of Al Qaeda in Iraq, which it took over after the 2003 invasion and then re-established its hold on the city after a too-brief military operation by American forces in 2004.

The problem, he said, was that American forces concentrated initially on rooting out insurgents from a given area and then pursuing them elsewhere, an approach that left Iraqi citizens vulnerable, he said.

"Just put yourself in the shoes of the citizens of Tall Afar as all this was happening," Mr. Bush said.

"On the one side, you hear the coalition and Iraqi forces saying they're coming to protect you," he said. "But they'd already come in once, and they had not stopped the terrorists from coming back. On the other side, you see the terrorists and the insurgents. You know they mean business."

Mr. Bush described how Al Qaeda members in Iraq fired mortars at playgrounds, beheaded people assisting American forces and even booby trapped the body of a boy they had kidnapped and killed.

"You and your family feel besieged, and you see no way out," he said.

In early 2005, Mr. Bush said, "We recognized the problem and changed our strategy."

He described how the city was retaken in 2005 in a painstaking effort that combined military operations with the steady rebuilding of both the local security forces and the city's economic and political life.

"Now, you see your children going to school and playing safely in the streets," he said. "You see a city that is coming back to life.

DOJ_NMG_0019863

Mr. Bush held out the story of Tal Afar as "a concrete example of progress in Iraq that most Americans do not see every day in their newspapers or on their television screens."

Senior administration officials had taken to the airwaves en masse on Sunday, the third anniversary of the war's beginning, to argue that the news media's focus on bombings and sectarian violence had given a skewed view of the progress being made in Iraq.

Mr. Bush began by acknowledging the recent outbreaks of violence that followed the bombing of a Shiite shrine a month ago. "The situation on the ground remains tense," he said. "I understand how some Americans have had their confidence shaken."

Mr. Bush also took note of a statement by Senator Biden of Delaware, the senior Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee, who said this morning that "we can't want democracy and peace more than the Iraqis."

"I agree," Mr. Bush said, and went to argue that the best way to build democracy there was by declaring "that the United States will never abandon Iraq."

Mr. Biden called for President Bush to make an all-out effort to forge a government of national unity there or get ready for full-scale civil war.

Speaking to reporters in Washington, Mr. Biden said that he agreed with the assessment made on Sunday by Ayad Allawi, the former Iraqi prime minister once favored by the White House, who declared that a low-level civil war had already started.

Mr. Biden said the United States had only a brief opportunity to head off a civil war that could destabilize the Middle East.

While praising the American ambassador in Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, Mr. Biden said that the only chance of Iraq's divided parties coming together was if Mr. Bush threw himself into the talks directly. Mr. Biden called for the president to convene a meeting of Iraq's top leaders and precede it by working to persuade countries around the globe to pressure Iraqis to settle their differences.

If a unity government is not formed by the summer, he said, the situation will be beyond repair. In that case, Mr. Biden said, America should withdraw all but 30,000 troops, who would be used to "keep the chaos confined to Iraq."

Mr. Bush's speech followed a carefully calibrated mix of optimism about eventual victory and caution about how long American troops would be involved that was displayed on Sunday by Mr. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, who sounded much as they had on the first anniversary of the invasion. At that time, the rebuilding effort had just begun, the insurgency was far less fierce, and the American occupation had suppressed, temporarily, the sectarian violence scarring Iraq today.

The picture painted by the administration clashed with that of Mr. Allawi, once hailed by Mr. Bush as the kind of fair-minded leader Iraq needed. He declared in an interview with the BBC on Sunday that the country was nearing a "point of no return."

"It is unfortunate that we are in civil war," said Mr. Allawi, who served as prime minister after the American invasion and now leads a 25-seat secular alliance of representatives in Iraq's 275-seat National Assembly. "We are losing each day, as an average, 50 to 60 people through the country, if not more."

"If this is not civil war," he said, "then God knows what civil war is."

Mr. Allawi's assessment was contradicted by Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the senior American commander in Iraq, who said on the CNN program "Late Edition" on Sunday that "We're a long way from civil war."

On the CBS News program "Face the Nation" Mr. Cheney sought on Sunday to place the war in a broader context. "It's not just about Iraq, it's not about just today's situation in Iraq," he said. "It's about where we're going to be 10 years from now in the Middle East and whether or not there's going to be hope and the development of the governments that are responsive to the will of the people, that are not a threat to anyone, that are not safe havens for terror or manufacturers of weapons of mass destruction."

The war has taken more than 2,300 American lives, and those of 33,000 to 37,000 Iraqis, according to the estimates of the Iraq Body Count Project, an independent group that monitors the news media.

Bush Says He Remains Confident In Iraq Strategy (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Richard Keil

Bloomberg, March 21, 2006

March 20 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush, speaking as the conflict in Iraq enters its fourth year, said the terrorists who destroyed a Shiite shrine last month won't succeed in sparking a civil war or thwarting democracy there.

Bush said today that he remains optimistic about the outcome of the war that defines his presidency, even though people in the U.S. are seeing ``horrific images coming out of that country'' from the recent sectarian violence.

``I understand how Americans have had their confidence shaken,'' Bush told the City Club in Cleveland, a day after Iraq's former prime minister said his country is in the midst of a civil war and edging toward a ``point of no return.''

DOJ_NMG_0019864

The U.S. has been battling an insurgency in Iraq since Saddam Hussein's regime fell, and sectarian violence flared anew after a terrorist bomb destroyed a shrine in Samarra Feb. 22. With U.S. military deaths in Iraq surpassing 2,300, public support for the war dropping and the cost of the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan rising to $9.8 billion a month, Bush was giving the second in a series of speeches aimed at rallying Americans behind his policies.

``There comes a time on certain terribly important issues where everybody has made up their minds and it's very hard to change that," said Stephen Hess, a presidential scholar at the Brookings Institution in Washington. ``We've been at this for three years, and Americans have a better sense now of what the costs are."

`Right Decision'

The president acknowledged that some in the U.S. are questioning whether the U.S. should have invaded three years ago. ``The decision to remove Saddam Hussein was the right decision," he said. The president said he will press ahead.

``We will settle for nothing less than victory," he said. ``The United States will not abandon Iraq."

Bush cited the success U.S. and Iraqi forces have had in the city of Tal Afar, driving out insurgents then moving in to stabilize the city ``block by block."

Tal Afar, in northern Iraq, had been a staging area for insurgents and a battleground since the U.S.-led invasion on March 19, 2003. After several attempts to drive the insurgents from the city, the U.S. launched an offensive last September.

Back to `Normal'

Bush said after the military campaign, the U.S. and Iraqi government forces moved in to help rebuild housing, schools and other facilities. The tactics were the result of ``much trial and error," he said.

Since the city was stabilized, Bush said, residents voted in the December parliamentary elections and are ``resuming their normal lives."

``The example of Tal Afar helps give me confidence" that the U.S. strategy is working and will help Iraqis take over responsibility for their own security, Bush said.

While Bush continues to insist he won't set a timetable for a U.S. withdrawal, he has set a goal of having Iraqi forces take responsibility for most of the country's territory by the end of the year, allowing U.S. troops to pull back to providing logistics support and training rather than combat patrols.

The administration is trying to blunt criticism from members of Congress, including some of Bush's fellow Republicans, and suggestions that Iraq is descending into civil war. Former Prime Minister Ayad Allawi, who heads the secular Iraqi National List party that took 25 seats in the December elections for the 275-seat parliament, said yesterday that the sectarian violence is threatening to spin out of control.

Civil War

``We are losing each day as an average 50 to 60 people throughout the country, if not more," Allawi said on the BBC's ``Sunday AM" program. ``If this isn't civil war, then God knows what civil war is."

Republican Senator Chuck Hagel of Nebraska said on ABC's ``This Week" program yesterday that he agreed with Allawi and that Iraq has been in the midst of ``a low-grade civil war" for at least six months. ``Our own generals have told me that."

Hagel and some other lawmakers also have criticized the administration for painting a too optimistic picture of U.S. progress in Iraq in the past.

Three months into the battle against the insurgency, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld dismissed the resistance American troops were facing as ``pockets of dead-enders" that the U.S. military was isolating and eliminating. Last May, Vice President Dick Cheney said the insurgency was in its ``last throes."

Bush's job-approval ratings have been falling as a growing proportion of Americans say they believe the war was not worth fighting in the first place.

In the last Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, 37 percent of those surveyed approved of his job performance -- a low point of his presidency in that survey. Other national polls have shown similar results.

The Journal/NBC poll survey indicates that Iraq is a crucial cause of dissatisfaction, with 61 percent of adults saying they disapprove of Bush's handling of the conflict. Fifty-one percent said the overthrow of Hussein hasn't been worth the cost in human and financial terms, and 50 percent said the war has weakened the U.S.'s standing in the world.

In response to a question from an audience member, Bush said Iran pursuit of nuclear technology is a threat to peace because the current leadership in Iran has pledged to destroy Israel.

The U.S. stance is to use diplomacy to resolved the confrontation with Iran, Bush said, adding that the U.S. will use ``military might to protect our ally, Israel."

On another subject, Bush defended his decision to authorize the National Security Agency to monitor telephone and e-mail traffic from within the U.S. to suspected terrorists overseas.

``I believe what we're doing is constitutional," Bush said in answer to a question. ``We're going to keep doing it."

Bush Acknowledges 'horrific Images' In Iraq (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, March 21, 2006

President George W. Bush on Monday acknowledged the "horrific images" coming out of Iraq as the third anniversary of US invasion passed, but vowed that the US would "not abandon Iraq".

"We will not leave that country to the terrorists who attacked America and want to attack us again," he told an audience in Cleveland, Ohio. "We will leave Iraq, but when we do, it will be from a position of strength, not weakness."

Although Mr Bush and Vice-President Dick Cheney have denied that Iraq is on the verge of civil war, the Iraqi prime minister Iyad Allawi said at the weekend that it was already in a civil war, citing the 50-60 deaths per day.

Mr Bush tried to address that pessimism by offering Tal Afar, a town on the Syrian border that had been a strategic location for al-Qaeda, as a "concrete example of progress". First, he talked about how insurgents had turned it into a besieged, armed enclave using beheadings and roadside bombs.

"These were deliberate and highly organised attempts to maintain control through intimidation. After about two weeks of intense activity, coalition and Iraqi forces had killed about 150 terrorists and captured 850 more," he said.

After this counter-offensive, the number of people voting in the elections rose from 32,000 in January to 175,000 in November.

Mr Bush, however, conceded that progress was not "the same in every single part of Iraq", highlighting sectarian tensions in Baghdad. But he reiterated his hope that Iraq would become a democratic "inspiration throughout the Middle East".

Anthony Cordesman, Arleigh Burke chair of strategy at the Center for Strategic and International Studies warned that it could be 2007 or 2008 before stability is restored.

At the weekend General George Casey, commander of US forces in Iraq, said he did not believe that substantial troop reductions were imminent: "Maybe not over the course of the next few months, but certainly over the course of 2006 and into 2007."

Last week a poll showed that only one third of Americans thought Mr Bush had a clear plan for Iraq. However, only 24 per cent thought the Democrats in Congress had a clear plan.

Bush Pledges Not To Give Into Insurgents (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 21, 2006

CLEVELAND -- President Bush yesterday said U.S. strategy in Iraq has been developed through "trial and error" but said troops won't leave until they exit from "a position of strength, not weakness" and resolved not to surrender to insurgents.

"We will leave Iraq, but when we do, it will be from a position of strength, not weakness," Mr. Bush told the City Club of Cleveland yesterday in the second of a series of speeches on the war on terror. "Americans have never retreated in the face of thugs and assassins, and we will not begin now."

As in his first terror speech last week, Mr. Bush pirouetted from Iraq to Iran, calling that nation "a serious threat" to Israel in particular and saying the United States will use military force to protect Israel.

"I've made it clear, and I'll make it clear again, that we will use military might to protect our ally, Israel," Mr. Bush said in response to an audience question, although he said several times that there is still a chance for negotiations to work with Iran.

He also said the situation in Iran is not like the situation three years ago, as the United States was on the brink of war in Iraq.

"One difference was that in Iraq, there was a series of unanimous resolutions that basically held the Iraqi government to account, which Saddam Hussein ignored," he said.

The president also answered about a dozen questions from the audience, ranging from a defense of his wiretapping authority to his vision for reducing the wealth gap between white and black Americans and his immigration guest-worker plan.

Speaking a day after the third anniversary of the U.S. invasion of Iraq, Mr. Bush said news on the ground is mixed and admitted that the U.S. strategy has emerged "only after much trial and error."

He was also unusually frank in talking about the difficulties, including "horrific images" of executions, car bombs and reprisal murders and said he knows that Americans "wonder what I see that they don't."

But he said there are signs for hope -- most of them dependent on the ability of Iraqi security forces to step up their operations.

Mr. Bush said the situation in Tal Afar, a city 35 miles from the Syrian border that used to be a key location for al Qaeda, shows how coalition forces are learning from their mistakes.

DOJ_NMG_0019866

Coalition troops first ousted militants from Tal Afar in September 2004, but within two months, the terrorists had returned and taken over the city again. Mr. Bush said Iraqi security forces weren't ready at the time to maintain peace.

Last summer, three battalions of coalition forces made a second attempt at cleaning the city, this time led by 10 Iraqi battalions. The difference, Mr. Bush said, was this time the Iraqis were ready for peacekeeping.

"It took time to understand and adjust to the brutality of the enemy in Iraq. Yet the strategy is working," Mr. Bush said.

Democrats said Mr. Bush's initial strategy failed because of poor decisions such as not committing enough U.S. troops. House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat and a war supporter, said the troop issue was the "one colossal blunder, above all others" that will stand out for historians.

And Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and a war opponent, said Mr. Bush still doesn't see the situation in Iraq clearly because he "fails to see the very real possibility that Iraq will continue the downward spiral into full-scale civil war."

During the 90 minutes, the president was animated, at times leaning forward on the podium to answer questions from the audience, freely joking with the audience of hundreds in the hotel ballroom and bantering in Spanish with one questioner.

At one point an audience member, apparently an Indian who wanted to ask a question about U.S.-Pakistani relations, joked, "Every chief needs Indian oversight."

Mr. Bush joked back, "How long were you working on that?"

In another exchange, Mr. Bush was asked whether he agreed with some evangelical Christians who see the war in Iraq as a sign of the apocalypse. The president said he hadn't "thought about it that way," adding, "First I've heard of it, by the way."

An Iraq Success Story's Sad New Chapter (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

CLEVELAND, March 20 -- As President Bush tells the tale, the battle for Tall Afar offers a case study in how U.S. and Iraqi forces working together can root out insurgents and restore stability. "The example of Tall Afar," he told an audience here Monday, "gives me confidence in our strategy."

Reports from the streets of Tall Afar, half a world away, offer a more complex story. U.S. forces last fall did drive out radicals who had brutalized the mid-size city near the Syrian border. But lately, residents say, the city has taken another dark turn. "The armed men are fewer," Nassir Sebti, 42, an air-conditioning mechanic, told a Washington Post interviewer Monday, "but the assassinations between Sunni and Shiites have increased."

The twists of Tall Afar underline the difficulties Bush has had in reassuring a doubtful American public that progress is being made in Iraq. The president and his aides say that the positive developments in Iraq get overwhelmed by the grim pictures of mayhem and massacre that dominate the evening news. If Americans knew about the success stories, the White House maintains, they would understand Bush's confidence of victory.

Yet even the success stories seem to come with asterisks. The administration hailed the election of a new democratic parliament last year, but the new body has so far proved incapable of forming a government for more than three months. U.S. forces have trained more Iraqi security troops, but the only unit judged capable of acting fully independently of U.S. assistance no longer can.

The cycle has taken a new spin with the latest evolution of Iraq from violent insurgency against foreign occupiers to sectarian strife bordering on civil war. Since the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra last month, hundreds of Iraqis have been killed in reprisals in a bloody spate of violence that has eclipsed most periods during the three years since the U.S.-led invasion.

All this has taken its toll on Bush's credibility, Republican strategists say, making it hard for him to make people see what he sees in Iraq. Continuing his latest drive to rebuild public support for the war, Bush flew to this Midwestern city on Monday to empathize with the pessimism many Americans feel as the war heads into its fourth year, while trying to explain the basis for his own optimism.

"In the face of continued reports about killings and reprisals, I understand how some Americans have had their confidence shaken," he told the City Club of Cleveland. "Others look at the violence they see each night on their television screens and they wonder how I can remain so optimistic about the prospects of success in Iraq. They wonder what I see that they don't."

To illustrate, he devoted his talk to Tall Afar, hoping to use the progress there as a symbol of hope for the rest of the country. The city of 290,000 in northern Iraq was at one point awash in violence, a haven for insurgents and foreign extremists. An initial U.S. military offensive in the fall of 2004 dislodged them only temporarily. When the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment returned last year, it set about trying a new, more patient strategy that focused more on winning over the local population, building cooperation with Iraqis, surrounding the city with a wall and ultimately flooding Tall Afar with patrols.

As Bush noted, the military heralded the offensive as a model for counterinsurgency. "The strategy that worked so well in Tall Afar did not emerge overnight -- it came only after much trial and error," the president said. "It took time to understand and adjust to the brutality of the enemy in Iraq. Yet the strategy is working."

Bush acknowledged that this offensive stood out. "I wish I could tell you that the progress made in Tall Afar is the same in every single part of Iraq. It's not," he said. But, he added, "the progress made in bringing more Iraqi security forces online is helping to bring peace and stability to Iraqi cities."

The Tall Afar strategy may not apply easily to other areas, particularly Baghdad -- a far larger and more populous city where it would take enormous numbers of U.S. troops to replicate the strategy, military analysts say.

The 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment "did a wonderful thing" in retaking Tall Afar, said Ahmed Hashim, a professor of strategy at the U.S. Naval War College who advised the regiment on counterinsurgency and cultural tactics. But Hashim, who wrote a book on the Iraqi insurgency that is being published next week, said he doubts that the example is readily transferable to the rest of Iraq, in part because of the weakness of the central government in Baghdad.

Hashim said he has also seen indications lately that the insurgents have begun "seeping back in" to Tall Afar now that the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment has rotated home and been replaced by another Army unit. And given the deep ethnic and sectarian divides in Tall Afar, he said, it is quite possible that the city could succumb to civil war, along with the rest of the country.

A Washington Post employee interviewing residents of Tall Afar found continuing anxiety in the streets. "Al-Qaeda has started to come back again," said Jaafar al-Khawat, 33, a tailor. "They have started to kill Shiites and Sunnis who cooperate with the Americans. Last Wednesday, they killed a truck driver because he worked with the Americans."

Yasir al-Efri, 23, a law student at Mosul University, said al-Qaeda pamphlets began appearing on the biggest mosque in Tall Afar in the past two months claiming credit for attacks. "The Tall Afar mission failed," he said. "The city will turn back to how it was before the battle within two months. The Americans are busy putting cement barriers and barbed wire around their bases and no one is taking care of the infrastructure."

Sebti, the mechanic, was more fearful of sectarian conflict. "People now are afraid to send their kids to school," he said. "I have to take my son to and from the school every day. There are two gangs in Tall Afar now that specialize in kidnapping children. Police can do nothing against that."

In his Cleveland speech, Bush received supportive applause for removing Saddam Hussein but also faced polite skepticism from some who addressed him during a subsequent question period. No major Ohio politician other than the mayor appeared with Bush, whose approval ratings have sunk below 40 percent, and war protesters demonstrated outside the downtown hotel where he appeared.

One man in the audience asked about Bush's credibility given that some of the reasons he originally gave for the war proved false. The president quarreled with the contention in one instance, denying that he ever made a "direct connection" between Hussein and the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, even though he often linked Baghdad with al-Qaeda generally. "I was very careful never to say that Saddam Hussein ordered the attacks on America," he said.

Bush acknowledged that the credibility issue -- the failure to find weapons of mass destruction that the administration said were in Iraq -- affected his ability now to confront Iran, which he has accused of secretly building nuclear weapons. But he offered tough language for Tehran, characterizing it as bent on destroying Israel. "It's a threat to world peace, it's a threat, in essence, to a strong alliance," Bush said. "I made it clear, I'll make it clear again, that we will use military might to protect our ally Israel."

Iraqi Turmoil Puts Mideast On Edge (CSM)

By Nicholas Blanford

The Christian Science Monitor, March 21, 2006

BEIRUT, LEBANON - The toppling of Saddam Hussein's regime was supposed to usher in a new era for the Middle East, according to the architects of the invasion, one in which Islamic extremism would be rooted out and budding democracies would replace stifling dictatorships.

Yet the region three years on is experiencing heightened sectarian tensions between Sunni and Shiite Muslims, expanding Islamic militancy, high levels of anti-Western hostility, and authoritarian regimes still clinging to power, analysts say.

"The balance sheet on Iraq since the US invasion has some positive aspects, but in most respects it is negative," says David Mack, vice president of the Washington-based Middle East Institute. While the invasion ousted Mr. Hussein's brutal regime, the subsequent turmoil "has probably strengthened the ability of autocratic regimes to resist evolutionary political change," Mr. Mack says.

The Iraq invasion jolted complacent regimes, especially as it coincided with nascent attempts by Arab democracy campaigners to push for reform. But, says Jordanian political commentator Rami Khouri, "the way the American adventure in Iraq has gone has emboldened many Arab [regimes] to defy the US because they feel that it has gone badly in Iraq and the Americans are not likely to do this again."

Take Syria, which has been in the gun sights of Bush administration hard-liners for years. The regime of President Bashar al-Assad has antagonized Washington since 2003 by its sluggish response to US demands such as curbing support for militant anti-Israel groups and, until recently at least, securing the border with Iraq. The ace up President Assad's sleeve, which has persuaded most Syrians to continue supporting the government and is making Western advocates of regime change hesitate, is concern over Iraq-style violence coming to Syria.

"The ethnic and religious composition of Syria is roughly similar to the divisions found in Iraq and Lebanon and no less explosive," says Theodore Kattouf, president of Amideast, an educational organization in Washington, and a former US ambassador to Damascus. "It seems that the bloodshed, chaos, and uncertainty of Iraq have led most Syrians to the default position that even a bad regime is preferable to the risks of instability."

The turmoil in Iraq is not solely to blame for the ills in the region, but it represents a powerful dynamic that has rippled across the Middle East feeding into other conflicts. "The situation in the broader Middle East is more complex, fragile, and dangerous today than it has been for a long time. Several of the multiple conflicts in the region are reaching a boiling point," UN special envoy Terje Roed-Larsen said last week.

Some analysts argue, however, that the political, economic, and social situation in the Arab world is so poor as to warrant shock therapy reform.

"Societies that have failed to tackle their serious developmental needs for so many decades ... eventually have to deal with one form of chaotic transition or another," says Ammar Abdulhamid, a Syrian social analyst and dissident. But he predicts a messy transition in which "deep-seated and long-simmering ... sectarian, ethnic, tribal, and other atavistic modes of belonging continue to rear their ugly heads."

The disorder in Iraq has strengthened the hand of Iran, an influential player in the maelstrom of Iraqi Shiite politics. And the ability of Iran to project itself into the Arab world through Shiite allies, with Moqtada al-Sadr in Iraq and Hizbullah in Lebanon, is a source of deep unease among Sunnis in the region. Strengthening ties between Iran and Syria with Hizbullah and Iraqi and Palestinian groups has further aggravated Sunnis over the emergence of a "Shiite crescent" stretching from Iran through Iraq, Syria, and into Lebanon.

"Yes, there is an alliance linking Syria, Iran, and Hizbullah, but it is a political alliance, not religious," says Sheikh Naim Qassem, Hizbullah's deputy secretary-general. "Whoever tries to draw a big Shiite picture will get muddled by all the contradictions."

Misconception or not, Sunni concerns of a Shiite crescent are likely to harden if Iraq continues what appears to be an inexorable slide into a Sunni-Shiite civil war, analysts say.

"The increasing violence and mistrust between Iraq's Sunni and Shiite communities carries the potential to exacerbate already existing tensions in an arc extending from Lebanon down to the eastern province of Saudi Arabia, where the minority of Saudi Shiites also inhabit a territory that is home to some of the richest oil fields in the world," says Mr. Kattouf.

Perhaps most worrying for regional stability is that Iraq has become a crucible for extremist Sunni militancy, a magnet for volunteers to join the insurgency against US and British forces. There are growing indications that the battle-hardened veterans of Iraq are returning to their home countries and planning attacks against their governments or Western targets.

"The Iraq which was only a potential safe haven for terrorists is now the chief breeding ground for a new wave of terrorism that may threaten the entire region and the United States," says Mack of the Middle East Institute.

Although Saudi Arabia has had some success in the past two years at clamping down on extremist militants following a wave of bloody attacks against foreign targets in 2003, Syria, Jordan, and Lebanon have all experienced outbreaks of Al Qaeda-style violence.

Still, whether the violence in Iraq will take root in neighboring countries or is a passing phenomenon remains to be seen. "Violent radicals be they Islamists or criminal elements are a tiny minority who disrupt and create fear, but have nothing to offer politically or economically," says Judith Kipper, director of the Middle East Forum at the Washington-based Council on Foreign Relations.

The Stone Face Of Zarqawi (WSJ)

By Christopher Hitchens
The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0019869

In February 2004, our Kurdish comrades in northern Iraq intercepted a courier who was bearing a long message from Abu Musab al-Zarqawi to his religious guru Osama bin Laden. The letter contained a deranged analysis of the motives of the coalition intervention ("to create the State of Greater Israel from the Nile to the Euphrates" and "accelerate the emergence of the Messiah"), but also a lethally ingenious scheme to combat it. After a lengthy and hate-filled diatribe against what he considers the vile heresy of Shiism, Zarqawi wrote of Iraq's largest confessional group that: "These in our opinion are the key to change. I mean that targeting and hitting them in their religious, political and military depth will provoke them to show the Sunnis their rabies . . . and bare the teeth of the hidden rancor working in their breasts. If we succeed in dragging them into the arena of sectarian war, it will become possible to awaken the inattentive Sunnis as they feel imminent danger."

Some of us wrote about this at the time, to warn of the sheer evil that was about to be unleashed. Knowing that their own position was a tenuous one (a fact fully admitted by Zarqawi in his report) the cadres of "al Qaeda in Mesopotamia" understood that their main chance was the deliberate stoking of a civil war. And, now that this threat has become more imminent and menacing, it is somehow blamed on the Bush administration. "Civil war" has replaced "the insurgency" as the proof that the war is "unwinnable." But in plain truth, the "civil war" is and always was the chief tactic of the "insurgency." * * *

Since February 2004, there have been numberless attacks on Shiite religious processions and precincts. Somewhat more insulting to Islam (one might think) than a caricature in Copenhagen, these desecrations did not immediately produce the desired effect. Grand Ayatollah Sistani even stated that, if he himself fell victim, he forgave his murderers in advance and forbade retaliation in his name. This extraordinary forbearance meant that many Shiites -- and Sunnis, too -- refused to play Zarqawi's game. But the grim fact is, as we know from Cyprus and Bosnia and Lebanon and India, that a handful of determined psychopaths can erode in a year the sort of intercommunal fraternity that has taken centuries to evolve. If you keep pressing on the nerve of tribalism and sectarianism, you will eventually get a response. And then came the near-incredible barbarism in Samarra, and the laying waste of the golden dome.

It is not merely civil strife that is partly innate in the very make-up of Iraq. There could be an even worse war, of the sort that Thomas Hobbes pictured: a "war of all against all" in which localized gangs and mafias would become rulers of their own stretch of turf. This is what happened in Lebanon after the American withdrawal: The distinctions between Maronite and Druze and Palestinian and Shiite became blurred by a descent into minor warlordism. In Iraq, things are even more fissile. Even the "insurgents" are fighting among themselves, with local elements taking aim at imported riffraff and vice-versa. Saddam's vicious tactic, of emptying the jails on the eve of the intervention and freeing his natural constituency of thugs and bandits and rapists, was exactly designed to exacerbate an already unstable situation and make the implicit case for one-man "law and order." There is strong disagreement among and between the Shiites and the Sunnis, and between them and the Kurds, only the latter having taken steps to resolve their own internal party and regional quarrels.

America's mistake in Lebanon was first to intervene in a way that placed us on one minority side -- that of the Maronites and their Israeli patrons -- and then to scuttle and give Hobbes his mandate for the next 10 years. At least it can be said for the present mission in Iraq that it proposes the only alternative to civil war, dictatorship, partition or some toxic combination of all three. Absent federal democracy and power-sharing, there will not just be anarchy and fragmentation and thus a moral victory for jihadism, but opportunist interventions from Iran, Saudi Arabia and Turkey. (That vortex, by the way, is what was waiting to engulf Iraq if the coalition had not intervened, and would have necessitated an intervention later but under even worse conditions.) There are signs that many Iraqi factions do appreciate the danger of this, even if some of them have come to the realization somewhat late. The willingness of the Kurdish leadership in particular, to sacrifice for a country that was gassing its people until quite recently, is beyond praise.

Everybody now has their own scenario for the war that should have been fought three years ago. The important revelations in "Cobra II," by Michael Gordon and Bernard Trainor, about the underestimated reserve strength of the Fedayeen Saddam, give us an excellent picture of what the successor regime to the Baath Party was shaping up to be: an Islamized para-state militia ruling by means of vicious divide-and-rule as between the country's peoples. No responsible American government could possibly have allowed such a contingency to become more likely. We would then have had to intervene in a ruined rogue jihadist-hosting state that was already in a Beirut-like nightmare.

I could not help noticing, when the secret prisons of the Shiite-run "Interior Ministry" were exposed a few weeks ago, that all those wishing to complain ran straight to the nearest American base, from which help was available. For the moment, the coalition forces act as the militia for the majority of Iraqis -- the inked-fingered Iraqis -- who have no militia of their own. Honorable as this role may be, it is not enough in the long run. In Iraq we have made some good friends and some very, very bad enemies. (How can anyone, looking down the gun-barrel into the stone face of Zarqawi, say that fighting him is a "distraction" from fighting al Qaeda?) Over the medium term, if our apparent domestic demoralization continues, the options could come down to two. First, we might use our latent power and threaten to withdraw, implicitly asking Iraqis and their neighbors if that is really what they want, and concentrating their minds. This still runs the risk of allowing the diseased spokesmen of al Qaeda to claim victory.

DOJ_NMG_0019870

Second, we can demand to know, of the wider international community, if it could afford to view an imploded Iraq as a spectator. Three years ago, the smug answer to that, from most U.N. members, was "yes." This is not an irresponsibility that we can afford, either morally or practically, and even if our intervention was much too little and way too late, it has kindled in many Arab and Kurdish minds an idea of a different future. There is a war within the war, as there always is when a serious struggle is under way, but justice and necessity still combine to say that the task cannot be given up.

Mr. Hitchens, a columnist for Vanity Fair, is the author of "A Long Short War: The Postponed Liberation of Iraq" (Penguin, 2003).

Passing The Dinar (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

Two months before the Iraq war began, David Kay reported to the Pentagon for a job in the agency being formed to run postwar Iraq. Kay, a former Defense Department scientist and weapons inspector in Iraq, was supposed to oversee the police.

He assumed this meant preparing for the looting and crime to be expected when any regime collapsed. But those problems didn't seem to be on anyone else's mind, he told me, recalling his first day on the job.

"I said our first priority should be to establish order quickly, but that was considered a peripheral issue," he said. "The attitude was that it's not a problem, and if something happens the military will deal with it. I had one of the worst feelings ever in my gut, that this was going over a cliff."

On his second day on the job, he resigned — an excellent career move in retrospect, although Kay doesn't believe it took any special clairvoyance. There were tough questions before the war, like figuring out whether Saddam had W.M.D. or forecasting the strength of the insurgency. But the looting and disorder were easily predictable, and Kay wasn't the only one making the predictions, as Michael R. Gordon and Bernard E. Trainor document in their new book on the war, "Cobra II."

Before the war, Dick Mayer, a former policeman working for the Justice Department, came up with a plan to send in thousands of international police officers to maintain order after the invasion. But Pentagon officials bristled at the expense, and the White House rejected the plan.

A similar plan was proposed in a prewar briefing at the Pentagon by Robert Perito, a veteran of peacekeeping operations in other countries. He told the Defense Policy Board, the advisory group led by Richard Perle, that neither Iraqi authorities nor American soldiers could be counted on to maintain order, and that the U.S. should send in a constabulary force as soon as it occupied Iraq.

"The group at the Pentagon liked the concept and said it was a worthwhile thing to do," Perito told me. "But as one member put it, 'Not this war.' Their feeling was that the conflict in Iraq would be over so soon and things would be back to normal so quickly that it wasn't worth the effort."

Some Pentagon officials did warn of civil disorder and crime, but they didn't do anything about it. They passed the buck to Gen. Tommy Franks, even though he didn't have enough troops or money for the job and showed little interest in postwar planning. He simply assured President Bush that there would be a "lord mayor" in each city and large town to deal with civilian problems.

Looting, crime, mayhem — that was always someone else's department. The buck-passing reached its most absurd level at a briefing in the Situation Room just before the invasion, when Bush heard about the postwar plan to rely on Iraqis for law enforcement. According to Gordon and Trainor, the president was told of an intelligence report concluding that the Iraqi police "appeared to have extensive professional training."

That was like concluding that Inspector Clouseau appeared to be a master detective. During Saddam's era, when his security forces were the prime enforcers of order, the Iraqi police were notorious for corruption and lethargy. Officers waited for citizens to report crimes and expected bribes for investigating them. To the police, preventing crime, or even doing street patrols, was not their job.

When the regime fell, they didn't even protect their own police stations against the mobs of looters, a lack of professionalism that came as no surprise to the Iraqis I encountered shortly after the invasion. Nor were they surprised by the initial outbreak of violence against the buildings built by an oppressive regime.

But they were shocked at how little the Americans did in response. The looting went on so long that it became a regular job. Thieves methodically dismantled office towers, removing wires, pipes, walls, floors, escalators. In the summer of 2003, they took the "broken windows" theory of social disorder to a new level — to broken buildings — and Iraq has been paying the price ever since.

That summer, as Iraqis watched looters and criminals taking control, they kept asking why nobody put a stop to the crime. The answer from officials in Washington, it turns out, is the same one that would have been given by the old Iraqi police: not my job.

Gunmen Ambush Iraqi Police Station, Kill 16 (AP)

The Associated Press, March 21, 2006

Gunmen ambushed a police station in the city of Muqdadiyah north of Baghdad Tuesday, killing at least 15 police officers and a guard at a nearby courthouse, police said.

The suspected insurgents struck at dawn, burning the police station and detonating a string of roadside bombs as they raced from the scene, a police spokesman in the region said.

At least seven others, including police officers and civilians, were injured in the attack in Muqdadiyah, which is about 90 kilometers (60 miles) north of the capital.

The attack came a day after at least 39 people were killed by insurgents and shadowy sectarian gangs in Iraq. Reports Monday showed that much of the violence targeted police officials.

Ongoing Wave Of Violence In Iraq Kills 39 (AP-Y2)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP2, March 20, 2006

At least 39 people were killed by insurgents and shadowy sectarian gangs, police reported Monday — continuing the wave of violence that has left nearly 1,000 Iraqis dead since the bombing last month of a Shiite Muslim shrine.

As the Iraq war entered its fourth year, police found the bodies of at least 15 more people — including that of a 13-year-old girl — dumped in and near Baghdad. The discoveries marked the latest in a string of execution-style killings that have become an almost daily event as Sunni and Shiite extremists settle scores.

Sectarian killings have swept across Iraq since the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite Muslim shrine in Samarra. An Associated Press tally, including the deaths reported Monday, put the toll at 993 since the golden dome atop the Askariya shrine was left in rubble by two bombers, who are believed to remain at large.

Among those killed in scattered violence Monday were 10 policemen, who are prime targets for insurgents, most of them Sunni militants, trying to break the will of the mainly Shiite police force.

As night fell on Monday, a bomb struck a coffee shop in northern Baghdad, killing at least three civilians and injuring 23 others. The bomb was left in a plastic bag inside the shop in a market area of the Azamiyah neighborhood, police Maj. Falah al-Mohammadewi said.

At about the same time, gunmen killed two oil engineers leaving work at the Beiji refinery north of Baghdad. An electrical engineer and technician were gunned down at the nearby power station, Beiji police Lt. Khalaf Ayed Al-Janabi said.

Separately, the owner of a small grocery in downtown Baghdad was shot and killed.

In southeast Baghdad, also toward evening, a roadside bomb blew apart a minibus, killing four pilgrims returning from the holy city of Karbala, where millions of Shiite faithful gathered to mark the 40th and final day of the annual mourning period for Imam Hussein, grandson of the Prophet Muhammad. Five pilgrims on their way to Karbala were wounded in a drive-by shooting earlier in the day, police said.

Otherwise, the commemoration passed largely without incident and absent the violent bomb attacks that have hit pilgrims there over the past two years.

Authorities in Baghdad closed the international airport until Tuesday, citing the need to protect the Karbala commemoration, apparently from any attackers who might try to fly into the country.

And Jordanian authorities closed their border with Iraq until further notice to "prevent those without valid travel documents from entering the country," said Maj. Bashir al-Da'ajah, spokesman of Jordan's Public Security Department. The New York Times reported the border was closed because a large number of Palestinians living in Iraq were trying to cross into Jordan without proper documents.

Much of the violence targeted police officials:

· Roadside bombs — one just a few hundred yards from an Interior Ministry lockup in central Baghdad and one in a farming area near the so-called Triangle of Death south of Baghdad — killed at least seven police officials. A prisoner was also killed in the Interior Ministry bombing.

· In the northern city of Mosul, gunmen killed a policeman and an oil ministry official, police said.

Iraqis Sound Angry On Invasion Anniversary (AP)

By Sinan Salaheddin

AP, March 20, 2006

Some Baghdad residents voiced anger and dismay when asked about their lives as the U.S.-led war in Iraq entered its fourth year Monday, when insurgents and sectarian gangs killed at least 38 more people.

Salah Hashim, a 49-year-old businessman, said he yearned for the return of Saddam Hussein, the country's ousted dictator, given the violence that now envelops the country.

"Despite all he did that was bad, we did not suffer as we are now," Hashim said. "Now we have lost everything, even a sense of living. The Americans promised us, especially (President) George Bush, prosperity. And we thank them all because we got it — but we got a prosperity of car bombs, kidnappings and killings."

At least 992 people have been killed in a surge of sectarian killings since the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite Muslim shrine in Samarra, according to an Associated Press count.

"Now I have to spend time worrying about my safety while walking in the streets," said Hashim. "I have to worry about my children when they leave home for school. Instead of being comfortable and enjoying time with my family, I worry that I can't ensure their good life."

Ahmen Najeeb, a 33-year-old supermarket owner, said he originally "waved his hands" at American forces as they entered the country in March 2003, but that his outlook has since changed.

"Day after day the Americans proved that they are here to steal our oil and protect their homes by keeping the their war against terror in another country," he said.

One English teacher, though, said that Iraqis had tolerated Saddam's tyranny for so long that it was worth fighting through the violence to rebuild the country.

"What we are now living in is not an American failure nor that of the Iraqi government," said Assmaa Ali, 38. "The problem is in the Iraqi people ... we started fighting each other using statements and words. Now we are fighting each other with guns.

Ali said the only ones to blame were the insurgents and sectarian fighters who cause the problems. "They are the main reason behind the loss of life and destruction. We should help both the government and coalition forces in fighting these troublemaker instead of blaming them."

One man who said three of his daughters were killed by a bombing last year sounded despondent.

"I got nothing from this so-called liberation, just this cell phone and my satellite receiver. But I lost my three daughters," said Nawar Maarof, a 34-year-old taxi driver who said he had dreamed of becoming an accountant. "I have a feeling that my destiny is the same. Anyway, we're all dead."

Salam Nassir, a 25-year-old college student, also longed for Saddam.

"We deserve all this because we didn't fight the Americans," he said. "We had to know from the start they would not help us and were lying about liberating Iraq."

Freedom, Yes, Iraqis Say, But At Great, Grave Cost (WP)

By John Ward Anderson And Omar Fekeiki

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, March 20 -- By almost any standard, Bashar Muhammed, the owner of a thriving Internet cafe, is a Baghdad success story. Three years after the United States invaded Iraq and overthrew Saddam Hussein, the Internet business here is booming, and Muhammed has what most Iraqis could only dream of under Hussein -- freedom, a cutting-edge job, lots of customers.

But when conversation turns to his life and prospects, he sighs and voices frustration that Americans just don't get it.

"It is true that we got freedom after the war, but uncontrolled freedom -- chaos and violence," he said in a cool, deliberate tone. Five of his relatives have been killed in car bombings and assassinations, Muhammed said, noting that most recently an uncle was killed for being a Sunni Arab.

"The new generation is growing on violence and sectarian ethics, and this will affect Iraq for many years to come," he said. "We are living a more devastating war every day."

As Iraqis on Monday marked the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion, there was a stark difference between their pessimistic outlook and some U.S. officials' upbeat assessment of the situation. With insurgent violence grinding on, essential services sagging below pre-invasion levels and the prospect of civil war looming, many Iraqis question whether Hussein's ouster was worth the cost.

Many thousands of their countrymen have been killed. In December, President Bush estimated the Iraqi toll at 30,000.

Laith Muhammad, 32, a student in Fallujah, 35 miles west of Baghdad, listed the risks Iraqis face these days. "We either die by the Americans, the insurgents in the name of jihad, the security companies, which kill you and leave you laying in the street, the Iraqi police or . . . the death squads," he said. Such squads are widely believed to be operating from within the country's Interior Ministry. Muhammad cited private militias as yet another threat.

"Three years after the American invasion of Iraq, I have only one wish," he said. "I do not want democracy, food, electricity and water. I just do not want to die."

Other Iraqis, however, are less quick to blame the United States.

Sardar Muhsin Maheed, 25, a student at Mosul University, said too many people blamed the occupation for all of Iraq's ills. He traced most problems to Hussein, suggesting that issues such as the poor economy are legacies of the ousted president.

"The U.S. has liberated us from Saddam and his oppression," he said. "We are not ready to form a democratic state, and that is because of the burden left by Saddam's regime."

Another of Hussein's legacies, he said, was sectarian tension in the country. An Iraqi government has been democratically elected, but the politicians and their parties are creating a new Iraq based on religious and ethnic interests.

Luay Mohammed, a 57-year-old Sunni Arab who spent 35 years working for the Education Ministry, said he was forced to retire because the government and the ministry are now run by Shiite Muslims. His son could not get a job "because he is not a Shiite and he did not suffer" under Hussein, Mohammed said, his voice laced with bitterness and sarcasm.

"We've been waiting for years for true democracy to come, a democracy that makes everybody live and work together with respect and love. But here it is: a democracy with maximum chaos," he said. Now, all of his sons have cellular telephones -- not because it is hip or because of a communications boom, but because the security situation demands it. "This is what democracy has brought us."

The U.N. sanctions that had been imposed on Hussein's government have been lifted, and a vibrant free press has emerged. But unemployment is stuck between 27 and 40 percent, while oil production -- which the government counts on to generate 90 percent of its revenue -- remains below prewar levels.

"The toppling of Saddam Hussein's regime was worth everything," said Fakhri Fikry Kareem, owner and publisher of the daily Meda newspaper, one of more than 100 newspapers that have begun publishing in Iraq since Hussein's fall. Despite a rocket attack on his office, a bomb attack on his car and the killing of three of his reporters, Kareem said: "I have never felt as free to speak any day in my life as today. If George Bush did anything good, it was toppling Saddam Hussein."

Kareem, 63, said he opposed the war. While drinking Turkish coffee and fingering a long string of worry beads in his Baghdad living room, he talked of what might have been, suggesting that perhaps the United States could have removed Hussein without starting a broader conflict.

"I am not pessimistic," he said. "But I'm upset, because the war and the occupation, which could have led to a new situation in Iraq, were squandered by the stupid mistakes committed by the American administration and military and the U.S. representatives in Iraq."

Subhi Nadhem Tawfik, a professor at Baghdad University's Center for Strategic Studies, said people no longer believed that helping Iraq was foremost on the U.S. agenda during the invasion. "The U.S. has won a tremendous strategic victory," which has come increasingly at the expense of Iraq, he said.

"With the occupation of Iraq, the strategic significance of all the states in the region was diminished," Tawfik said.

The war and its aftermath have so far cost the United States about $250 billion. Congress allocated $21 billion to repair essential infrastructure and revitalize the economy, and to establish programs for good governance and democratic institutions. As much as $3.5 billion has been diverted to pay for better security, but Iraq remains the largest U.S. government reconstruction effort since the Marshall Plan following World War II.

Meanwhile, many Iraqis -- especially in Baghdad, home to almost a quarter of the population -- said they don't see much evidence of the aid.

"We hear about tens of billions of dollars spent on reconstruction," said Bashar Muhammed, the Internet cafe owner. "The only reconstruction in the country I see now are the cement barriers. There are lots of them."

New Business Blooms In Iraq: Terror Insurance (NYT)

By Robert F. Worth

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Twice in the past year, Muhammad Said has survived assassination attempts that left his car riddled with bullets. He works part time as a bodyguard for his father, a Baghdad city councilman, and helps a friend who has contracts with the American military. Both are very dangerous jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0019874

So last month, Mr. Said, a slim, baby-faced 23-year-old, did what a small but growing number of Iraqis are doing: He walked into the offices of the Iraq Insurance Company and bought a terrorism insurance policy. It looked like an ordinary life insurance policy, but with a one-page rider adding coverage for "the following dangers: 1) explosions caused by weapons of war and car bombs; 2) assassinations; 3) terrorist attacks."

It cost him 125,000 dinars, about $90. Mr. Said paid more than most people because of his risky occupation. The payout, if he dies, is five million dinars, around $3,500, or about what an Iraqi policeman earns in a year.

That guarantee appears to be the first off-the-shelf terrorism policy in the world, insurance experts say. In most countries, of course, there is no need for it: death by terrorism is rare enough that it is usually covered by ordinary accident insurance. In Iraq it is not, partly because the state used to compensate the families of war victims directly. So the Iraq Insurance Company began stepping into the gap about a year ago.

"Am I worth only five million dinars?" Mr. Said asked wearily, after signing his policy. "It is not a solution. But Iraqis can be attacked by anyone, just walking on the street: Americans, insurgents, the Iraqi Army." The payout is not a lot of money, even by Iraqi standards. But in a country where terrorism kills hundreds of people a month and no one can rely on the government or employers to provide for their relatives afterward, it seems to be an idea with a future.

The Iraq Insurance Company, a state-owned group, has sold about 200 individual terrorism policies in the last year, and is now negotiating with several government ministries and private companies for group policies that would cover thousands of employees.

The idea of insuring ordinary people in what may be the most violent place on earth came from Abbas Shaheed al-Taiee, an executive at the Iraq Insurance Company.

"It is a kind of gift to the Iraqi people," said Mr. Shaheed, 53, a big, heavyset man with terribly serious eyes and a reputation as a master salesman. "We have expanded the principles of life insurance to cover everything that happens in Iraq."

Amazingly, the company has yet to pay out on a single claim.

"We have sold policies in Dawra, Ramadi, Falluja," Mr. Shaheed said, naming some of the most dangerous places in Iraq. "The contract is a good luck charm."

Mr. Shaheed (whose name means martyr in Arabic) emanates a gravitas that must be an asset in his line of work. He manages a sales staff of about 50 across Iraq, but also sells the policies himself, traveling from one workplace to another, like a kind of bureaucratic Grim Reaper.

He says the terrorism policy makes no distinctions between who fires the shots or detonates the bombs. He would be perfectly willing to insure an insurgent, though he has not done so to his knowledge, he said.

"It is a market here; there are no differences," he said, in his grim baritone. "We evaluate people's pockets."

In the United States and Europe, insurance companies offer customized policies to organizations sending employees to dangerous places, including Iraq (some news organizations, for example, insure their reporters this way). But those policies are highly tailored to each company's activities and risks, and they are generally expensive.

The idea of a standardized, terrorism life insurance policy appears to be unprecedented, said Robert Hartwig, the chief economist of the Insurance Information Institute in New York.

Some other insurance experts agreed that the policy was a novel one, but said they would hardly call it a good deal. "In an American context, it's very overpriced," said Robert Hunter, the director of insurance for the Consumer Federation of America, an association of consumer rights groups. "In America, you could probably get $100,000 worth of life insurance coverage for maybe $125 to $150," especially a healthy 23-year-old, he said. "And that would cover you no matter how you died."

Selling insurance in Iraq has never been easy. The first insurance companies here were established in the 1950's, when they competed with Western companies. But the idea never gained wide acceptance, in part because some Islamic authorities disapprove of insurance, considering it akin to gambling.

Also, many Iraqis preferred to rely on their tribes or families in case of accidents or deaths. The state also played a powerful paternal role: during the Iran-Iraq war, for instance, the government generously compensated the families of soldiers who died, sometimes with a car or property as well as money.

After the Persian Gulf war in 1991 the market shrank further, because foreign reinsurance companies pulled out, forcing Iraqi companies to depend only on their own assets, said Aziz Hassan, a former deputy finance minister.

Strangely, Iraqi insurance companies have done relatively well since the fall of Saddam Hussein, despite a stagnant economy and the uncertainty over Iraq's future. Six private insurance companies were founded in 2004, and now compete with the two state-owned companies.

The Iraq Insurance Company has renovated its offices — they were looted and burned after the fall of Baghdad in April 2003 — and the company now employs between 250 and 300 people. They have sold at least 2,700 life insurance policies since the fall of the Hussein government.

DOJ_NMG_0019875

In 2005, the company's net income was about $2.5 million at current exchange rates. "We broke records," said Bassim Mahdi Saleh al-Sheikhli, the company's managing director. "Business has never before been so good."

The company attributes much of its success to salesmen like Mr. Shaheed, who now operate more freely — albeit more dangerously — than they did in the past.

"From my point of view, sales is an art," said Mr. Shaheed, who has worked at the Iraq Insurance Company for 18 years. "For instance, talking to a father with children is different from talking to a man still single. You have to bring out his passion to protect his family."

Because the salesmen carry money and travel, their own jobs are unusually dangerous. They do not carry guns. Many have bought terrorism insurance themselves, including Mr. Shaheed.

One rule applies to all prospective clients. "When we talk about death and risks, we refer to ourselves: 'I might die tomorrow,' " Mr. Shaheed said. "When we talk about the payment, we say, 'The company pays you.' "

Once a client has agreed to buy a policy, a price is negotiated. It ranges from 60,000 dinars for the safer professions — teachers, businessmen and the like — to 125,000 for policemen and translators for Western companies. The payout is the same regardless.

On a recent afternoon, Mr. Shaheed sat at a desk in his second-floor office, chatting quietly with a potential client. Nearby on the couch sat Basmel Nafaa, a 48-year-old businessman with a bald head and an impish grin. Mr. Nafaa had already bought an ordinary life insurance policy, and was considering buying terrorism coverage too.

"He's the best we have here in Iraq," Mr. Nafaa said of Mr. Shaheed. "He's a good hunter."

Mr. Nafaa recounted how Mr. Shaheed had approached him at the wholesale market where he often works, as if by chance. The salesman chatted amiably about mutual friends, and then began telling a story about a man who had died without leaving anything for his wife and children. Before long, Mr. Nafaa was sold.

"He hardly even needs to remind you of the dangers you face," Mr. Nafaa said. "We see it everywhere."

Mr. Nafaa began offering examples. A few months earlier, his 12-year-old son Joseph was standing outside the family home waiting for a school bus that never came. The boy persuaded his mother to give him money for a taxi. Minutes later, he said, a suicide bomber in a car exploded right next to the bus stop, which is across from the home of a high-level government official. Six people were killed.

Mr. Nafaa showed photographs of his house, which was badly damaged. "I had no insurance at that time," he said.

Then Mr. Nafaa gestured across the room at his cousin, Baseem Makadsi — the other prospective client — who still has a crease on the back of his skull from where a bullet crashed through the window of his car and grazed him while he was driving to the market with his son.

"If he had not leaned over to speak to his son, he would be dead," Mr. Nafaa said. "He lost a lot of blood."

Mr. Makadsi was not yet sold on terrorism insurance. He was thinking of taking his family out of Iraq.

But Mr. Nafaa persuaded himself. "I will buy it," he said. "There is a big probability to be killed by insurgents here. Higher than anywhere else in the world."

Congress Eyes Own Window On Iraq War (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - Marking the third anniversary of the Iraq war, President Bush said US strategy will "lead to victory."

Before recessing last week, the House easily approved $67.6 billion for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan - exactly the amount the White House had requested - and the Senate punted on a bid to censure Mr. Bush on his conduct of the war on terror.

But behind the headlines, Capitol Hill lawmakers are signaling that 2006 must be a decisive year in the Iraq war - and many of the war's vigorous defenders are looking for guidance outside the Bush administration on how to move ahead.

Exhibit A is the quiet launch of an independent, bipartisan panel to bring "fresh eyes" to the Iraq conflict. Last week, the House included $1.3 million in a defense funding bill for the panel, which will work out of the congressionally chartered US Institute for Peace here.

"The purpose of the [Iraq] study group is to come up with a compromise between an administration policy that no one believes in and just walking away," says Edward Luttwak, a senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, 1 of 4 think tanks supporting the effort. "The study-group process will be mysterious, but the outcome is predictable: They're going to come to the conclusion that the US should disengage, but not abandon Iraq."

The move to develop alternatives to Bush administrative briefings signals a growing distrust on Capitol Hill for the "closed circuit between people sitting inside the Green Zone and the 'good news' being sent back to Washington," says Mr. Luttwak. "Congress is discovering that the Bush administration is repeating its own propaganda - and believes what they are saying."

Last week, lawmakers on both sides of the aisle grilled Pentagon officials on whether Iraq is slipping into civil war - and what role remains for US troops if it does. The House passed by voice vote a Democratic amendment to block funding for a permanent US base in Iraq.

"Despite three years of the best efforts and heroic sacrifices by our military personnel, Iraq is teetering on the edge of the abyss," said Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, ranking Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee. Bush sent Iraqi leaders "the wrong message" last week when he said the process "will require patience by America," the senator said.

Like the 9/11 commission before it, the new Iraq Study Group is being asked to face forward. "We will not be visiting past debates about Iraq. We will leave that to the historians," said cochair and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, who also cochaired the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States.

"We know that the country needs help now in working through this, and we will add whatever we can by way of a constructive contribution," Mr. Hamilton said Wednesday at the launch of the Iraq Study Group in the Senate Armed Services Committee hearing room.

Other members are cochair James Baker III, former secretary of Treasury and State; former CIA director Robert Gates; former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani; and former Sen. Alan Simpson (R) of Wyoming. Democrats on the panel are Leon Panetta, former chief of staff to President Clinton; Clinton adviser Vernon Jordan; former Defense Secretary William Perry; and former Sen. Charles Robb of Virginia. One more Republican will be named to the 10-member panel.

"One of the first things we are going to have to do - and will do - is satisfy ourselves with respect to exactly what are the facts and circumstances with respect to Iraq today," said Mr. Baker, who says the administration will cooperate as panelists travel to Iraq and seek access to people and documents.

Republicans began lobbying the White House for an independent assessment of the war months ago. In September, Rep. Frank Wolf (R) of Virginia wrote in an op-ed that the American public, to stay the course, must "be able to trust that those directing the war have made an honest assessment of what has gone right and what has gone wrong."

One reason Congress is turning to an outside group is that, unlike in previous wars, public opinion on the Iraq war is polarized along party lines. While 77 percent of Republicans say the US is making progress toward establishing a democracy in Iraq, only 34 percent of Democrats are as optimistic, according to a poll last week by the Pew Research Center.

While Democrats did not rally to a motion by Sen. Russell Feingold (D) of Wisconsin to censure the president over domestic surveillance without a warrant, some senators in both parties still question the policy - and the precedent it sets for separation of powers.

"Too often, Democrats cower in the face of illegality," says Senator Feingold. "As soon as the administration raises the specter of being soft on terrorism, Democrats just hide."

"It's a political stunt that's getting in the way of a good, honest debate on checks and balances in a time of war," Sen. Lindsey Graham (R) of South Carolina said last week of the Feingold resolution.

But he adds: "It's an area where the law is very unsettled. I hope we'll vote on it."

Father No Longer Out For Revenge In Iraq (AP-Y2)

By Charles J. Hanley

AP2, March 20, 2006

In the desert chill, on the lonely nighttime roads of Iraq, Joe Johnson looks out over his machine gun and thinks of Justin. It was on Easter morning 2004 that a chaplain and a colonel appeared on Joe and Jan Johnson's Georgia doorstep with the news. Justin, the boy Joe had fished and hunted with, the soldier son who'd gone off to Iraq a month earlier, was suddenly dead at 22, killed by a roadside bomb planted in a Baghdad slum.

Today it's Joe who mans the M-240 atop a Humvee, warily watching the sides of the road, an unlikely Army corporal at 48, a father who came here for revenge, a Christian missionary on a crusade against Islam, and a man who, after six months at war, is ready to go home.

"I shouldn't even have come," he now says. And if he leaves bloody Iraq with no blood on his hands, he says, that's fine, too.

The Johnson family story is unique, even strange. But in a war where soldiers have heard an ever-changing medley of reasons for fighting, Joe Johnson's may be as simple and direct as any — and to many, as troubling.

He wasn't there that day the tragic news arrived in Rome, Ga. Instead, the self-employed house-builder was in Fort Lewis, Wash., trying to qualify for a place in a Washington National Guard unit ticketed for Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0019877

With six years of long-ago Army and Navy service, Johnson had joined the National Guard in 2003, wanting to serve his country again, this time in combat, and to go to Iraq while his son was there. A year with both husband and son at war would be easier on Jan than two years separately, he reasoned.

The death of Justin, a 1st Cavalry Division machine gunner, stunned his parents with a shock that lingers still.

"What were the odds, of thousands of people here, that somebody in my family would get killed?" the grieving father asked.

At that point, Johnson said, "I decided it was too soon to leave home." Jan was too distraught.

But last April 11, a year and a day after his son was killed, Johnson told his Iraq-bound Georgia National Guard unit, the 48th Infantry Brigade, he was ready to join them. They ended up at this dustblown base in Iraq's far west, pulling escort duty for fuel convoys on the bomb-pocked desert highways from Jordan.

Why did he do it? The wiry lean Georgian, an easy-talking man with a boyish, sunburned face, tried to answer the question that won't go away.

"It's a lot of things combined," he said. "One, a sense of duty. I was pissed off at the terrorists for 9/11 and other atrocities. Second, I'd only trained. I wanted combat." And then, he said, "there's some revenge involved. I'd be lying if I said there wasn't."

But there was more on the mind of this man who has done Church of God missionary work as far afield as Peru and the Arctic.

"I don't really have love for Muslim people," Johnson said. "I'm sure there are good Muslims. I try not to be racist." Although he hasn't read the Quran, or spoken with Muslims, he has "heard" the Islamic holy book "teaches to kill Jews and infidels. And it's hard to love people who hate you."

He could love Iraqi children, though, and said he'd hoped "to see them grow up to know right and wrong."

Somewhere along the way, however, the righteous passion cooled, as the over-aged corporal, like tens of thousands of other American soldiers here, faced the reality of Iraq.

Was it last Christmas morning, when roadside bombs rocked his convoy one after another, and Johnson thought he was next? Or was it when speeding civilian cars passed the Americans' Humvees and Johnson failed to level his gun and open fire, which "I think anyone else," fearing car bombs, "would have done."

"I really don't want to kill innocent people," he now says. "I don't want to live with that the rest of my life."

Most of all, it might have been the telephone calls home to Jan, who was dealing not only with depression and other health problems, but also with the prospect that their elder soldier son, Josh, 26, might be sent to Iraq or Afghanistan.

"I don't like that Joe's there," Jan Johnson said when called by satellite telephone from al-Asad. "But it's something he felt he had to do. People heal in different ways. This is how he heals after Justin's death."

"She's ready for me to come home," Joe Johnson concludes.

He will. His battalion exits Iraq in early May, when Johnson's own enlistment term, coincidentally, expires. "That's it," he said, no re-enlistment for him.

But what about revenge?

"If I go home and didn't kill a terrorist, it's not going to ruin my life," he said. "Maybe I'd just as soon not. I don't know what it would do to my head."

Once back home among the northwest Georgia pines, he has one last ceremonial act in mind, removing the silver-toned bracelet he's worn on his right wrist throughout his deployment, bearing Justin's name and date of death. Joe Johnson's mission will have been accomplished.

Whatever it was, he said, "I got it out of my system."

AFP, March 20, 2006

The United States said it was watching closely the trial of an Afghan man who could face death for converting to Christianity in a test of religious freedom for the key US ally.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack urged the Afghan authorities to deal with the proceedings against Abdul Rahman transparently and according to the rule of law.

"It's a case that we're following very closely," McCormack said of Rahman's week-old trial on charges of violating Islamic Sharia law.

"Our view certainly ... is that tolerance, freedom of worship, is an important element of any democracy," he said. "These are issues, as Afghan democracy matures, that they are going to have to deal with increasingly."

Rahman was detained two weeks ago after his relatives reported his conversion to Christianity to the police. A Supreme Court judge said he could be executed if he refused to return to Islam.

DOJ_NMG_0019878

If sentenced, the defendant will be the first Afghan punished for conversion since US-backed forces ousted the hardline Taliban regime at the end of 2001 in reprisal for the September 11 terror attacks on the United States.

McCormack said Afghanistan, which has become a major ally in Washington's war on the Al-Qaeda terrorist network, was debating varying constitutional interpretations of religious freedom.

"These issues rightfully should get resolved through the court system," he said. "But they need to be resolved in a transparent (manner) and according to the rule of law."

Off Course In Afghanistan (WP)

By Chris Van Hollen

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

When President Bush touched down briefly in Afghanistan on his way to India, he was probably the closest he will ever get to the man who masterminded the Sept. 11 attacks on the United States: Osama bin Laden, who is believed to be hiding in Pakistan along the rugged Afghan-Pakistani border. It was a stark reminder that we have not accomplished our mission of destroying bin Laden and al-Qaeda. Fulfilling that mission and preventing a resurgence of the Taliban will depend on the actions we take in Afghanistan. This is no time to reduce our commitment there.

While the president was in Afghanistan, the director of the U.S. Defense Intelligence Agency, Gen. Michael Maples, was testifying before Congress that the Taliban insurgency is growing and will increase this spring, presenting a greater threat to the Afghan central government's expansion of authority than at any point since late 2001. Under these circumstances, the current plan to replace the 2,500 U.S. troops in southern Afghanistan this spring with contingents of Canadian, Dutch, British, Romanian and Australian troops is a mistake. Given the intensifying Taliban insurgency, these allied forces should augment, not displace, U.S. forces. We should also reassess the administration's proposal to turn over the command of most U.S. troops in Afghanistan to NATO by early next year.

While Gen. James Jones, NATO's supreme allied commander, has tried to play down Maples's grim assessment, it is hard to ignore the fact that the Taliban has stepped up its operations. Last year, attacks by the Taliban and other anti-government groups jumped by 20 percent. Suicide bombings increased almost fourfold, and strikes with improvised explosive devices, a tactic imported from Iraq, doubled. The main battlegrounds in this insurgency are the provinces of Kandahar, Uruzgan, Helmand and Zabul, the Pashtun areas that formed the Taliban stronghold.

As recently as Jan. 10, Mullah Mohammad Omar, the Taliban leader who was born in southern Afghanistan and forged a close bond with bin Laden -- rejected a call to reconcile with the government of President Hamid Karzai and publicly exhorted his followers to fight on. It appears that his followers are listening. James Kunder, assistant administrator of the U.S. Agency for International Development, told Congress that in January: a school headmaster was shot in Helmand; 200 schools in Kandahar and 165 schools in Helmand closed for security reasons; and in Zabul, where a campaign of intimidation had already closed all but five of 170 schools, a high school teacher was beheaded. February was also deadly: In a 14-day period, 24 violent incidents and 37 deaths were reported in the media.

Stopping this violence requires forceful action. Until now, NATO forces have been stationed in relatively quiet areas and their role has been limited primarily to peacekeeping, rather than combat, operations. There are real questions about whether NATO will be able to engage the Taliban as aggressively as U.S. forces.

The withdrawal of U.S. forces from southern Afghanistan will also weaken our ability to demand that Pakistan move more forcefully to prevent the Taliban from using Pakistan as a base of operations. Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence Agency has had a cozy relationship with the Taliban, and many in the Afghan government doubt Pakistan's commitment to denying sanctuary to Taliban fighters. If U.S. troops won't pursue them, why should Pakistan's?

Afghanistan's stability depends on strengthening the central government, developing the economy and limiting the booming opium trade. Progress on these fronts requires that the Taliban be neutralized and that security be improved. The anticipated withdrawal of U.S. forces has reportedly already caused some local leaders to hedge their bets with respect to the Taliban. Economic development has been slowed because, as Kunder testified, "our contractors are being targeted, and a number of them have been killed, making it more difficult for USAID to recruit appropriately qualified staff." And the lack of security in southern Afghanistan makes it more difficult to eradicate the drug trade in places such as Helmand, which produced more opium last year than any other province, representing about 20 percent of the world's supply of heroin.

We should never forget that the Taliban came to power in the chaos that followed the Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan and the subsequent U.S. disengagement from the region. With the Bush administration and political Washington focused on Iraq, many Afghan leaders worry that the reduction of U.S. forces is a sign that we will again lose sight of Afghanistan. We do so at our peril. Let us not forget that the Sept. 11 plot was launched from Afghanistan, and not from Iraq.

2 Years After Soldier's Death, Family's Battle Is With Army (NYT)

By Monica Davey And Eric Schmitt

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. — Patrick K. Tillman stood outside his law office here, staring intently at a yellow house across the street, just over 70 yards away. That, he recalled, is how far away his eldest son, Pat, who gave up a successful N.F.L. career to become an Army Ranger, was standing from his fellow Rangers when they shot him dead in Afghanistan almost two years ago.

"I could hit that house with a rock," Mr. Tillman said. "You can see every last detail on that place, everything, and you're telling me they couldn't see Pat?"

Mr. Tillman, 51, is a grieving father who has refused to give up on his son. While fiercely shunning the public spotlight that has followed Cpl. Pat Tillman's death, Mr. Tillman has spent untold hours considering the Army's measurements, like the 70 yards.

He has drafted long, sometimes raw, letters to military leaders, demanding answers about the shooting. And he has studied — and challenged — Army PowerPoint presentations meant to explain how his son, who had called out his own name and waved his arms, wound up dead anyway, shot three times in the head by his own unit, which said it had mistaken him for the enemy.

"All I asked for is what happened to my son, and it has been lie after lie after lie," said Mr. Tillman, explaining that he believed the matter should remain "between me and the military" but that he had grown too troubled to keep silent.

As the second anniversary of the death of Corporal Tillman, once a popular safety for the Arizona Cardinals, approaches, Mr. Tillman, his former wife, Mary, and other family members remain frustrated by the Army's handling of the killing but for the first time may be close to getting some of the answers they so desperately seek.

After repeated complaints from the Tillmans and members of Congress contacted by them, the Army is immersed in a highly unusual criminal investigation of the killing, and the Defense Department's inspector general, which called for the criminal investigation this month, is looking separately into the Army's conduct in its aftermath.

Senior military officials said Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld had expressed outrage to top aides that the Army was having to conduct yet another inquiry into the shooting, prolonging the family's anguish and underscoring the failure of the Army's investigative processes to bring resolution.

Gary Comerford, a spokesman for the inspector general, said the Army Criminal Investigation Command was "dealing with events leading up to the death, and we're looking at anything after that." Though Mr. Comerford did not say so, that could include the possibility of a cover-up, the Tillmans said they had been told by the inspector general's office.

No one wants answers more than the Tillmans. But by now, they said, they have lost patience and faith that any Army entity, even the Criminal Investigation Command, can be trusted to find the truth.

"I am sitting here on my own, going over and over and over this for two years," Ms. Tillman, 50, said in a telephone interview. "The whole thing is such a debacle. I am beyond tears. It's killing me."

Like her former husband, she has spent days reading the files, researching the episode, calling members of Congress, even trying to contact some of the soldiers involved. She criticized the military, as well as the news media, for failing to get to the bottom of what occurred, leaving her family, in essence, to figure it out themselves.

All of it, her former husband said, has even left him suspicious of the military's central finding in their son's case so far: that the killing was a terrible but unintentional accident.

"There is so much nonstandard conduct, both before and after Pat was killed, that you have to start to wonder," Mr. Tillman said. "How much effort would you put into hiding an accident? Why do you need to hide an accident?"

An examination by The New York Times of more than 2,000 pages of documents from three previous Army administrative reviews reveals shifting testimony, the destruction of obvious evidence in the case and a series of contradictions about the distances, the lighting conditions and other details surrounding the shooting.

Seven Rangers have received administrative disciplines — a pay cut, a loss of rank or a return to the rank-and-file Army — but the criminal inquiry is for the first time examining whether the soldiers broke military law when they failed to identify their targets before firing on Corporal Tillman's position. The earlier reviews found that a chain of circumstances and errors had led to the deaths of Corporal Tillman and an Afghan soldier fighting alongside the Americans.

A senior Pentagon official briefed on the criminal investigation, who was granted anonymity because he was not permitted to speak publicly while the new investigation was under way, said it would delve into highly sensitive areas.

"The balance that investigators now have to wrestle with is how much of a crime-scene approach they can take — nearly two years after the fact — into the fog of war, where soldiers were making decisions in milliseconds," the Pentagon official said.

Mr. Tillman spoke bluntly and angrily one afternoon here as he waded once more through the Army reports, the charts, even the details in his son's autopsy. He knows the smallest of details by heart — where his son was supposed to be standing, which way the sun was setting, what the Ranger ducking beside his son heard him call out last — and ticked them off unemotionally as he flipped through the worn reports.

Mr. Tillman's small office, though, belies his hardened shell. His trash can, pasted with orange and green paper, was a grade school project of Pat Tillman. So was the wooden pencil holder nearby, shakily carved with the letters N.F.L. A blurry photograph in a frame showed Pat Tillman at age 2, marching off toward a lake with his signature confident stride.

"At this point I don't believe that the facts of this case are going to come out without the serious threat of jail time hanging over some folks," Mr. Tillman said.

The Tillman family's first glimmers of distrust began in the month after Corporal Tillman was killed, at the age of 27, on April 22, 2004.

Within hours, military officers came to the family home here, the same house where Corporal Tillman had grown up. No one mentioned, though, that the shooting had been at the hands of his colleagues. Even Corporal Tillman's younger brother Kevin, who served in the same Ranger unit and was in a vehicle far behind the shooting and did not see what had happened, did not learn the truth for more than a month.

Instead, eight days after Corporal Tillman's death, Army officials awarded a Silver Star and issued a news release that seemed to suggest that he had been killed by enemy fire during an ambush.

At the end of May, as the rest of Corporal Tillman's unit was returning to the United States, the Army notified the family of what it believed really happened. In the months that followed, in private briefings for the family, the Army assured the Tillmans that a thorough investigation would be made and that those responsible would be disciplined.

"They said they'd take care of it, and I believed them," Mr. Tillman said.

Corporal Tillman's platoon of the Second Battalion, 75th Ranger Regiment, began the day that he died dealing with a minor annoyance in the southeastern part of Afghanistan where the soldiers were conducting sweeps, the Army records show: one vehicle would not start.

The platoon split into two parts so that half the team, including Corporal Tillman, could go on to the next town for sweeps while the second half could tow the disabled vehicle to a drop-off spot.

But both groups ended up in the same twisting canyon, along the same road, without radio communication. And after the sounds of an enemy ambush, three Rangers in the second group wound up firing at members of the first group — at an Afghan soldier who was fighting alongside Corporal Tillman, and then at Corporal Tillman.

The Army's administrative reviews that followed, parts of which have been described previously in other newspapers, including The Washington Post and The San Francisco Chronicle, have left the Tillman family with more questions than answers, they say. Some of those involved in the shooting have provided shifting accounts of what happened, the records show.

The decision to split the unit into two convoys, for example, was a crucial, and perhaps fatal, one. Brig. Gen. Gary M. Jones, who led the most recent of the three Army reviews, concluded that the decision was a result of "miscommunication" among several officers.

But at least one Army officer, the records show, changed his sworn statements about which supervisor had actually ordered the split and what conversations had occurred before the order was given.

Even the soldier who conducted the military's first review of Corporal Tillman's death — in the hours and days immediately afterward — expressed concern about the changes in the accounts.

That soldier, whose name, like many others, was redacted from the Army files provided to The Times by Mr. Tillman, said he believed Rangers had changed their versions of what happened and were not receiving the "due just punishment" for what he concluded was "gross negligence."

The stories, he said in a sworn statement as part of General Jones's subsequent review, "have changed to, I think, help some individuals."

"The other difficult thing, though, was watching some of these guys getting off with what I thought was a lesser of a punishment than what they should've received," the soldier who conducted the first inquiry said.

Among a number of conflicts in the descriptions of what happened, some Rangers said that in the dusk they could see nothing more than "shapes" and "muzzle flashes" even as Corporal Tillman tried to tell his colleagues who he was, waving his arms, setting off a smoke grenade signal and calling out. Others said they had seen and aimed for the Afghan fighter, his "dark face" and his AK-47.

After the shooting, the Rangers destroyed evidence that would be considered critical in any criminal case, the records show. They burned Corporal Tillman's uniform and his body armor.

Months later, the Rangers involved said they did not intend to destroy evidence. "It was a hygiene issue," one soldier wrote. "They were starting to stink."

Another soldier involved offered a slightly different take, saying "the uniform and equipment had blood on them and it would stir emotion" that needed to be suppressed until the Rangers finished their work overseas.

"How could they do that?" Mr. Tillman said. "That makes no sense."

The family still wants to know, he said, what became of Corporal Tillman's diary. It was never returned to the family, he said.

Ms. Tillman said her family could not rest until they knew what really happened. All of it, Ms. Tillman said, has left her wondering what other families who have lost service members in Iraq and Afghanistan may really know about the circumstances. In addition to Corporal Tillman, at least 16 service members have died in Afghanistan and Iraq as a result of shootings or bombings by fellow Americans, and none of the deaths, so far, have led to criminal convictions.

"This is how they treat a family of a high-profile individual," she said. "How are they treating others?"

Col. Joseph Curtin, an Army spokesman, said the Tillmans deserved answers.

"We deeply regret their loss," Colonel Curtin said, "and will continue to answer their questions in a truthful and forthright manner."

Lucky Strikes Again!

Every time Selwa "Lucky " Roosevelt chairs a huge benefit, she swears she's never doing it again. The Reagan White House protocol chief said the Folger's 60th-anniversary party in 1992 was her last. CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Conviction Of Ex-Star Banker Tossed Out (WP)

By Brooke A. Masters

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

NEW YORK, March 20 -- A federal appeals court tossed out the obstruction-of-justice conviction of once high-flying investment banker Frank P. Quattrone, in a blow to the government's effort to prosecute and deter white-collar crime.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 2nd Circuit held unanimously that the trial judge's instructions to the jury included such a "glaring deficiency" that Quattrone did not get a fair trial on charges that he encouraged subordinates to destroy documents sought by a federal grand jury.

The court also took the unusual step of reassigning the case to a new trial judge, writing that "certain comments" made by U.S. District Judge Richard Owen "could be viewed as rising beyond mere impatience and annoyance."

"It's the first time in this case that justice has been done," said Quattrone's trial attorney, John W. Keker. "I'm just glad that Judge Owen didn't win."

But the decision was not a total vindication for Quattrone. The 61-page opinion by Judge Richard C. Wesley dwelt at length on the strength of the evidence against the former Credit Suisse First Boston LLC banker and held that it was more than sufficient for conviction on charges of obstruction and attempted witness-tampering.

The ruling raises the possibility that Quattrone, still the best-known investment banker in Silicon Valley, will face a third trial more than five years after he first sent an e-mail encouraging hundreds of CSFB subordinates to "clean up those files." His first trial ended in a hung jury, and his 2004 conviction has now been overturned.

The reversal in the Quattrone case comes as the overall record for the Justice Department's attack on high-profile, white-collar crime is mixed. The Supreme Court overturned the obstruction verdict against accounting firm Arthur Andersen LLP, and HealthSouth Corp. founder Richard M. Scrushy was acquitted. The 2nd Circuit upheld domestic entrepreneur Martha Stewart's conviction and is still considering former WorldCom chief executive Bernard J. Ebbers's appeal of his conviction and 25-year-sentence. Former Enron Corp. leaders Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling are on trial in Houston

"It's really too bad. Even if the prosecution wins the next go-around, people are going to think, all I need is a good lawyer, and I'll have a good shot at not going to jail," University of Texas law professor Henry T. C. Hu said of the Quattrone reversal. "This kind of thing will undermine the deterrence idea of white-collar crime prosecution."

Once famous for helping bring hundreds of technology firms public during the dot-com boom, Quattrone, 50, had faced an 18-month prison sentence but remained free pending his appeal. "For over three years during this difficult ordeal, I have held my head high, knowing I was innocent and never intended to obstruct justice," he said in a statement that also thanked his supporters and legal team.

The Quattrone case marks the second time in less than a year that a major white-collar obstruction case has been overturned based on faulty jury instructions. Last May, the Supreme Court tossed out the guilty verdict against Arthur Andersen, holding that the jury should have been required to find that Andersen acted with criminal intent.

The Quattrone decision was based on a separate but somewhat similar problem. The three-judge panel found that Owen botched jury instructions on the need to find a "nexus" between Quattrone's "clean up" e-mail and a grand jury probe into the way CSFB doled out shares in hot new stocks, known as initial public offerings.

The appeals court found that Owen's instructions improperly failed to make clear that the jury needed to find that Quattrone knew that grand jury and Securities and Exchange Commission subpoenas specifically called for the documents that would be destroyed.

New York University law professor Jennifer Arlen said the Quattrone and Andersen decisions make clear that "obstruction may not be such an easy way to establish criminality . . . given that businesses often destroy documents all the time for many reasons."

The government may think twice about retrying Quattrone again, some outside lawyers said. While Quattrone, who made $120 million in his most profitable year at CSFB, still has ample resources to fight back, the two government lawyers who handled the case have left for private practice.

"A lot of resources were wasted because of a legal mistake," said Samuel Buell, who was the lead prosecutor in the Andersen cases and now teaches law in Texas. "At some point, do you just cut your losses?" The Justice Department declined to retry Andersen in part because the once-mighty accounting firm had all but disappeared by the time of the Supreme Court decision.

Quattrone's appeal attorney, Mark F. Pomerantz, predicted that his client would fare much better in a third round. "Having a different judge and a different jury and trying this case in a different climate will really give this trial a different character," he said.

A spokeswoman for U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said, "We are reviewing the opinion and considering our options."

Appeals Court Overturns Conviction Of Ex-Banking Star (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

A federals appeals court in New York this afternoon overturned the conviction of Frank P. Quattrone, the former star banker who had been found guilty of obstruction of justice, and granted him a new trial.

The ruling, a rare reversal of a jury verdict, is a big defeat for the government, which had sought to portray Mr. Quattrone as a symbol of Wall Street's excesses and the dot-com bust.

Mr. Quattrone, who led the initial public offerings of companies like Amazon.com and Cisco Systems as a banker at Credit Suisse First Boston in the 1990's, had been convicted of obstruction of justice as a result of endorsing a colleague's e-mail message in December 2000 that urged his staff to "clean up those files." At the time, the government was investigating whether the bank was soliciting kickbacks from preferred investors for hot initial public offerings, but it never led to any criminal charges.

Mr. Quattrone, 50, had faced 18 months in prison, though he has remained free pending the outcome of the appeal.

The reversal by a three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit comes almost a year after the Supreme Court also struck down the conviction of Arthur Anderson, the accounting firm involved in the Enron scandal that had also been found of guilty of obstruction of justice.

The appeals panel found that the judge in the case, Richard Owen, a Nixon appointee known for being pro-prosecution, gave erroneous jury instructions on what was required for the jury to find Mr. Quattrone guilty. The panel also said that "in the interest of justice," the case should be reassigned to another judge on the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York.

The prosecutors in the case, Steven R. Peiken and David Anders — both of whom have since left the United States attorney's office for private practice — were also singled out by the appellate panel for unfairly trying to prejudice the jury during their questioning of Mr. Quattrone.

Still, the appeals court found that there was sufficient evidence to retry Mr. Quattrone. And despite finding that Judge Owen had given flawed jury instructions, the panel said it agreed with many of his rulings, including his decision to restrict the introduction of mountains of evidence that defense lawyers contended would have led to a not guilty verdict.

Legal experts said the ruling was not about sending a message to lower courts about how to try future cases, but about the specific failure of the judge in this case to provide the necessary instructions for the jury to have found that Mr. Quattrone intended to obstruct justice.

"In a prosecution in which, by all accounts, the alleged criminal act occurred in a matter of seconds, this was always a case almost entirely about intent — did Quattrone try to destroy documents that he knew the government had already subpoenaed?" said Robert A. Mintz, a former prosecutor and now a partner at McCarter & English. "What this ruling really means is that the jury instructions never asked the right question. By failing to put a finer point on the issue of intent, the facts that could have formed the basis for a conviction were never determined by the jury."

It remained unclear late this afternoon whether the government would pursue a third trial against Mr. Quattrone. He has already been tried twice; his first trial ended in a mistrial after a jury deadlock. The case has long been viewed by the legal community as perhaps the government's weakest white-collar case in the raft of corporate criminal cases that were brought in 2002 and 2003 against people like Bernard Ebbers of WorldCom and Martha Stewart, both of whom were found guilty.

In writing for the court, Judge Richard C. Wesley said Judge Owen's instructions to jurors were wrong because jurors were not required to determine that Mr. Quattrone knew the documents he was asking associates to destroy were the same ones being sought by investigators.

Establishing liability is not sufficient to convict defendants of obstructing of justice or tampering charges, legal experts say. Juries must determine that defendants had intended to change the course of an investigation or legal proceeding to find them guilty of those crimes.

"It's very clear for a retrial," said Jonathan Halpern, a former federal prosecutor who is now a litigation partner at Winston & Strawn in New York. "The Second Circuit said it would be sufficient to show that the defendant knew his conduct was likely to affect the proceedings."

Court Decides For Quattrone, Reversing Verdict (WSJ)

By Randall Smith

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

A federal appeals court reversed the May 2004 criminal obstruction-of-justice conviction of former star investment banker Frank Quattrone, citing faulty jury instructions and other errors by the trial judge.

The decision returns the case to federal prosecutors who must now decide whether to try the banker a third time. The first attempt ended in a hung jury in October 2003. (Court's decision1 and Highlights2)

While prosecutors issued a short statement saying only "we are reviewing the opinion and considering our options," the Quattrone defense team hailed the ruling as "a significant victory."

Mr. Quattrone himself said in a statement, "For over three years during this difficult ordeal, I have held my head high knowing I was innocent and never intended to obstruct justice."

The appeals court also ordered the case reassigned to another judge, saying some antidefense comments by Judge Richard Owen "could be viewed as rising beyond mere impatience or annoyance."

Mr. Quattrone, 50 years old, was convicted of two counts of obstruction and one count of witness tampering based on his forwarding of an email in December 2000 urging employees to "clean up" their files just after being told about an investigation of allocations of initial public offerings at his firm.

Despite only circumstantial evidence of Mr. Quattrone's intent, James Comey, then the U.S. attorney in Manhattan, said in April 2003 that the charges were needed to send a message against any interference with government subpoenas.

The decision was the latest to come in the wake of a tough regulatory environment that prevailed after the stock-market bubble burst in 2001 and 2002. Last May, an obstruction verdict against former accounting giant Arthur Andersen LLP was voided by the Supreme Court. And two weeks ago Wall Street executive Ken Langone defeated regulatory charges that his firm improperly collected oversize commissions in return for hot initial-public-stock offerings.

"This could be further evidence of a pendulum swing," said Timothy J. Coleman, a white-collar defense attorney at Dewey Ballantine LLP who worked in the Manhattan federal prosecutors' office until 2003 but wasn't involved in the case. The intensity of "the public outcry about corruption on Wall Street" has abated, he said.

At the peak of the stock-market bubble Mr. Quattrone was one of the most powerful bankers on Wall Street, earning more than $120 million in one year at what was then called Credit Suisse First Boston, which led the most Internet stock IPOs in 1999 and 2000. Before joining CSFB, he had led landmark IPOs of Netscape Communications Corp. and Amazon.com Inc. (The former CSFB is now named Credit Suisse and remains a unit of Credit Suisse Group.)

But in 2003 he was personally charged with "spinning," or steering hot IPOs to clients to win investment-banking business, by the National Association of Securities Dealers. Mr. Quattrone denied those charges, which remain pending. But after he left CSFB, his firm settled civil charges, without admitting or denying wrongdoing, of spinning and biased research based partly on actions by Mr. Quattrone's group.

Even with the reversal yesterday, Mr. Quattrone remains subject to a lifetime ban from the securities business by the NASD for failure to testify in the spinning case. Mr. Quattrone declined to testify, citing a desire to avoid possible self-incrimination that could affect his criminal case, and yesterday he said the reversal bolsters his pending appeal of the lifetime ban.

The Quattrone appeal was based partly on the Supreme Court decision voiding the Arthur Andersen conviction for shredding documents during an investigation of client Enron Corp. The high court said the Andersen jurors were told erroneously they could convict on witness tampering even if Andersen employees believed their conduct was lawful.

The three-judge appeals-court panel cited the Andersen decision, noting that jury instructions by Judge Owen similarly failed to require a connection -- that Mr. Quattrone intended to obstruct the probe when he sent the email urging the file cleanup. The banker's appeal argued that the instructions misled the jury into concluding they could convict even if he was unaware that his action would affect the IPO probes.

Although the Andersen ruling applied most clearly to the judge's instructions for the third count of witness tampering, the appeals panel ruled that jury instructions for the two counts of obstruction were also deficient.

When Judge Owen summarized the requirements for counts one and two, he said jurors could vote guilty if Mr. Quattrone merely "directed the destruction of documents that were called for" by the subpoenas from the grand jury and the Securities and Exchange Commission. Such a summary "eviscerated" the requirement to find Mr. Quattrone connected the email with the investigation, the panel said.

The panel also ruled that Judge Owen erred in other areas. He restricted Mr. Quattrone's answers to "yes" and "no" during cross-examination, denying him room for explanation. The judge also improperly allowed prosecutors to suggest that Mr. Quattrone violated securities rules in attempting to collect a fee from Research In Motion Ltd. Prosecutors focused on that email because it was written just after the file-cleanup email.

In addition, the judge also denied Mr. Quattrone the ability to elaborate on why he told CSFB's general counsel in January 2003 that he was unaware of the original IPO probe when he forwarded the email -- namely that he was never charged or questioned in the case.

Judge Owen had sentenced Mr. Quattrone to 18 months in jail in September 2004 but allowed him to remain free pending the appeal. However, the appeals panel ruled, "the evidence is sufficient to support Quattrone's conviction on each count." And the panel ruled that "a rational juror" could have concluded that Mr. Quattrone "was aware that the grand jury sought documents" in the possession of his group members.

And the panel endorsed some of Judge Owen's rulings, such as allowing Mr. Quattrone's pay into evidence or excluding defense evidence of a debate among CSFB lawyers about the firm's document-retention policy.

Mark Zauderer, a New York commercial-trial lawyer uninvolved with the trial, said the decision was "by no means a rejection of the strength and quality of the evidence presented by the government." He said reversals based on faulty jury instructions are "among the most common technical grounds."

Other defense lawyers contended that the case shouldn't have been brought, and reflected the vindictive spirit of the era. Gerald B. Lefcourt, a New York defense attorney unconnected to the trial, said the case "was more about who he was and Wall Street at the time."

Quattrone Conviction Thrown Out (FT)

By Ben White

Financial Times, March 21, 2006

A US federal appeals court on Monday threw out the 2004 obstruction of justice conviction of former star technology investment banker Frank Quattrone, saying the judge in the case had given erroneous instructions to the jury. The appeals court sent the case back for retrial and demanded it be heard by a different judge.

The ruling dealt a blow to the federal government's efforts to crack down on alleged white-collar crime. It followed a similar ruling by the Supreme Court last year voiding the criminal conviction of now defunct accounting firm Arthur Andersen.

A retrial would mark the third time Mr Quattrone, who emerged as the top technology banker of the 1990s, has faced a federal jury. The first trial ended with no decision after a jury was unable to reach a verdict.

In the second trial, a jury convicted Mr Quattrone of two counts of obstructing justice and one count of witness tampering. He was sentenced to 18 months in prison, but remained free pending his appeal.

The Department of Justice on Monday said prosecutors were reviewing the appeals court ruling and assessing their options.

The government's case hinged on a December 2000 e-mail in which Mr Quattrone encouraged subordinates to clean out their e-mail files.

Mr Quattrone sent the e-mail after learning of federal inquiries into the awarding of shares in hot initial public offerings being handled by his former firm, then known as Credit Suisse First Boston. Federal prosecutors said the e-mail constituted a knowing effort to thwart the investigations.

DOJ_NMG_0019886

In the previous trial Mr Quattrone responded that he did not know the extent of government requests for documents when he sent the e-mail.

In its ruling on Monday, the appeals panel ruled that US district judge Richard Owen, the federal judge who presided over Mr Quattrone's second trial, erred when he told jurors they could convict if they found that Mr Quattrone called for the destruction of documents requested by the government even if he did not know exactly which documents were covered by the request.

"Clearly, that instruction is not a correct formulation of the law," the appeals court wrote. "Under the charge, as given, any defendant who urges the destruction of documents might run afoul of [the law] without any proof that the defendant knew the documents were subject to a subpoena."

The appeals panel based its ruling in part on the 2005 Supreme Court decision invalidating the Andersen conviction.

In that ruling, the court said that the instructions in the case wrongly allowed the jury to convict without finding that Andersen employees acted with criminal intent when they tampered with documents relating to Enron, the energy trader. The exact wording of jury instructions is expected to be a major issue in the criminal trials of former Enron chief executives Jeffrey Skilling and Ken Lay.

New trial: Frank Quattrone

Quattrone's Obstruction Conviction Thrown Out (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, March 21, 2006

NEW YORK — A federal appeals court here threw out the conviction of former investment banking star Frank Quattrone, opening the door for yet another retrial in the government's obstruction case unless prosecutors decide to drop the matter once and for all.

In a unanimous decision, the appellate panel ruled that the jury instructions given in the case two years ago by U.S. District Judge Richard Owen were flawed. The panel also acknowledged that Owen's comments during the trial, which rose "beyond mere impatience or annoyance" with the defense, justified Quattrone's request that the matter be reassigned to a new judge.

"We were of course delighted" with the decision, "although I wasn't really surprised with the result," said Mark Pomerantz, the attorney who handled Quattrone's appeal.

The charges against the former Credit Suisse First Boston banker and onetime Silicon Valley rainmaker grew out of a federal investigation into the allocation of red-hot technology IPOs during the dot-com bubble. In December 2000, after being informed that a grand jury was investigating the matter, Quattrone endorsed and circulated a colleague's e-mail reminding subordinates to clean up their files, including paperwork from the IPOs in question.

Prosecutors said Quattrone's sending of the e-mail amounted to obstruction. In his first trial in the fall of 2003 the jury deadlocked, partly because some jurors didn't find Quattrone credible on the stand. His spring 2004 retrial resulted in a conviction.

In their appeal, Quattrone's lawyers argued that Owen's instruction allowed the jury to convict the banker without first determining whether Quattrone knew he was obstructing a federal investigation. Citing the Supreme Court's decision to overturn a guilty verdict against Arthur Andersen last year, the appellate court agreed, writing, "Under the charge, the jury was allowed to convict Quattrone of obstruction regardless of whether he intended such."

John Keker, the Quattrone attorney who clashed frequently with Owen during the two trials, said, "Justice has finally been done."

Asked whether there would be a third trial, a spokeswoman for Michael Garcia, the U.S. Attorney in Manhattan, said, "We are reviewing the opinion and considering our options."

Legal experts note that the government still has a strong case. "The circuit court didn't find the evidence unpersuasive," said New York attorney Mark Zauderer. "Instructions can be cured, whereas presentation of evidence can't be cured."

Appeals Court Overturns Quattrone's Conviction (LAT)

By Jesus Sanchez

The Los Angeles Times, March 21, 2006

A New York federal appeals court today threw out the conviction of former Silicon Valley investment banker Frank Quattrone on obstruction of justice charges, setting the stage for the financier's third trial.

The U.S. 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals sided with Quattrone and ordered a new trial before a different judge after finding that the instructions the jurors received in his second trial were "erroneous."

DOJ_NMG_0019887

Quattrone helped bring an array of high-profile technology companies public, including Amazon.com and Cisco Systems. He was convicted in May 2004 of obstructing federal investigations into alleged kickbacks from initial public offerings by urging staff members through e-mails to purge documents from their files.

An initial trial in late 2003 ended in a hung jury.

Quattrone's case revolved around an e-mail he wrote to his staff at Credit Suisse First Boston's technology group in Palo Alto in December 2000. The brief message encouraged his subordinates to comply with an e-mail sent by another banker telling them to "clean up" their files.

Prosecutors said the intent of Quattrone's e-mail was to destroy documents sought in federal probes into whether the investment bank forced customers to pay kickbacks for shares of hugely profitable IPOs in the late-1990s bull market.

Quattrone had argued that he thought the investigations centered on other units of his company. He also was unaware that a grand jury subpoena called for documents from his technology banking group, his attorneys claimed.

In appealing his conviction, Quattrone's attorneys had argued that jurors should have been told that they could convict his client only if it was proved that Quattrone knew that the grand jury subpoena sought documents from his banking group and that he intentionally sought to thwart the probe by sending his e-mail.

Since jurors were not so instructed, the lawyers said, they could not have found criminal intent.

Federal prosecutors countered by saying that Quattrone was well aware of the government investigations and found out about the grand jury subpoena only two days before he encouraged his staff to "clean up" their files.

The three-member appeals panel found that Quattrone's defense about the government inquiry into his unit "was eliminated from the jury's consideration" and final instructions.

Bloomberg, March 21, 2006

March 20 (Bloomberg) -- Frank Quattrone, who made $120 million in 2000 as Credit Suisse's top technology banker, won a new trial today, after a federal appeals court in New York threw out his conviction for obstructing justice.

Quattrone, 50, faces a third trial before a new judge on charges he urged fellow bankers to destroy records. The U.S. 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals in New York today tossed out Quattrone's conviction for obstructing justice and witness tampering and ordered a new trial, ``because the jury instructions were erroneous," the justices said.

``The presumption is that there is a new trial unless the government decides not to retry the case," said Jacob Frenkel, a former federal prosecutor and now a lawyer in Rockville, Maryland, who's not involved in the case. ``The government could walk away altogether."

It's now up to federal prosecutors to decide whether to re- try the former investment banker. Today's reversal may also lead the government and Quattrone to open plea negotiations. Quattrone was convicted in May 2004 after his first trial ended in a hung jury in October 2003.

Quattrone's lawyers had argued that U.S. District Judge Richard Owen, who presided over the first two trials, was biased against him. While the appeals court rejected that claim, the justices decided it was best to have a different judge hear the case.

``Ultimately we believe that the interest and appearance of justice are better served by reassignment" to a new judge, the appeals court said. The justices called Owen ``a dedicated jurist" and said remarks the defense had objected to arose from ``mere impatience or annoyance."

`Clean Up' Files

Owen sentenced Quattrone, who's been free pending the outcome of the appeal, to 18 months in prison.

Quattrone's spokesman, Robert Chlopak, and his lawyer, Mark Pomerantz, didn't immediately return calls seeking comment. Bridget Kelly, a spokeswoman for U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia, didn't have an immediate comment.

Quattrone was convicted of hindering probes into how Credit Suisse allocated shares in initial public stock offerings. The conviction ended the career of a banker who took dozens of companies public, including Amazon.com Inc. in 1997.

The case hinged on a December 2000 e-mail written by a colleague urging Credit Suisse employees to ``clean up" their files and discard documents. Quattrone forwarded the message after learning that a grand jury was investigating how Credit Suisse distributed IPO shares.

`Rife With Error'

Quattrone endorsed the e-mail before passing it on, noting that he'd been a witness in a securities-fraud lawsuit. He said the experience led him to ``strongly advise" Credit Suisse employees to follow the bank's document retention policy, which called for routine purging of some records.

DOJ_NMG_0019888

Pomerantz told the appeals court in July that the trial ``was rife with error." He said that while Quattrone knew prosecutors had subpoenaed Credit Suisse, Owen never told jurors that they had to find that the government wanted documents from Quattrone's Palo Alto, California-based division, in order to convict him.

The appeals court agreed, citing ``a glaring deficiency" in Owen's instruction to the jury. Under the law, the panel had to find that Quattrone knew that the government wanted the documents he ordered destroyed, the court said. Owen failed to deliver such an instruction, the court said.

At the trial, Quattrone never disputed that he knew the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission were investigating Credit Suisse. He said he thought the investigations related to other areas of the bank.

Credit Suisse spokeswoman Victoria Harmon declined to comment on the appeals court ruling today.

Quattrone Conviction Reversed By 2nd Circuit (LAW)

By Mark Hamblett, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, March 21, 2006

The conviction of former Credit Suisse First Boston star investment banker Frank Quattrone was reversed Monday by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Citing flawed jury instructions, the 2nd Circuit vacated guilty verdicts against Quattrone for obstruction of justice, obstructing an agency proceeding and witness tampering.

The 2nd Circuit also took the rare step of taking the case away from Southern District Judge Richard Owen -- which made Monday's 61-page ruling a sweeping victory for Quattrone and his legal team. Lawyers for Quattrone argued that several remarks and rulings by Judge Owen gave the appearance that the judge was biased against their client. The 2nd Circuit said it could find no evidence of such bias, but it nonetheless found that the "interest and appearance of justice are better served by reassignment."

The appeal in U.S. v. Quattrone, 04-5007-cr, was decided by 2nd Circuit Judges Richard Wesley and Peter Hall, and Northern District Chief Judge Frederick Scullin, sitting by designation. Judge Wesley wrote for the court.

U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia now must decide whether to retry Quattrone. If Garcia decides to go ahead, it would be the third trial for the former head of Credit Suisse's Global Technology Group, which was accused of obstructing two investigations into the allocation of shares in red-hot initial public offerings during the height of the high-tech boom.

While Quattrone's first trial ended with a deadlocked jury, he was convicted on the government's second attempt in 2004.

The heart of the trial concerned Quattrone's communications with members of the technology group while information on the IPO allocation process was being sought in parallel investigations by the National Association of Securities Dealers and the Securities and Exchange Commission. A federal grand jury was empaneled in fall 2000 and, on Nov. 21, 2000, it issued subpoenas to Credit Suisse and eight of its officers.

Quattrone learned that the grand jury had joined the IPO investigation on Dec. 3, 2000. That same day he had several exchanges with David Brodsky, then general counsel for the Americas at Credit Suisse, including one e-mail in which Brodsky said there had been "recent developments that are of extreme concern."

Brodsky noted in another e-mail that no one, as yet, had been accused of any criminal activity, but he warned Quattrone "do not, under any circumstances discuss these facts with anyone" and closed by saying he needed to speak with Quattrone personally.

On Dec. 4, 2000, Richard Char, a banker with the technology group, sent Quattrone a draft e-mail warning employees that the "securities litigation bar is mounting an all-out assault on broken tech IPOs," and urged the employees to abide by the firm's "document retention policy." Under the policy, employees of completed IPOs are supposed to destroy any nonessential documents.

Char told employees to "catch up on file cleanup," and closed by saying, "Today, it's administrative housekeeping. In January, it could be improper destruction of evidence." Quattrone first warned Char that he "shouldn't make jokes like that on email!"

But that same day, he began to draft what was called by prosecutors the "endorsement email." The following day, within hours of learning from Brodsky that he should retain a lawyer and it was likely he would be called as a witness, Quattrone completed and transmitted the following e-mail to employees: "having been a key witness in a securities litigation case in south texas (sic) I strongly advise you to follow these procedures."

Some employees began to clean up, or continued cleaning up their files until the company's legal compliance division sent out notice to stop the editing process.

Quattrone testified in his own defense at both trials, insisting that he lacked the intent to obstruct justice and that he did not know about the SEC subpoena and knew very little about the grand jury subpoena on documents -- a subpoena that covered documents for hundreds of transactions.

DEFICIENT JURY INSTRUCTIONS

On the appeal, Judge Wesley said the evidence was sufficient to support Quattrone's conviction on each count. The court agreed with the government that a jury could reasonably conclude that he acted with intent to obstruct and that the jury was "free to reject Quattrone's explanation that he thought the investigation focused on a separate business area of the bank." And the evidence on witness tampering, Wesley said, was "clearly sufficient."

But Judge Owen erred by giving "deficient" jury instructions on charges one and two, the obstruction counts, Wesley said.

"Under the charge, the jury was allowed to convict Quattrone of obstruction regardless of whether he intended such," he said. "Quattrone's defense of lack of knowledge of the specific focus of the investigation of Tech Group IPO activities was eliminated from the jury's consideration." On the witness tampering charge, he said "there was a failure to charge an essential element of the crime," the appellate judge concluded.

"The court informed the jury that a prerequisite to criminal liability -- some nexus between the effort to tamper with or withhold documents pertaining to the relevant proceeding and awareness that such conduct was likely to affect the proceeding -- was inapplicable," Wesley said. "Given this error, the disputed evidence of Quattrone's awareness as to whether the investigations called for documents to be culled as a result of his endorsement email, and the inadequacy of the nexus charges on counts one and two," the court could not be confident that a "properly instructed," jury would have convicted Quattrone on witness tampering.

LIMITS ON TESTIMONY

Quattrone challenged limits placed on his testimony by Judge Owen and other rulings by the judge. He complained that the judge was sharp and dismissive of Quattrone and his attorneys and gave the impression to the jury that he did not believe Quattrone.

Among several claims made by Quattrone was that Owen, sua sponte, ordered him to answer "yes," or "no" to certain questions -- and the government was able to contend in summation that he was evasive in answering the questions.

His arguments resonated with the circuit. "In this circuit, a defendant's right to a fair trial is infringed when a judge's questions and comments convey to the jury that the judge disbelieves the defendant's testimony," Judge Wesley said. But, at the same time, he noted, judges have trial-management authority that includes the discretion "to place reasonable limits on the presentation of evidence." "The exercise of that discretion, however, must remain tethered in some way to the facts and circumstances of the case presented," Wesley said. "Accordingly, when confronted with an evasive witness, trial judges must be careful to safeguard the witness's ability to answer questions, particularly in the case of a criminal defendant-witness."

In such cases, Wesley said, "a trial judge should allow for complete answers by the defendant ... "

A 'DEDICATED JURIST'

The circuit went on to reject several challenges Quattrone made to other rulings by Judge Owen before it turned to a delicate explanation of its reason for reassigning the case to another judge.

While Quattrone claimed that Owen was no longer impartial in the case, the government said the standard for remanding to another judge had not been met. It argued Quattrone's complaints were based on a media campaign by his handlers to discredit the judge.

Calling Owen a "dedicated jurist," the circuit said "in our view, the contentions of the parties in this difficult and complex matter have taken a toll on all involved."

"While we have considered the government's arguments and do not find evidence that the trial judge made any inappropriate statements leading us to seriously doubt his impartiality, portions of the transcript raise the concern that certain comments could be viewed as rising beyond mere impatience or annoyance," Wesley said. "Ultimately, we believe that the interest and appearance of justice are better served by reassignment."

The government said it was reviewing the decision and weighing its options.

Quattrone was represented by John Keker of Keker & Van Nest in San Francisco at trial. His lead attorney on appeal was Mark Pomerantz of Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison. He was also represented by attorneys with Mayer, Brown, Rowe & Maw.

In a statement, Pomerantz described his client as "an innocent man who was wrongly convicted in a trial that denied him his most fundamental right to fairness." The statement pointed out that the circuit's decision will affect Quattrone's appeal of an NASD order barring him for life from the securities industry.

Assistant U.S. Attorneys David Anders, who tried the case, and Jessica Mordas and Harry Sandick represented the government. Then-U.S. Attorney David Kelley was on the brief.

Quattrone's Fate Turns On Mundane Detail (WSJ)

By Paul Davies And Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

At the end of any jury trial, the judge's instructions to the jurors can be the most boring part of the proceedings.

They can also be the most important. Just ask Frank Quattrone.

A federal appeals court Monday overturned the 2004 conviction of Mr. Quattrone, a former investment banker, due to "erroneous" jury instructions. (Court's decision1)

"In the lawyer movies they don't have the climatic scene on jury instructions," says John Carroll, a former federal prosecutor. "It is something that seems kind of technical and is outside of the consciousness of the reader-public, but it is important."

A jury convicted Mr. Quattrone of two obstruction-of-justice counts and one witness-tampering count for his actions during an investigation of alleged kickbacks involving initial public offerings of stock, including emailing colleagues at then-named Credit Suisse First Boston, a unit of Credit Suisse Group, that it was "time to clean up those files."

The court ruled that U.S. District Judge Richard Owen's instructions to jurors wrongly allowed them to convict him of obstruction for urging the destruction of documents without determining "that the defendant knew the documents were subject to a subpoena [or document request]." The panel said that "the jury was allowed to convict Quattrone of obstruction of justice regardless of whether he intended such."

The witness-tampering conviction was overturned because, after Mr. Quattrone's conviction, the Supreme Court -- in a similar case against the accounting firm of Arthur Andersen -- ruled that jurors should have been told that a conviction requires a link between the defendant urging the destruction of documents and "a particular proceeding." The judge in the Quattrone case didn't include such an instruction.

Appeals in white-collar cases almost routinely include one of the judge's jury instructions. Unlike in a case involving a murder, it isn't always clear to a jury what violates the technical requirements in finding somebody guilty of violating securities or obstruction-of-justice laws.

While judges start from a standard set of instructions, they tailor them to fit each case, and both sides often hotly contest exactly what the jury should be told, because jurors usually pay close attention. "If you don't get reasonable instructions you could be put out of the case," attorney Gerald B. Lefcourt said.

Lawyers for former WorldCom Inc. Chief Executive Bernard Ebbers based the pending appeal of his fraud conviction in part on the instructions U.S. District Judge Barbara Jones gave to the jury.

In that case, the question centered on whether the judge should have instructed that it could find Mr. Ebbers guilty if he consciously avoided knowing about the fraud. Judge Jones initially agreed with the defense that argued against including such an instruction, but she later added it after Mr. Ebbers testified that he didn't know about the crime. In her instructions, Judge Jones said jurors could find Mr. Ebbers guilty if they thought he strongly suspected a fraud -- but intentionally avoided finding out about it. Mr. Ebbers's attorney, Reid Weingarten, said he worried some jurors may have concluded that Mr. Ebbers should be convicted if they found simply that he should have known about the fraud.

The appeals court in the Quattrone case said that, given the way the judge framed other instructions, he improperly included a "conscious avoidance" instruction, but it said one might be appropriate in a retrial.

Such an instruction could become an issue in the continuing federal criminal trial of former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay and former CEO Jeffrey Skilling. Even if the prosecutors don't seek to include that instruction, how the judge instructs the jury will likely be debated.

Conscious-avoidance instructions are "always fertile ground for appellate issues because the line between conscious avoidance on the one side and recklessness and negligence on the other is difficult to enunciate," said Paul Shechtman, a defense lawyer with Stillman & Friedman. "I could spend the rest of my life trying to understand the law of conscious avoidance in a conspiracy case and still not get it."

Mr. Lefcourt said jury instructions are a key part of any appeal. "Judges do get it wrong," he said. "Reversals are often caused by improper jury instructions."

There is a movement by some state bar associations to have jury instructions written in plain English. In 2003, the California state bar association adopted new plain English jury instructions for civil cases eliminating phrases like "preponderance of evidence" with words jurors could understand better. Other movements are afoot in making the language less legal boilerplate in favor of words and concepts that nonlawyers could understand.

DOJ_NMG_0019891

Judges often are loath to stray from the standard instructions because they risk being overturned. "The irony is as you stray from the script and try to make it clearer, you run a risk of making an error," Mr. Shechtman said.

Order To Assign New Judge Is Unusual (WSJ)

By Robin Sidel And Peter Lattman

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

Judge Richard Owen presided over two of Frank Quattrone's obstruction-of-justice trials. He won't be around for the third.

In reversing the conviction of the former star technology-industry investment banker, a federal appeals court yesterday assigned a new judge to the case, saying that "the interests of all involved would best be served by another judge." The appeals court didn't name the judge who would take the case.

"We are confident that the new judge will exercise the appropriate discretion in balancing the competing interests of an orderly presentation of evidence and defendant's right to raise a defense," according to the 61-page ruling issued by the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Manhattan. In remanding the case, the appeals panel determined that jury instructions were "erroneous."

Judge Owen, 83 years old, couldn't immediately be reached for comment.

Lawyers who aren't involved in the case said it is rare for an appeals court to assign a new judge when sending a case back to the lower court for a new trial.

"It is highly unusual for the court of appeals to reverse a case with instructions that it be assigned to a new trial judge because it implies that the appellate court believes that the original judge may have been partial to one side or the other," said former prosecutor Marc Mukasey, now of Bracewell & Giuliani in New York. "In this case, however, the court of appeals stressed that it didn't question Judge Owen's impartiality."

Judge Owen's conduct was one of several issues raised in Mr. Quattrone's appeal after he was convicted of obstructing a federal investigation into initial public offerings of stock. The conviction came in a retrial following a 2003 mistrial. The former banker at Credit Suisse Group's then-named Credit Suisse First Boston had been sentenced to 18 months in prison, but remained free during the appeals process.

Over the course of the retrial, Mr. Quattrone's lawyer, John Keker, complained several times about Judge Owen's rulings and body language. In one instance, the judge wouldn't let Mr. Keker introduce evidence. Judge Owen, for his part, threatened to find Mr. Keker in contempt of court.

The appeal challenged several of Judge Owen's rulings, including limitations that were placed on Mr. Quattrone's testimony. The appeal filed by Mr. Quattrone, 50, contended the court's interference with his testimony "crossed the line beyond legitimate trial management" and deprived him of a fair trial. The government defended Judge Owen's actions.

In yesterday's ruling, the appeals court didn't determine that Judge Owen infringed on Mr. Quattrone's rights to a fair trial, but noted that "a trial judge should allow for complete answers by a defendant."

Daniel Richman, a law professor at Fordham University, said "It's clear that the panel took pains not to suggest that they were buying the arguments Quattrone's lawyers were making about Judge Owen's bias...but clearly they were aware of the complicated dynamics between the defense lawyers and the judge in the case."

Despite the decision yesterday, it isn't clear if a new judge will get to hear Mr. Quattrone's case. "We are reviewing the opinion and considering our options," said a spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office, which prosecuted the case.

Enron Former Auditors Testify On Charges, Reserve Accounts (WSJ)

By Gary McWilliams And John R. Emshwiller

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

HOUSTON -- Two former partners of Enron Corp.'s outside auditor, Arthur Andersen LLP, took the witness stand to help prosecutors link former top company executives Kenneth Lay1 and Jeffrey Skilling2 to the alleged manipulation of the energy firm's reported financial results.

The auditors' testimony at the beginning of the eighth week of the conspiracy and fraud trial touched on two main areas: the alleged downward manipulation of charges for goodwill expenses and the alleged misuse of reserve accounts to bump up reported earnings.

In the case of goodwill, prosecutors contend that Mr. Lay, Enron's former chairman, misled Andersen and the public in October 2001 about the company's plans for its big water-distribution unit in order to avoid a hefty charge to earnings. On the reserve issue, the government contends Enron improperly tapped a reserve account to meet the desire by Mr. Skilling, the former company president, to beat analysts' earnings estimates.

The goodwill issue arose because of a new accounting rule in 2001 that required the write-down of an asset if it didn't meet certain criteria, which in the case of the Enron water unit included whether the company had an expensive growth plan, testified John R. Sult, one of the former Andersen partners. Without such a growth strategy, said Mr. Sult, Enron likely would have been forced to recognize an "impairment," or write-down, which prosecutors have said could have totaled hundreds of millions of dollars.

Enron officials at the time claimed that they were planning to spend well over $1 billion to expand the water business, said Mr. Sult. He said he was surprised to hear that because the company had previously indicated that the water operation was a noncore business likely to be sold.

The other government witness, former Andersen partner Thomas Bauer, testified to attending a meeting on Oct. 12, 2001, in which Mr. Lay told Andersen that "water was the commodity of the 21st century." Mr. Lay "talked of building the water business" and "expanding it from its current state," said Mr. Bauer. Prosecutors contend that such assurances were false and aimed at avoiding a costly write-down, and have presented emails from other Enron officials to support that argument.

Mr. Sult, the first witness, also said that later in October, Mr. Lay misled analysts during a conference call about the status of Andersen's review of the water issue. Mr. Lay said that Andersen had concluded that an impairment on the water business wasn't necessary. At the time, Andersen's review of the issue was still "preliminary and incomplete," Mr. Sult said.

After a month of review, Mr. Sult added, "I was unable to find any evidence" that Enron did have a growth strategy for the water business. By that point in mid-November 2001, Enron was deep into a financial crisis that would push it into bankruptcy proceedings a few weeks later.

On reserve accounts, Mr. Bauer said they shouldn't be used to meet an earnings target. He said he was "quite surprised" when federal investigators showed him company emails indicating reserve accounts had been used for that purpose. He added that he was unaware that one particular account in 2000 had been drained of about $14 million. However, in cross-examination, a Skilling attorney showed emails indicating other Andersen officials had been apprised of that reduction.

Mr. Bauer also said that during his years auditing Enron he had never seen a handwritten list, known as the "Global Galactic" memo, written by former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow3. Prosecutors claim the memo lays out various secret Enron deals to illegally manipulate financial results. The defense contends that there were no such secret side deals.

Mr. Bauer is scheduled to be cross-examined today by Mr. Lay's defense team.

By Jeremiah Marquez

AP, March 21, 2006

LOS ANGELES - A federal judge found former Gemstar-TV Guide CEO Henry C. Yuen liable for securities fraud, according to a ruling unsealed Monday in a federal regulatory lawsuit that claimed Yuen inflated the company's revenue by $248 million to boost its stock.

U.S. District Judge Mariana R. Pfaelzer also found Yuen liable for misrepresenting facts to Gemstar's auditors and falsifying its books.

The Securities and Exchange Commission will now submit a proposed penalty.

Yuen's attorney, Stanley Arkin, said an appeal was being considered.

Gemstar, meanwhile, said in a statement that it was pleased by the decision to hold Yuen "accountable for his wrongful and inappropriate actions."

Pfaelzer's findings came almost three years after the SEC filed the lawsuit against Yuen and Elsie Leung, Gemstar's ex-finance chief, in an alleged scheme to inflate company revenue to meet certain financial targets.

Regulators contend that Yuen's actions contributed to a windfall between 2000 and 2002 - at least $18.8 million in salary and bonuses, $14.6 million in exercised stock options, and more than $63.6 million in Gemstar stock sales.

"After nearly three years of litigation, the court categorically rejected Henry Yuen's finger pointing and attempts to blame others for the massive fraud at Gemstar," said Randall Lee, the SEC's regional director.

Since November 2002, Gemstar has restated or reversed certain license and ad revenues by $357 million, with more than $230 million stemming from transactions in the case, according to the ruling.

Yuen knew but didn't disclose that a good portion of licensing revenue for 2000 and 2001 came from expired and disputed licensing agreements, the judge said. What's more, he misled investors when Gemstar recorded non-monetary payments as ad revenue, and booked revenue from so-called round trip transactions in which Gemstar paid money to a third party only to receive it back again, she said.

DOJ_NMG_0019893

The goal, regulators said, was to make the company look healthier than it otherwise might have been in hopes of buoying its stock price.

In an August 2000 e-mail, Yuen appeared to scold another executive over certain internal revenue forecasts.

"This is completely unacceptable," Yuen wrote, according to court transcripts unsealed Monday that focused on the e-mail exchange. "The street ... expects some sort of explosive growth.

"We are shooting for the Moon, and I am confident we can do it."

Besides the civil lawsuit, Yuen remains under criminal investigation by the Justice Department following a federal judge's rejection of a plea deal in the case. Under the now-defunct agreement, Yuen was to plead guilty to one felony charge of obstruction of justice for deleting computer files subpoenaed in the SEC's investigation.

Testifying during the civil trial in December, Yuen conceded "there's no doubt" the deleted information was sought by regulators, according to court transcripts.

After leaving his post as chief executive, Yuen worked in another position with Gemstar. He was fired in April 2003 but continues to receive a yearly salary of $2 million plus benefits from the company, said Eileen M. Murphy, a Gemstar spokeswoman. Yuen is challenging his termination and will have to repay the money should he lose.

Leung settled with the SEC last month, agreeing to return $600,000 and pay $750,000 in civil penalties, regulators said.

Gemstar shares closed down 2 cents, 0.67 percent, at $2.96 in trading Monday on the Nasdaq.

Movie Musical 'Chicago' Prompts A Suit Over Profits (NYT)

By Anemona Hartocollis

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

The producer of "Chicago," the Oscar-winning 2002 movie, is charging that Miramax has cheated him out of millions of dollars of profit from it by using deceptive accounting to understate revenue.

The producer, Martin Richards, sold Miramax an option to the movie rights to the musical in 1994. In papers filed in State Supreme Court in Manhattan yesterday, he said that he has been cheated by a Hollywood system of contingency payments to participants in moviemaking like producers, actors and writers that gives studios an incentive to underreport revenues.

Under that system, the court papers say, "the worse a movie performs financially, the better off the studio is."

Emily Bear, a spokeswoman for Miramax, declined to comment yesterday, saying company officials had not yet seen the court papers. Mr. Richards's lawsuit says that he does not know precisely how much he is owed, but it seeks at least $10 million, which he estimates is his share of the movie's profits.

"This picture has been touched by some sort of God," Mr. Richards said in an interview after the suit was filed. "Everything that's happened to it has been great. But it would be nice to be paid for your work."

Mr. Richards declined to say how much he had been paid for the movie upfront, although the court papers said that his contract called for him to be paid several fees, including $500,000 after the movie reached its initial break-even point.

Mr. Richards claimed that most of that money was reimbursement for his expenses. The profits he is seeking would have come after those payments, and, he said, "I have never seen a nickel of the profits."

Mr. Richards, who is 74, produced the musical "Chicago" on Broadway in 1975, and then began a 27-year quest to make a movie out of it, he said in the suit.

The film, which opened in December 2002, starred Richard Gere, Catherine Zeta-Jones and Renée Zellweger, and won six Academy Awards, including one for best picture. The court papers said that the film was budgeted at $47 million and went over budget by about $10 million, though, they contend, Miramax never consulted the producer to approve cost overruns.

The lawsuit is sprinkled with celebrity names —Louise Ciccone, better known as Madonna, appears as a witness to the signatures on Mr. Richards's deal with Miramax described in the suit. It claims that "Chicago" was the highest-grossing film ever released by the studio. The lawsuit said the movie generated gross receipts of about $300 million, including $170 million during its initial domestic release, and many millions more from DVD, video and foreign distribution.

Mr. Richards, as the head of the Producer Circle Company, was the producer of the movie, and Bob and Harvey Weinstein, the founders of Miramax, were the co-executive producers. The Weinsteins are not named as defendants.

"There are two issues," Thomas P. Puccio, Mr. Richards's lawyer, said. "One is how much money is in the pot that Marty shares in, and the second is what are the expenses, and those are two areas that they in this case certainly shortchanged him on."

The suit offers something of an exegesis on accounting practices in the film industry, including the observation that there are at least two forms of accounting used by major studios, financial accounting and contingent compensation. Financial accounting, the papers say, somewhat archly, "tends to be rather run of the mill, reflecting the mundane efforts of Hollywood's C.P.A.'s to match movie revenue with movie costs."

Contingency accounting, the lawsuit says, is "reined in only by the avarice of the studios and the leverage they hold over the talent they hire, is opaque, confusing and leads to patently absurd results."

Studios support creative accounting, the lawsuit says, because so many people involved in the production of a movie are under contracts that award contingent compensation, often including actors, the director, the producer and the writer. The most powerful independent contractors — like major stars — can negotiate contracts known as "gross deals," in which their compensation is based on gross receipts for the movie, with minimal deductions for expenses, the lawsuit says. The less powerful, the papers say, receive "net profit deals," in which, the lawsuit says, "studios typically decrease revenue and increase costs and expenses attributable to the movie."

The suit quotes the actor Eddie Murphy as referring to net deals as "monkey points," meaning, according to the court papers, that "only a monkey would expect them to actually result in any payment to the talent."

Mr. Richards, his lawsuit says, had negotiated what is called a "gross after break-even deal," a contract that is somewhere in between a gross deal and a net deal.

But the lawsuit charges that without Mr. Richards's permission, Miramax turned this into a net deal, and even then, understated its revenues.

Over the past two decades, Miramax has been involved in the production of movies including "The Crying Game," "The Piano, "Pulp Fiction," "The English Patient," "Shakespeare in Love," and "The Cider House Rules."

The Producer Circle Company, which Mr. Richards has headed since its founding in 1975, has been involved in several successful Broadway plays besides Chicago, including "On the Twentieth Century," which opened in 1978 and "La Cage aux Folles," in 1983. Mr. Richards has also been involved with movies like "The Boys from Brazil," in 1978, "The Shining" in 1980 and "Fort Apache the Bronx" in 1981.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Witness In Detectives' Trial Tells Of Pressure To Cooperate (NYT)

By Alan Feuer

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

The federal trial of Louis J. Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa veered today from Brooklyn murder and Las Vegas lunacy to the high-stakes poker game played by government agents and gangland turncoats as the trial's star witness told the jury of the immense "pressure" placed on him to "crack" and cooperate against the two retired detectives in the case.

It was a brief, but fascinating, window into the tactics used by federal agents once a criminal falls into their hands. Under cross-examination by defense lawyers, the witness, Burton Kaplan, testified that, after he was arrested in 1996 on marijuana and tax-evasion charges, "the government was willing to go to any length" to have him "crack" and come "on board to provide information" against Mr. Eppolito, 57, and Mr. Caracappa, 64.

The two men are accused of working under Mr. Kaplan's aegis to commit at least eight gangland murders — seven for Anthony Casso, the second-in-command of the Luchese crime family.

In his fourth day on the stand, Mr. Kaplan, 72, described how, on the night of his arrest, he languished at the Manhattan office of the Drug Enforcement Administration as a parade of 20 to 25 investigators lined up to court his cooperation. Two police inspectors told him, he said, that he could "go home tonight" if he coughed up what he knew about "two dirty cops."

This scene, described in Mr. Kaplan's patented placid manner, was only the start of an almost eight-year-long attempt to get him — a career criminal whose schemes included peddling drugs and selling stolen watches — to testify against the two retired detectives, who, at that point, had already left New York and settled in Las Vegas.

There, Mr. Kaplan testified last week, Mr. Eppolito was playing "bit parts" in movies while writing scripts in his garage and Mr. Caracappa was having a house built while trying his hand at business deals like peddling a George Foreman punching-bag machine to the QVC home-shopping channel.

'Mafia Cops' Witness: Never Shown Photos (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0019895

On his last day on the witness stand yesterday, a key government witness testified that he wasn't aware of any surveillance photos that show him meeting over the years with the alleged "Mafia Cops."

Burton Kaplan, a former garment executive and drug dealer, admitted under cross examination that he has never been shown any surveillance of him with ex-NYPD detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa during clandestine meetings he allegedly had with them in a Staten Island cemetery.

Kaplan, 72, had testified earlier that for a period of about six years he met with both men face-to-face as part of a corrupt arrangement in which the detectives passed him confidential law enforcement information and took part in gangland murders in exchange for cash. Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, are on trial in Brooklyn federal court on racketeering charges, which accuse them of being hit men for the Luchese crime family in the late 1980s and into the early 1990s.

Questioned by Eppolito's lawyer, Bruce Cutler, Kaplan, who is serving a 27-year sentence for marijuana trafficking, said he began meeting with the defendants after a mobster who had been serving as an intermediary was killed in September 1987. That mobster was Frank Santoro Jr., a cousin of Eppolito.

During two full days of cross examination, Kaplan didn't appear to waver or change his story about his dealings with the detectives, whom he has implicated in a dozen mob homicides, including eight charged in the indictment that led to the current trial. Kaplan was a key associate of former acting Luchese boss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso and told the jury yesterday under Cutler's questioning that he had been the subject of video surveillance at his clothing business on Staten Island in the 1990s but insisted he wasn't observed committing any crimes.

The defense is likely to use Kaplan's admission that he wasn't shown surveillance photos to undermine his claim that he met Eppolito and Caracappa during the six-year period.

To deter the possibility of surveillance by law enforcement, Kaplan said he used the code name "Marko" when he called the two detectives and insisted that any telephone calls be made from pay phones. Meetings were held in a Staten Island cemetery, Kaplan explained, to make sure no one was spying on them.

Gangland Gambit On Witness Stand (NYDN)

By JOHN MARZULLI, DAILY NEWS STAFF WRITER

New York Daily News, March 21, 2006

As in Gotti's trial, lawyer's word key in 'mob cop' case

The star witness in the so-called Mafia cops trial will soon have his own corroborating witness - his former lawyer.

Federal prosecutors plan to call Judd Burstein, the ex-mouthpiece of Burton Kaplan, to the witness stand today, the Daily News has learned.

Burstein is expected to testify that Kaplan told him back in 1994 about his role as a middleman between former NYPD Detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa and gangster Anthony (Gaspipe) Casso.

Contacted last night, Burstein acknowledged to The News that he had volunteered to share what he knew with prosecutors.

To be used as a witness, Kaplan had to waive his attorney-client privilege - which he did.

"I thought it was my obligation as a citizen to come forward," Burstein said. "This is the right thing to do."

The surprise witness echoes a successful gambit this month in the racketeering trial of John A. (Junior) Gotti, whose defense team had lawyer Ron Kuby testify that Gotti told him in 1998 that he had left the mob because he was sick of that life.

Gotti's trial ended in a hung jury, the second mistrial for him in six months.

But in this case, it's the feds who are calling the lawyer to the stand.

Kaplan was asked on cross-examination yesterday about an affidavit he filed alleging the feds turned a blind eye to fabricated evidence - just to win the case and pressure Kaplan to cooperate against the reputed Mafia cops after Casso became unusable as a witness.

"Is that what you're doing now?" Eppolito lawyer Bruce Cutler asked Kaplan, who is serving a 27-year sentence.

"No," Kaplan answered, and stuck to his story that he decided to cooperate mainly because he thought Eppolito and Caracappa were going to turn against him first.

Kaplan acknowledged he's hoping for a sentence reduction.

"Mr. Cutler, I've been before judges before and I've never been very lucky," he said.

Kaplan, 72, a crafty career criminal who made millions in the garment business while also participating in criminal schemes - including murder - for the Luchese crime family, deftly handled cross-examination by Cutler and lawyer Edward Hayes, who represents Caracappa.

Brooklyn Federal Judge Jack Weinstein ended Cutler's cross-examination for the second time during the trial after Cutler asked a question in violation of a pretrial order about a lie-detector test administered to Kaplan.

Outside court, Cutler seemed unconcerned.

"Judge Weinstein knows better than I do when I'm finished," he said.

Hollywood Private Eye Wants To Act As Own Lawyer In Wiretap Case (AP)

By Greg Risling, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, March 21, 2006

LOS ANGELES – Imprisoned private investigator Anthony Pellicano said Monday he wants to act as his own lawyer in a case charging that he orchestrated an illegal wiretapping scheme targeting Hollywood celebrities and executives.

During a court hearing, Pellicano spoke at length for the first time since he was indicted last month. He said he wanted to know the results of the government's 3½-year investigation into his activities.

“I have a lot of questions to see what they have been doing all this time,” Pellicano told U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer. “I'm best suited to represent myself.”

Pellicano was shackled and wore a prison-issued green windbreaker and blue pants. He previously pleaded not guilty.

Prosecutors contend that Pellicano illegally wiretapped the phones of Hollywood stars such as Sylvester Stallone and bribed police officers to run the names of more than 60 people, including comedians Garry Shandling and Kevin Nealon, through government databases.

Pellicano allegedly sought damaging information on his clients' rivals. He then used the details for threats, blackmail and in some cases to secure an advantage in court for his clients, according to a 112-count indictment.

A total of 13 people have been charged in the case. Four have pleaded guilty to a variety of charges, including wire fraud and conspiracy.

Pellicano said he doesn't have any problems with his attorney, Steven Gruel. Outside court, Gruel said his client simply “wants to go to trial as soon as possible.”

Gruel will continue to be Pellicano's attorney until the judge decides whether the shamus is competent to represent himself.

Meanwhile, federal prosecutors provided the judge with snippets of their case scheduled to go to trial next month. The proceedings could be delayed.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Saunders said another indictment would be handed down in early April. He didn't say whether the indictment would name more defendants or only add allegations.

Saunders also said he had given some defense attorneys more than 2,000 pages of evidence as well as dozens of digital audio files as part of the discovery process.

He also revealed the government has evidence of some 15,000 computer “runs” by former Los Angeles police Sgt. Mark Arneson, who has pleaded not guilty to charges related to using confidential police databases to search for information for Pellicano.

“They contain some kind of personal information,” Saunders said of the computer inquiries.

Prosecutors are seeking a protective order to prevent key evidence from becoming public before trial. Fischer didn't sign an order Monday but said there would be a protective order of some kind.

Saunders said three search warrant affidavits connected to raids on Pellicano's offices in 2002 would be unsealed later this week. FBI agents found illegal explosives and seized documents and computers during the searches, authorities said.

Pellicano served a 2½-year sentence on explosive-related charges and is awaiting trial in a separate case for allegedly hiring a man to threaten a former Los Angeles Times reporter working on a story about actor Steven Seagal and possible links to the Mafia.

Gruel filed a motion Monday revisiting the legality of the search warrants. Pellicano has maintained that his Fourth Amendment rights were violated because the search was allegedly a ruse to get into his office to look for other suspected wrongdoing. The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled 2-1 in June that the search was legitimate and FBI agents acted in good faith.

“The Pellicano defense seeks discovery that will show that the FBI knew and expected to find a lot more than what they represented to or sought from the magistrate judge,” according to the motion.

Pellicano's Attorney Fights Basis Of Search (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian And Henry Weinstein, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, March 21, 2006

Anthony Pellicano's attorney on Monday challenged the federal government's search of the indicted private eye's office, claiming that authorities misled the courts about their reasons for going after the investigator's records.

DOJ_NMG_0019897

In obtaining a warrant to search Pellicano's Sunset Strip offices four years ago — a search which yielded tape recordings and thousands of pages of computerized records — FBI agents stated that they were investigating Pellicano's alleged links to a threat against Los Angeles Times reporter Anita Busch.

But Steven Gruel, Pellicano's attorney, said in a nine-page motion filed after a status conference in the widening probe that the government's story was a "subterfuge and ruse to get into Mr. Pellicano's office in order to search the premises for other suspected wrongdoing."

Gruel said the government's interest in Pellicano predated the threat against the reporter and may have originated in 2001 with the FBI investigating whether one of its agents had been overheard by Pellicano using an illegal wiretap placed on behalf of clients in an unrelated matter.

In the motion, Gruel also questioned whether the U.S. attorney's office and the FBI may have violated Pellicano's rights at a time when he was acting as his own attorney by seeking information from a former girlfriend after her visits to Pellicano in prison.

The accusations by Gruel, a former federal prosecutor from San Francisco, represent the most dramatic attack to date on the government's case, which so far has resulted in a dozen people being charged with hiring — or helping — Pellicano uncover embarrassing information on others.

Four people have pleaded guilty in the case. The others, including Pellicano, have denied wrongdoing.

"If we can suppress the initial search for evidence, then the whole apple cart gets turned over," Gruel said in an interview after filing his motion. "It could have a domino effect on the entire case."

Describing Gruel's motion as "the initial shot across the bow," Loyola Law professor Laurie Levenson said it suggests the attorney "will play hard ball, that he will show the court and the world that this was a dirty prosecution."

However, Levenson said the search of Pellicano's offices had already been upheld on a 2-1 vote of the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeal after a challenge on different legal grounds by Pellicano's previous attorneys.

In his motion, Gruel said FBI Agent Stan Ornellas stated in a search warrant affidavit that authorities wanted to seize Pellicano's office computers, suggesting a far broader investigation than the threat against Busch.

Gruel noted that long before the search of Pellicano's offices, the FBI had become aware of allegations that one of its own agents had illegally wiretapped while investigating a dispute over control of a $40-million Internet business. Two brothers involved in that dispute have now been charged with benefiting from Pellicano's use of illegal wiretaps.

In questioning the role Pellicano's former girlfriend played in the case, Gruel said it may have been improper for a "cooperating" government witness to be visiting Pellicano in prison at a time when he was representing himself.

Sandra Wil Carradine, the former girlfriend, pleaded guilty last year to hiring Pellicano during a dispute with her ex-husband and has agreed to cooperate with the government's investigation.

Her attorney, Peter Knecht, disputed that Carradine had ever been asked by the government to visit Pellicano in prison for the purpose of obtaining information.

"The government is not stupid," he said. "They were always aware there could be misconduct allegations … so they made it very clear to her that if she wished to visit [Pellicano] in prison, it was on her own terms and they were not interested in anything that pertained to his case and how it would be defended."

Federal prosecutors declined to comment Monday on Gruel's claims, saying instead that they would present their responses in writing to the court.

Gruel filed his motion after a hearing in which Pellicano told U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer that he wanted to represent himself in the case to rapidly move it to trial.

"I don't want to disrupt the court … but it has been almost four years now," Pellicano said, referring to the time he spent imprisoned, first on an explosives conviction and now on wiretap and racketeering charges. "What have [authorities] been doing all this time?"

But Pellicano backed away from his request after the judge made it clear the trial was not going to start anytime soon because prosecutors and defense attorneys need additional time to review the evidence amassed to date. Fischer also said she would not accept a proposal allowing Gruel to sign legal papers on behalf of Pellicano if Pellicano serves as his own attorney.

Federal prosecutors Dan Saunders and Kevin Lally told the packed courtroom that they already have turned over 2,000 pages of documents and 25 hours of audio files to defense attorneys in the case. At the same time, they said they have plenty of confidential information to pore over before it could be shared with defense attorneys or their clients, most of whom are accused of illegally accessing police records or conspiring to wiretap others.

With eight defendants awaiting trial, Saunders has said he expected to file another indictment before the middle of next month.

DOJ_NMG_0019898

During the hearing, government prosecutors and defense attorneys spent considerable time discussing a proposed protective order that would cover the dissemination of confidential information, including phone numbers, addresses and Social Security numbers.

Fischer put off a decision on the order as both sides hammer out its wording.

Witness Describes Deal With Officers (BSUN)

By Matthew Dolan, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, March 21, 2006

Addict-turned-informant testifies he resold drugs confiscated by police

Almost daily on cell phones and regularly in person at Pete's Place Bar & Lounge on North Franklintown Road, an odd couple commiserated. The police officer sometimes joked about his love life; the informant lamented about his heroin addiction and a daughter who was running into trouble with the law in New York.

But in hours of secretly recorded conversations by federal agents, prosecutors say, one topic of conversation dominated the relationship between Detective William A. King and his informant, Antonio Mosby: selling illegal drugs for mutual profit.

A federal jury heard more than a dozen recorded phone calls Monday that prosecutors say show how King and his partner, Detective Antonio L. Murray, shook down drug dealers pointed out by Mosby at open-air drug markets across Baltimore.

Monday's testimony from Mosby, who struck a deal with prosecutors in hopes of a lighter prison sentence, marked the fourth day in the police corruption trial. The proceeding is the culmination of the FBI's seven-month wiretap probe into misconduct in the Baltimore Police Department that ended with the May 2005 arrests of King and Murray.

In a 33-count indictment in U.S. District Court, they are accused of conspiring to rob and extort cocaine, heroin and marijuana -- as well as drug-related proceeds -- from suspects they pursued.

Now imprisoned, Mosby, 40, spent most of Monday morning on the witness stand explaining how he bought and sold heroin in West Baltimore for some 25 years before his arrest last year by federal agents.

He told jurors he first met King and Murray in the spring of 2003 when Mosby was arrested with five gel capsules of heroin.

"They were pretty much asking me what could I help them with," Mosby said.

Mosby was not charged and instead registered as a confidential informant, making him eligible for payments from the Police Department. Hanging over his head, Mosby said, was the possibility that King and Murray would charge him with drug possession if he didn't cooperate.

"They had the pills," he explained Monday. "So I felt obligated" to call the officers with tips about drug activity.

At first, Mosby said, he thought he would just be providing lawful information to King and Murray. Soon, he said, "I became aware."

His awareness was of the illegal drug business set up by King and Murray, according to prosecutors. Mosby provided information about which "hitters" were carrying drugs; King and Murray would "catch and release" the dealers, stripping them of their money and drugs. Then, according to prosecutors and trial testimony, the officers would illegally sell the drugs to Mosby at a discount. He in turn, he said, resold the drugs back out on the streets.

They called it "grinding," Mosby told the jury.

Among the targets, Mosby said, were "old heads," or older drug dealers and users. King told Mosby that the officers didn't want information about juveniles, who would require a lengthy arrest booking process, or young people who would be apt to run from the detectives and require a chase.

Attorneys for King and Murray centered their questioning Monday on whether the officers had attempted to use Mosby and other informants to crack large-scale drug dealers.

Under cross-examination, Mosby told King's attorney Edward Smith Jr. that he was a longtime heroin addict who needed five hits of the drug a day to keep from being "sick." He sold the drug to family and friends, delivering heroin to their workplaces at lunchtime.

"You didn't see anything wrong with that? You felt you were doing them a service?" Smith asked Mosby.

"In a sense, yes," Mosby said.

Eight More Charged With Bilking Red Cross Hurricane Funds (SFC)

San Francisco Chronicle, March 21, 2006

The number of Bakersfield-area people indicted in a scheme that bilked thousands of dollars from an American Red Cross fund designated for Hurricane Katrina victims has risen to 61, federal authorities said.

Eight people were indicted last week in federal court in Fresno on charges of wire fraud and filing fake claims to the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

During the aftermath of Katrina, the Red Cross rushed to set up call centers across the country that provided qualifying victims with a personal identification number they then presented to receive aid funds from Western Union, prosecutor Stanley A. Boone said.

The Bakersfield center was the largest center and handled calls from across the country. The Red Cross contacted the FBI after it performed an audit and discovered an unusually high number of claims were being paid out at Western Union outlets in the Bakersfield area, even though not many evacuees had moved there.

Those recently charged were Ronika Danyell Spears, 21; Cherri Lynn Brown, 29; Ulysses Jack Perkins, 23; Kathy Ann Hollis, 38; Richard Eugene Raymond, 35; Phillip Anthony Wyatt, 31; Atiffa Guadalupe Dunbar, 26; and Cheryl L. Tateveasay, 53.

Since the Justice Department began its investigations, 25 people charged from the Bakersfield center have pleaded guilty to felony charges.

Across the country, others have returned money, according to a Justice Department report released last month. FEMA and the Red Cross reported receiving more than $8 million in returned funds, along with confession letters and requests for payment plans to pay back the money, the report said.

The fraud charges carry a maximum 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine. The false claims to FEMA carry a maximum sentence of five years and $250,000 fine.

City Hall Hiring On FBI's Radar In '97 (CHIT)

By Michael Higgins And Todd Lighty, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, March 21, 2006

Court hearing reveals interest in hirings

As far back as 1997, federal authorities were investigating the hiring practices in Mayor Richard Daley's administration—obtaining backup tapes from the city's mainframe computer system and questioning a top Daley aide about how some people got their city jobs.

The disclosures of the government's earlier interest in City Hall hiring came Monday during a routine court hearing for Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich, who is under indictment along with three others.

Sorich and his co-defendants were charged in September with rigging city hiring in order to reward the mayor's political allies with government jobs.

Sorich's lawyer, Thomas Anthony Durkin, said FBI agents had interviewed his client in August 1997 as part of the earlier City Hall corruption investigation known as Operation Silver Shovel. Durkin said in court that at the time agents specifically asked Sorich about hiring practices.

Silver Shovel, a 1990s federal investigation that focused on payoffs for illegal dumping, ultimately led to the convictions of six aldermen and 12 others, but Sorich was never accused of any wrongdoing in that probe.

Federal authorities also have computer tapes they obtained as part of the Silver Shovel investigation, Durkin said. He believes the old computer records may contain the same information that the government seized from Sorich's portable laptop computer only last year—a 1997 list of people that Daley's office had recommended for city jobs.

"We consider that ... to be extremely exculpatory," Durkin said. "Something they considered to be a smoking gun in 2005 was in their possession in 1997."

Prosecutors acknowledged Monday that they have 15 backup computer tapes from the city's mainframe computer, but they did not say whether anyone from the government had ever been able to access the information or even looked at it.

"It seems to me either it can be opened or can't be opened," Durkin said. "The question is can you open it and if so, what's on it?"

DOJ_NMG_0019900

Assistant U.S. Attorneys Patrick Collins and Barry Miller did not concede that information in the 1997 records would be helpful to the defense. They said they were trying to obtain software needed to read the records.

Miller suggested that as far as prosecutors know, the 1997 records are not the same as those being used in the case against Sorich. He also said the government does not believe information contained on Sorich's personal laptop would be on the mainframe computer tapes.

Jodi Kawada, speaking for the city's Law Department, said reading the tapes requires a program that is no longer in use.

"In 1997, in response to a federal grand jury subpoena, we turned over a computer to the U.S. attorney's office," Kawada said. "We understand that this computer is now relevant to an ongoing criminal investigation by the U.S. attorney's office. For that reason, it would not be appropriate for us to comment on the content of the computer."

The Sorich case currently is scheduled for trial in early May before U.S. District Judge David Coar. But both defense lawyers and prosecutors said that the trial could be postponed, in part, depending on how soon authorities are able to read the tapes.

The hiring scandal broke with a midnight raid on April 30 when federal agents searched the mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs on the fourth floor of City Hall. Authorities say IGA was at the center of a "massive fraud" that spanned 12 years and involved hiring in some of the biggest City Hall departments, including Water Management, Streets and Sanitation and Transportation.

Along with Sorich, a grand jury indicted Timothy McCarthy, who worked in IGA under Sorich, and former Streets and Sanitation officials John Sullivan and Patrick Slattery.

All four were accused of mail fraud. Sullivan also was charged with lying to federal agents investigating the allegations.

A fifth defendant, former Streets and Sanitation official Daniel Katalinic, pleaded guilty and is cooperating with the ongoing investigation. He secretly recorded conversations with Sorich and has admitted leading a pro-Daley political group whose members were rewarded with city jobs and promotions.

Sorich, McCarthy and Slattery are from Daley's native Bridgeport neighborhood and have ties to the Daley family's 11th Ward Democratic Organization.

The indictment also described the involvement of a "co-schemer" in the hiring fraud, identified as former top Daley aide Victor Reyes. Reyes, who has not been charged and denies wrongdoing, directed IGA for five years and is the leader of the Hispanic Democratic Organization, the largest pro-Daley patronage army.

I Must Rebut Campbell Lawyers An Army Of Feds Spent Millions On Probe? Not True (AJC)

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, March 21, 2006

Last week The Atlanta Journal-Constitution published an opinion piece by Michael Coleman, Bill Campbell's attorney and a defense witness in the trial that ended with Campbell's conviction for three felony tax crimes ("End effort to tar, feather Campbell," @issue, March 16).

Like his client, Coleman claims that the government's investigation targeted Campbell, lasted for eight years and cost "millions of dollars in resources and manpower." That is not true.

Following Justice Department policy and court rules, we said little publicly until the Campbell trial was over. But now we may speak more freely and set the record straight.

In truth, the investigation began almost six years after Campbell took office, in late 1999, when we first received multiple, specific allegations of corruption throughout City Hall. Less than five years later, in August 2004, Campbell was indicted. During those five years, we charged and convicted 11 other city officials and contractors, including the chief operating officer, deputy COO and chief administrative officer. Campbell's trial was repeatedly delayed by his motions and other requests.

While Campbell was mayor, we encountered remarkable resistance from the city attorney's office on requests for city documents and interviews with city employees. At one point, the City Council had to pass a resolution directing the city attorney to stop interceding in interviews. The city was the victim of any corruption, and this interference by its lawyers was unprecedented in our long experience in public corruption cases throughout Georgia. It stopped as soon as Mayor Shirley Franklin took office.

Even considering the delays caused by this resistance, our investigation did not involve millions of dollars or a government "army," [the term used by Campbell's lead defense attorney Billy Martin during closing arguments]. In fact, the financial and tax investigation that was key to convicting Campbell and other officials and contractors was conducted almost entirely by one IRS agent, who also worked on unrelated cases.

The "army" from the FBI and U.S. attorney's office consisted of one or two agents and two prosecutors who focused on the overall City Hall investigation. It increased to three prosecutors shortly before Campbell's indictment and to five agents only in the months just before and during his trial. Those prosecutors were also handling other major cases, including the Eric Rudolph bombing case and the Fulton County and Linda Schrenko corruption cases.

This was no "army" wasting taxpayer money. It was a small but talented group of public servants dedicated to finding the truth and bringing lawbreakers to justice. But in essence the mayor's lawyer's argument is that, if someone concocts a criminal scheme that is complicated and difficult to uncover, and obstructs and delays efforts to do so, we should ignore the crimes rather than invest the time and resources needed to bring them to court.

Our goal in this case, and all our cases, is to follow the evidence wherever it leads, and if we uncover substantial evidence of crimes (as we did with Campbell), to present it in court to a jury representing the community. We respect the jury's verdict in the Campbell case, which we expect will soon lead to Campbell's being sent to prison.

I agree with Coleman on two points: Some good things did happen in Atlanta during Campbell's administration, and it is now time to move forward. I can only hope that the exposure of corruption and crime by Campbell and his cronies, and the penalties that they pay, will deter future public officials from undermining the trust of Atlanta residents and the reputation of this great city.

So Hard To Say, 'It's Time To Resign' (PHI)

By Michael Currie Schaffer And John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 21, 2006

Many members of City Council hope Rick Mariano will resign following his federal corruption conviction last week. It's just that they don't want to call on him to step down.

The legislators' semantic two-step came as city solicitor Romulo L. Diaz Jr. issued an opinion confirming that the state ban on felons in elected office won't kick in until Mariano's sentencing, which Judge Lawrence F. Stengel yesterday set for July 6.

Convicted on Friday of 18 counts of fraud, bribery, and money-laundering, Mariano remained in detention yesterday. Stengel cited the suicide scare that followed Mariano's trip to the top of City Hall tower last fall when he ordered the councilman's bail revoked pending a psychiatric exam.

That exam has been scheduled for tomorrow, said Mariano's attorney, Nino V. Tinari.

Tinari said he visited his client at the Federal Detention Center yesterday. He said Mariano had been placed in a cell by himself but was not in a psychiatric ward. Mariano has not yet been allowed to see his wife or sons.

"Rick is doing extremely well," Tinari said after the two-hour visit. "He had the usual concerns: How's the family? How's the office?"

A spokeswoman for the federal Bureau of Prisons, Carla Wilson, said she could not comment on an individual case. But speaking generally, she said new inmates are unlikely to be permitted visitors other than lawyers until they complete the intake process, which can last several days.

Even with Mariano incommunicado, there has been considerable debate over his short-term future.

Minutes after the verdict Friday, Mayor Street issued a statement calling on Mariano to quit.

"We politely but firmly disagree," replied Mariano's chief of staff, Jay McCalla. He said the councilman would continue to attend meetings, propose legislation - and draw his $102,000 annual salary - as long as permitted by law.

Also citing the law, Council President Anna C. Verna said she would not push Mariano one way or the other although, she said, she doubted he would appear in Council even if he was let out on bail.

"It's his decision," she said. "That's the law."

In interviews yesterday, most of her colleagues seemed to agree.

"I think he should step down, but he's got the right under law to stay on under sentencing," said Councilman Juan Ramos.

"I'm not calling on him. I'm not doing what Mayor Street did," said Councilman James F. Kenney. "If he asked my opinion, I think the best thing for him and everybody is to leave."

"He can stay on and there's nothing we can do," said Councilman Jack Kelly. "But for his own interest, for his family and this Council, it would be better for him to step down. I'm not calling on him to do it. It's just my advice."

Of 14 members interviewed, only one - Councilman Michael Nutter - said he would definitely vote for a resolution asking Mariano to quit. Such a resolution, which would not be binding, has not been introduced.

"Out of respect for City Council as an institution, Councilman Mariano should resign from City Council, given all that has happened," Nutter said. "The citizens of Philadelphia deserve that action from him."

Asked about a resolution, Nutter said: "I would hope that we would not have to go to that point, but if there were a resolution offered, then, yes, I would vote for it."

DOJ_NMG_0019902

Several members said they specifically would not ask Mariano to quit, either formally or informally.

"I'll call on him to follow the law," said Donna Reed Miller. Asked if she would feel uncomfortable making laws alongside a felon until Mariano's legally mandated July 6 departure, Miller said: "I work with ex-offenders all the time."

When Mariano does depart Council, it will be put to Verna to decide whether to call a special election or allow the seat to remain vacant until the next general election in 2007.

Citing due-process issues and his desire not to see Council's membership fall to 15, Councilman W. Wilson Goode Jr. said he would "have no problem if Councilman Mariano continues to serve until his sentence."

"I have known Rick Mariano as a colleague for over six years," Goode said. "My opinion of him hasn't changed because of the verdict."

And just what is that opinion?

"No comment," Goode said.

Council Poll: Rick Can Work (PHI)

By Chris Brennan & Mark Mcdonald

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 21, 2006

CITY COUNCILMAN Rick Mariano, convicted Friday on corruption charges, is going to lose his job.

But should he step down before he is forced from office?

A wide majority of his colleagues said "no" yesterday when asked about Mariano's plan to keep attending Council hearings and sessions right up to the end.

Only four Council members - Donna Reed Miller, Michael Nutter, Juan Ramos and Jack Kelly - echoed Mayor Street's call from last week for Mariano to resign immediately.

The rest are content to let state law take its course.

Mariano's post will automatically become vacant and his pay will end when he is sentenced in federal court. That has not been set and could be months away.

For now, the question of Mariano's showing up in City Hall is theoretical, since he is locked up in the Federal Detention Center.

U.S. District Judge Lawrence Stengel revoked Mariano's bail, citing a concern that he might be a danger to himself or others after he was convicted on 18 counts of conspiracy, honest-services fraud, money laundering, bribery and filing a false tax return.

A psychiatric evaluation has been scheduled for tomorrow, and Stengel will hold a hearing to consider its results and Mariano's bail sometime after that.

A poll of Council members by the Daily News found no support for a resolution to call on Mariano to step down now. A resolution would not have the power to force that action if approved.

Council President Anna Verna isn't worried about Mariano's showing up in Council.

"I doubt that he'd come," she said. "I really do. He may go up to his office, but I doubt that he'd come to Council."

But Mariano's chief of staff, Jay McCalla, said that is exactly what the councilman plans to do.

"It is his intention to stay until sentencing, and it is his intention to attend Council sessions," said McCalla, who was glad to hear there was no support for an official call for Mariano to step down. "Coming into a room that's not against him will be helpful."

Councilman Brian O'Neill, the minority leader, said he would offer an opinion if Mariano asked if he should step down. O'Neill doesn't expect that to happen and says any attempt at a resolution would be "grandstanding."

"He's made it pretty clear that he wants to stay on Council's payroll until the end," O'Neill said.

Councilman Frank DiCicco said Council should set a policy to stop paying members when they have been convicted of crimes.

Having a convicted felon in Council is "basically a slap in the face to the citizens of Philadelphia," DiCicco said.

Councilman Jim Kenney said Mariano should step down from committee assignments but he doesn't mind if Mariano continues to collect a city paycheck for now.

"His office should function, and it's a couple of months and he'll be gone," Kenney said. "He's lost everything. He's lost his income and pension and his political infrastructure and his former friends. I can't see where piling on can be helpful to anyone."

The Council members who called on Mariano to step down did so in soft, caring tones.

"I think Rick will make the right decision," Miller said. "I think he's a big man, and he knows... to do the right thing."

Nutter and Ramos also spoke of Mariano doing the right thing.

"This is about the institution," Nutter said. "It's not about any one person. It's an unfortunate situation for him and his family, but Council is bigger than all of us."

DOJ_NMG_0019903

Ramos worries that Mariano will face "more and more controversy" by keeping his job.

"For the good of the city and the good of the district, he should make a decision very soon, and that is do the right thing and step down and save his family aggravation," Ramos said. "I am very saddened by it, but nevertheless we need to move on."

Kelly agreed that "it's in the best interests" of Mariano and his family, Council and his district for him to step down now. "However, that's going to be his decision and his decision alone."

Councilwoman Blondell Reynolds Brown and other members cited an opinion from the city solicitor that Mariano can hold his office until sentenced.

"Rick should let his conscience be his guide," Brown added.

Only Councilman Frank Rizzo said he had not decided if Mariano should step down.

Council members Jannie Blackwell, Marian Tasco, Darrell Clarke and W. Wilson Goode Jr. said they had no problem with Mariano keeping his job and coming to work until he is sentenced.

"We know he's a man of no means and I think we can wait that long, 30 to 90 days, and let the process take its course," Blackwell said. "If the law allows him to come and participate, then who are we?"

Why Mariano Pal Changed His Plea (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 21, 2006

A new federal-court filing yesterday offered a broad clue as to why a key figure in the Rick Mariano bribery-and-corruption case abruptly agreed to change his plea to guilty in late February.

On Feb. 28 - the day after businessman Reinaldo Pastrana had his surprising change of heart - FBI and IRS agents raided the office of Pastrana's accountant and seized copies of false tax returns filed on behalf of Pastrana; his mother, Ada, and sister Debbie.

Pastrana is one of five businessmen indicted last October in connection with bribing Mariano, who was convicted by a jury Friday of federal corruption charges. Pastrana initially pleaded not guilty.

Now in state prison for violating parole in connection with a state tax conviction, Pastrana has agreed to enter a guilty plea on Thursday to three counts of bribery.

As part of the plea deal, he also has agreed to sell property he owns on North American Street and to fork over at least $250,000 of the proceeds to the IRS before sentencing, the court filing yesterday by federal prosecutors said.

The feds say the payment will resolve outstanding tax issues related to false tax returns filed for the Pastranas in tax years 2001 through 2004.

Pastrana likely faces a sentence of 30 to 37 months under sentencing guidelines. He also must pay whatever fine is meted out by U.S. District Judge Lawrence F. Stengel when he is sentenced.

Pastrana, 46, is the third businessman to plead guilty in the Mariano corruption case. Two others - Philip and Louis Chartock - have pleaded not guilty and are scheduled to stand trial April 24.

Federal prosecutors alleged that Pastrana, a developer and friend of Mariano's, paid $5,400 for three years of Mariano's membership dues at the swanky Sporting Club at the Bellevue in exchange for Mariano's help with acquiring some city property in 2002.

Pastrana sought Mariano's help to buy the property on North American Street near West Somerset, which he wanted to develop as a shopping center.

The property had been appraised at $400,000, and Pastrana wanted Mariano's help to convince the city to sell the land to his company for $100,000.

Mariano subsequently sponsored - and voted for - a bill to facilitate the transaction.

Mayor Street signed the bill into law Dec. 3, 2002. Just 16 days later, the feds said, Pastrana paid Mariano's annual Sporting Club membership fee of $1,812.60.

Pastrana paid two more years of Mariano's Sporting Club dues in January 2004 and December 2004.

The sale of the property to Pastrana's company was finalized last March 30.

Eight Former Southwest Employees Charged In Ticket Scheme (SAEN)

By Guillermo Contreras, Express-News Staff Writer

San Antonio Express-News, March 21, 2006

Eight former Southwest Airlines employees have been charged with wire fraud over allegations they stole more than $1 million from the Dallas-based carrier by using used tickets to issue new ones and pocketing some of the proceeds.

Seven of the suspects were in federal custody on Monday. The eighth remained at large.

The scheme lasted from March 2000 through January 2003, and involved "hundreds to thousands" of tickets, according to a 25-count federal indictment and the FBI.

Southwest spokeswoman Brandy King said Southwest has since tightened its controls on the tickets utilized in the scheme. She said no customers were stranded as a result of it.

"This was an instance that took place three years ago," King said. "The employees have not been employees here for a while..... We began that investigation in the fall of 2002, and since that time we've completely revamped our procedures and controls on exchanges."

Special agent Andrea Simmons, a spokeswoman for the FBI in El Paso, said the probe took a while to come to fruition because the case involved "hundreds to thousands of tickets" that needed to be compared.

The fraud scheme involved intercepting used tickets as they flowed through the airline's internal processing, then using the tickets to issue new ones to customers who wished to purchase paper tickets at the counter, the indictment said.

The suspects pocketed a cut from the sales - generally the value of the used, intercepted ticket -- up to almost $230 per transaction, the indictment said.

"They were documenting them as exchanges instead of purchases," King said of the former employees.

Charged with wire-fraud conspiracy are Richard De La Paz Jr., Michelle Christine Torres, Oscar Enrique Ortiz, Melissa Renee Lampton, Denise Nuñez and Barbara Ann Wilson. They were also charged with wire fraud, as were Salena De La Torre and Guillermo Enriquez, the indictment shows. The FBI was still looking for Lampton on Monday.

King pointed out that the case is not related to an investigation in San Antonio of another former employee, Althea Jackson, who is a target of an investigation alleging thousands of "goodwill" tickets were taken from the airline.

"They're different kinds of tickets," King said.

In that case, Jackson is married to former court bailiff James Jackson, who resigned from the Bexar County Sheriff's Office amid the probe. The Jacksons' lawyer has confirmed they are under investigation.

An identitfy-theft task force led by the Secret Service is looking at more than 4,000 tickets, many of which were sold or given to judges, prosecutors, lawyers, current and former bailiffs and other public officials at the Bexar County courthouse. No one has been charged. gcontreras@express-news.net

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, March 21, 2006

EL PASO, Texas -- Eight former employees of Southwest Airlines Co. have been charged with wire fraud after allegedly stealing more than $1 million from the company in a scheme involving used tickets.

The workers would issue already-used tickets to customers who paid cash, giving the traveler a ticket that should have been voided in Southwest's systems, according to a federal grand jury indictment, returned last week.

Investigators said the Southwest workers, employed at El Paso International Airport, collected cash on transactions from March 2000 through January 2003.

Brandy King, a spokeswoman for Dallas-based Southwest, said no passengers were stuck with worthless tickets from the scheme. She said the agents recorded cash ticket purchases as exchanges and pocketed the money. Southwest had since changed its controls to prevent similar abuse.

The workers were dismissed in March 2003, King said.

The Associated Press was unable to reach the former workers, and court records did not list attorneys for them.

Six of the defendants also face conspiracy charges. If convicted, all face at least five years in federal prison and a fine of up to $250,000 for each count.

The case took years to reach a grand jury because "hundreds to thousands of tickets" had to be compared to detect the fraud, an FBI spokeswoman in El Paso, Andrea Simmons, told the San Antonio Express-News for a story Monday.

Prison Term For Developer Who Defrauded Investors (SFC)

By Henry K. Lee, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, March 18, 2006

S.F. man ordered to pay $17.4 million in restitution as well

A San Francisco real estate developer will spend eight years in prison and pay more than $17 million in restitution and fines for defrauding more than 700 investors, a judge has ruled.

U.S. District Judge William Alsup sentenced John A. Hickey, 49, on Thursday to 97 months in prison and ordered him to pay a $15,000 fine and $17.4 million in restitution. The judge told Hickey to begin serving his sentence July 7.

Hickey was convicted by a federal jury in November on two counts of securities fraud and eight counts of mail fraud after a three-week trial in U.S. District Court in San Francisco.

Hickey declined to discuss the case Friday. His attorney, David Cohen of San Francisco, said the conviction was "unwarranted" and that his client will "vigorously pursue his appeal."

Federal prosecutors said Hickey raised about $20 million from 724 investors through his company, Continental Capital Financial Group, by offering shares in two limited partnerships. The partnerships were created to develop real estate in Napa and Sonoma, among other locations.

Hickey lied about his net worth, the properties that would be developed by the partnerships and the use of the funds raised from the investors. In September 1994, a court-appointed receiver took over Continental Capital and the limited partnerships.

The investors lost most of their money. "As a result, many of the investors have suffered significant non-monetary harms, such as anger, anxiety, fear, guilt, grief, nightmares, depression, sleeplessness and mistrust of others," Assistant U.S. Attorney Christopher Steskal wrote in court papers. Steskal had urged the judge to sentence Hickey to more than 12 years in prison because of "multiple lies."

"The defendant lied to everyone involved in the investments, including the accountant, the lawyers, the appraiser, the sale representatives, the broker/dealers and (finally) the investors," Steskal wrote, adding that Hickey had many chances to tell the truth, "but at every turn, he chose to lie. And he lied for the most crass of reasons: greed."

"Over 700 investors, a number of them retirees, were defrauded by this scheme," Kevin Ryan, U.S. attorney in San Francisco, said in a statement. "Significant sentences send a strong message to those who would consider committing securities fraud."

A federal grand jury in San Francisco indicted Hickey and his business partner, Mamie Tang, in 1997. Tang is serving a five-year sentence imposed in March 2003 after she pleaded guilty to mail fraud in the same scheme.

Tang failed to tell potential investors that some of the properties she claimed to own had already been lost in foreclosure, authorities said.

The Securities and Exchange Commission filed a civil suit against both Hickey and Tang in 1994 for violations of federal security laws. The SEC ordered him to pay $1.3 million, but he failed to make payments, court records show. He ultimately paid the money in full.

St. Mary's Co. Man Sentenced In Child Porn Case (BSUN)

By A Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, March 21, 2006

33-year-old gets 6-year prison term, must register as sex offender

A 33-year-old St. Mary's County man was sentenced today in federal court to six years in prison for transmitting child pornography files over the Internet, the U.S. attorney's office said.

Joshua M. Marsh of Great Mills was also ordered to register as a sex offender and forfeit the computer equipment that authorities seized at his home. He will also be forbidden from accessing the Internet during his three years of supervised release after his prison sentence.

Marsh pleaded guilty to the charges Oct. 31. According to a statement of facts at the plea, Marsh admitted to allowing users to download child pornography from his personal computer, as well as to facilitating the transmission of pornographic files between users.

When the FBI conducted a search warrant in 2004, they found more than 1,000 files of child pornography on Marsh's computer.

DOD Official Had Child Porn On Computer (UPI)

United Press International, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 20 (UPI) -- A senior Defense Department employee managing the Pentagon's transition to a new Internet system was arrested for child pornography, DOD announced last week.

Charles Lamont Lynch, 44, of Clifton, Virginia, was operating a peer-to-peer file sharing program on his comuter at the Defense Information Systems Agency, according to the United States Attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia.

FBI Agents on March 8 seized a computer and more than 1,000 CD-Rom disks during a search of Lynch's office. Child pornography was found in computer file folders titled "Young," according to the Justice Department.

Lynch is now on leave without pay while his case is pending in court. If convicted, he could spend up to 10 years in jail.

DOJ_NMG_0019906

Lynch was the chief of the Internet Protocol Version 6 (Ipv6) Transition Office. He was managing the Defense Department's transition to the new Internet address system, which will dramatically expand the number of IP addresses available globally.

The current 32-bit Ipv4 address system allows for only 4.3 billion discreet Internet addresses worldwide. As the population grows and as populous Asian countries move more into the online world, more addresses are needed. Expanding that address line to 128 bits dramatically increases the number of available Internet addresses to 3.4 X 10 to the 38th power. China, India and Japan are investing heavily in Ipv6 technology.

IP addresses are the digits that correspond to e-mail address or web site names, which are simply a human-friendly mnemonic device for the multi-digit numerical addresses.

The relatively limited number of IP addresses under the current Ipv4 means many large organizations -- particularly governments -- use single network addresses for all their traffic, and then routes them to sub-addresses within the organization, a process that can slow the delivery of e-mail messages or the speed of connection.

During the multi-year transition, DISA and other organizations will have to ensure that computers running with Ipv6 addresses can communicate with computers running Ipv4 addresses.

Ex-East St. Louis Police Chief Sentenced (AP)

By JIM SUHR, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 21, 2006

EAST ST. LOUIS, Ill. (AP) - The city's former police chief was sentenced Monday to more than two years in federal prison for attempting to shield a politically connected businessman from a criminal probe.

Ronald Matthews, 56, had faced up to five years behind bars for conspiracy to obstruct justice, attempted obstruction of justice and perjury before a grand jury. He was convicted Dec. 21.

Matthews professed his innocence and said he would appeal. But he also told the judge he preferred to begin his prison term immediately.

``I'd rather just go ahead and be done with it," he said. Federal marshals obliged and led him away.

The case stems from a traffic stop during which Ayoub ``Dave" Qattoum, an auxiliary policeman and businessman, was found with a .38-caliber handgun. Under federal law, Qattoum was not entitled to have a gun as a convicted felon.

Prosecutors described Qattoum as well-connected, quick to give loans or kickbacks to local elected officials to curry favor as the owner of a convenience store.

Authorities accused Matthews of commandeering the local investigation of Qattoum's arrest after the Jordanian national expressed fear that U.S. immigration officials had learned of his legal troubles and might deport him.

Prosecutors also alleged Matthews refused to submit the case to local prosecutors for review, and hid from grand jurors and immigration officials the gun seized from Qattoum, falsely claiming the weapon was lost or stolen. Matthews resigned after being indicted in 2005.

Qattoum, 41, was sentenced in August to more than a year in prison. He faces deportation after serving his sentence.

Former Police Chief Sentenced For Obstruction (BVND)

By George Pawlaczyk

The Belleville News Democrat, March 21, 2006

Former East St. Louis Police Chief Ron Matthews was sentenced Monday to 33 months in prison by a federal judge, who said his "exemplary" record deserved leniency.

U.S. District Judge G. Patrick Murphy said he would "bet my children's trust fund" that Matthews would never again commit another crime.

Matthews was sentenced on his three convictions for obstruction of justice regarding a scheme to dispose of an illegal pistol once possessed by an auxiliary police officer who was a convicted felon. Matthews denied his guilt and blamed others for getting him ensnared in the scheme.

Although Murphy offered him the opportunity to remain free until being ordered to report to prison, Matthews opted to be taken immediately into custody.

Two federal marshals asked him to remove any personal items, including a driver's license and a comb, which he gave to family members, and then he was escorted into a backroom.

Illegal Alien Pleads Guilty To Hit Man Plot (WT)

By Gary Emerling

DOJ_NMG_0019907

The Washington Times, March 21, 2006

An illegal alien from Guatemala pleaded guilty in federal court yesterday to charges that he tried to arrange the killing of a D.C. jail inmate last year.

Victor Moscoso Espana, 20, of Hyattsville, admitted in D.C. District Court that he attempted to have inmate Alvaro Garcia-Hernandez -- a fellow Guatemalan in jail on drug charges -- killed for $15,000, which would have been paid in monthly installments.

According to court documents, Moscoso tried to arrange the hit because he "did not like" Garcia-Hernandez and wanted to "take over" his drug sources and "make money."

Agents with the federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) began investigating Moscoso in September after receiving information about a conspiracy to import cocaine and heroin from Guatemala through various U.S. entry points, including Washington Dulles International Airport.

Court documents show that the hit man plot began when Moscoso arranged to meet another person -- who was cooperating with investigating agents -- at a Hess gasoline station in the 1900 block of New Jersey Avenue Northwest in October.

The two discussed having Garcia-Hernandez killed, and Moscoso gave the witness visiting days for Garcia-Hernandez, as well as his jail identification number.

When the two met in Hyattsville Oct. 18, Moscoso agreed to pay the $15,000 in installments.

When the two met again three days later, agents recorded their discussion and Moscoso gave the witness a down payment of $100 for the killing. Moscoso was arrested the next day.

Moscoso faces up to 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine when he is scheduled to be sentenced June 16.

After serving his time, Moscoso will be turned over to ICE and placed in removal proceedings.

"He may very well go from the jail to his country, because he's not here legally," ICE spokeswoman Ernestine Fobbs said. "I see no reason why he shouldn't be [deported]."

Court documents show that Garcia-Hernandez was sentenced Oct. 11 to 37 months in prison for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute.

The documents also show that Garcia-Hernandez came to the U.S. in 1994 from Guatemala, received a work permit from Immigration and Naturalization Service and worked as a roofer and a mechanic.

Garcia-Hernandez was ordered to comply with deportation proceedings upon his release, the documents show.

High Court Refuses To Hear Convicted Spy's Appeal (AP)

AP, March 21, 2006

The Supreme Court refused Monday to give Jonathan Pollard, now serving a life sentence for spying for Israel, access to records that could bolster his case for a presidential clemency.

Pollard's lawyers wanted the justices to reopen his case, so that they could pursue secret documents the government submitted to the judge who sentenced Pollard in 1987.

Pollard sold military secrets to Israel while he worked at the Defense Department's Pentagon headquarters. He was arrested in 1985 and pleaded guilty. The Supreme Court had already refused to let the former Navy intelligence analyst withdraw the guilty plea.

The latest Supreme Court case was not about spying, but about government authority to keep records used in court sealed from the public.

A federal appeals court said last summer that it had no authority to review requests for the documents which Pollard contends will help his bid for presidential clemency.

One of his attorneys, Eliot Lauer, told justices in a filing that the Justice Department, which opposes clemency, has been "given the unfettered power to decide who may or may not have access to those docket materials."

"The DOJ is not neutral and is not an arm of the judiciary," Lauer wrote in the appeal.

Pollard's case has been a sticking point in U.S.-Israeli relations. The Israeli government granted Pollard citizenship and repeatedly has pressed for his release.

The case is Pollard v. United States of America, 05-1013.

Justices Weigh In On Use Of Tapes And Transcripts (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0019908

WASHINGTON, March 20 — A crime victim's emergency call to 911, when introduced in court, can provide powerful evidence of the attacker's identity and the circumstances of the crime.

Perhaps too powerful — or so most Supreme Court justices seemed to conclude during an argument Monday on whether the prosecution could use such evidence without violating defendants' constitutional rights to face their accusers in the courtroom.

The constitutional problem arises when the victim fails to appear in court and is therefore not available for cross-examination.

In domestic violence cases, the scenario is common; in one study cited to the Supreme Court, as many as 90 percent of victims of domestic violence fail to cooperate with the prosecution because of fear of or misplaced loyalty to their abusive partners.

Rather than abandon such cases, a growing number of states have begun to relax their evidentiary rules and permit juries to hear 911 tapes or read transcripts of police interviews with victims.

Two years ago, however, the Supreme Court issued an unmistakable warning that these efforts were likely to collide with the Sixth Amendment's Confrontation Clause, which guarantees to a criminal defendant the right "to be confronted with the witnesses against him."

In Crawford v. Washington, the court laid down a new rule: a "testimonial" statement made out of court cannot be used at trial unless the person who made the statement is available for cross-examination.

Now the question is whether the justices meant what they said, even in situations with strong policy arguments for bending the rules. Based on their responses in the courtroom on Monday, they did.

The Crawford case barred the admission of a woman's tape-recorded eyewitness account of a fight in which her husband stabbed another man. But the court stopped short of defining the various types of "testimonial" statements to which the newly empowered Confrontation Clause would now apply. Defense lawyers around the country soon began to argue that the decision should bar the admission of 911 calls and of statements given to police officers who respond to a crime scene.

Two cases were argued to the court on Monday, one of each type. Both have drawn wide attention from organizations concerned with domestic violence. In Davis v. Washington, No. 05-5224, the Washington Supreme Court rejected a defense argument that a 911 call from a woman who said her former boyfriend had violated a no-contact order and was beating her constituted a testimonial.

The incident took place, and the man, Adrian M. Davis, was convicted, before the Crawford decision. The victim, Michelle McCottry, was subpoenaed but failed to appear in court.

After the Crawford decision, Mr. Davis's lawyers argued on appeal that the admission of the 911 tape violated his right to confrontation, but the Washington Supreme Court said the call was not testimonial. It was, the court said, a request for "help to be rescued from peril."

In the second case, Hammon v. Indiana, No. 05-5705, the Indiana Supreme Court likewise upheld a conviction for domestic battery, ruling that a wife's statement to the police officer who arrived to investigate a report of a disturbance could be used as evidence against her husband, Herschel Hammon. The wife, Amy Hammon, failed to appear in court. Her statement to the investigating officer was not testimonial, the Indiana court ruled, because her "motivation was to convey basic facts" rather than provide evidence for later use at trial.

In the Supreme Court on Monday, Jeffrey L. Fisher, representing the defendant in the 911 case, said that during the call, Ms. McCottry "knowingly told a government agent associated with law enforcement that someone had committed a crime." That made the call clearly testimonial, as was "any accusatory statement to a law enforcement agent," he said.

Mr. Fisher, a Seattle lawyer who successfully argued the Crawford case, said the purpose of the Confrontation Clause was "to bring the accuser and accused face to face and require the accuser to deliver the accusation in court."

But the 911 call was "not just a call," Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg objected. It was also "a cry for help." Was it not a "practical reality," she asked Mr. Fisher, "that many women in this situation are scared to death?" She added, "Your neat legal categories don't conform to real lives."

Mr. Fisher responded carefully. "I don't mean to be insensitive," he said. He offered a solution: under a rule known as the "forfeiture doctrine," he observed, a defendant who intimidated a witness lost the right to object to the use of that witness's out-of-court statements.

The other justices undoubtedly took his point, a reminder that he was the author of the Crawford decision, and that he had persuaded six of his colleagues in that case, including Justice Ginsburg, that the Confrontation Clause should be interpreted literally.

DOJ_NMG_0019909

As Justice Scalia made clear on Monday when the prosecution's turn came to argue, he was not about to advocate its suspension under these or any other circumstances.

When James M. Whisman, Seattle's senior deputy prosecuting attorney, described 911 calls as "powerful evidence" that should be regarded as constitutionally permissible, Justice Scalia responded, "You know, 'powerful' is part of the problem." He said that "the voice on the phone makes it an even more damaging violation if it is impermissible."

Mr. Whisman was joined on the state's side of the argument by Michael R. Dreeben, a deputy solicitor general, who said that a "panic-stricken call for help" had "unique probative value" and did not present the risk of government abuse that the framers had in mind when they added the Confrontation Clause to the Constitution. The risk was that the government could manipulate a witness behind closed doors, Mr. Whisman said.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy asked whether a 911 call reporting that "he beat me two minutes ago and now he's running down the block" would qualify as a nontestimonial emergency report under Mr. Dreeben's analysis.

Yes, Mr. Dreeben replied, because the attacker might return and the caller still faced an "imminent threat."

Suppose, Justice Kennedy asked, that the call was "he's taken my diamond necklace and is running down the block."

"That would not be an emergency threat under our rule," Mr. Dreeben said.

The second argument, in the Indiana case, replicated the first in many respects, including an exchange between Justice Ginsburg and Richard D. Friedman, representing the defendant.

Mr. Friedman, a professor at the University of Michigan Law School who is an acknowledged expert on the Confrontation Clause, declared that "there is no domestic-violence exception for confrontation rights."

If the court made it clear that prosecutors could not use out-of-court statements, he said, states would have an incentive to protect victims of domestic violence and make them feel safe enough to testify.

"I don't know why that necessarily follows," Justice Ginsburg said. "It wasn't so long ago that police didn't bother with these cases."

Mr. Friedman responded, "I think we now recognize how serious a crime domestic violence is."

Tobacco Award Is Upheld

WASHINGTON, March 20 (AP) — The Supreme Court refused Monday to consider tossing out a $50 million damage award to the family of a two-pack-a-day smoker who died of cancer.

Philip Morris USA, which controls about half the American cigarette market, had asked the justices to declare the award unconstitutionally excessive and to rule that the company should have been shielded from some of the smoker's claims. The court declined without comment.

The smoker, Richard Boeken, was 57 when he died in 2002, a year after a California jury found Philip Morris guilty of negligence, misrepresentation, fraud and selling a defective product.

The court also refused to consider an appeal from a former Arkansas governor who wanted to withdraw his 1998 guilty plea to tax conspiracy. It was the last remaining appeal in the Whitewater case.

The tax case involving the ex-governor, Jim Guy Tucker, arose during the investigation of Bill Clinton and Hillary Rodham Clinton. An independent counsel spent more than six years investigating the business dealings of the Clintons. In all, 14 people were convicted. Mr. Tucker resigned in 1996 after pleading guilty.

In bringing an appeal to the Supreme Court, Mr. Tucker's lawyer, Jeffrey M. Rosenzweig, said that an appeals court had wrongly denied his client a new hearing on whether his plea was voluntary.

The justices did not comment in refusing to hear the appeal.

Court Debates Use Of Victims' Statements As Evidence (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — Eight of the nine Supreme Court justices — all but Ruth Bader Ginsburg — sounded today as though they would vote to bar prosecutors from using in court the words of crime victims who spoke to authorities but refused to testify.

Such a ruling would greatly strengthen the constitutional rights of defendants to "be confronted with the witnesses against" them. It would be a major setback for prosecutions in domestic violence and sexual assault cases because frightened victims often refuse to testify against their abusers.

Two years ago, the high court ruled that crime witnesses' sworn statements at a police station could not be used at trial against defendants if the witnesses did not appear in court to be cross-examined.

The court debated today whether to extend that ruling to cover emergency calls to a 911 operator and a victim's statements at a crime scene. The justices heard the appeals of two men who were convicted not on the court testimony of their accusers but on their own words as recorded by a 911 operator and a police officer at the scene.

DOJ_NMG_0019910

"The practical reality is many women are scared to death" to testify against a spouse or partner who abuses them, said Ginsburg, the only woman on the court. In other instances, "they are so desperate financially" that they decide against testifying, she said.

She questioned whether the Constitution should be interpreted as barring prosecutors from using their calls to a 911 line. "This is not just a call. It is a cry for help," Ginsburg said.

Justice Antonin Scalia countered that the use of such statements in place of a witness' testimony in court violated the principle set forth in the 6th Amendment.

"I think the founders believed in a system where the accused had a right to confront his accusers in court," Scalia said. "I can't see why it makes any sense" to allow a taped 911 call to replace a witness' testimony, he said, because defendants then lose the right to contest the statements of their accusers.

In their questions and comments, most of the justices sounded as though they leaned toward Scalia's view. Several said they did not see how they could make a special exception for emergency calls where domestic violence was at issue.

In the first case, Adrian Davis was convicted of violating a restraining order based on an ex-girlfriend's call to a 911 operator near Seattle. She failed to appear at the trial, but the prosecutor played the 911 tape to the jury.

In the second, Hershel Hammon was convicted of domestic battery of his wife Amy based on her initial statement to a police officer who came to their house. She did not testify.

Their lawyers argued that "accusatory statements" to authorities should be barred from trial unless the witness testified. Prosecutors said "emergency" statements to authorities should be allowed, even if the witness did not testify.

Regardless of what the court decides, police officers will remain free to testify about what they see at a crime scene. For example, if police officers observe an apparent crime victim who has been bruised or bloodied, they can testify as a witness to what they have seen.

The justices will vote privately this week on the cases of Davis vs. Washington and Hammon vs. Indiana and issue a ruling by the end of June.

Justices Weigh If Accusers Must Testify In Court (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

Michelle McCottry and Amy Hammon were both alleged victims of domestic violence. McCottry called 911 to report a beating that her boyfriend had just administered; Hammon gave an account of a fresh attack by her husband to police who came to her home.

McCottry and Hammon did not testify at the men's trials; the state won convictions anyway, based in part on the women's previous statements.

But did those convictions violate the Constitution, which guarantees a defendant the right to confront his accuser in court?

That was the question before the Supreme Court yesterday, as the justices heard oral arguments in two of the most significant criminal cases of this term.

At stake are the rules of evidence that will govern not only many domestic violence prosecutions but also any criminal case in which prosecutors seek to introduce past accusations by people who, whether out of fear or any other reason, cannot or will not repeat their charges in open court.

On one side are McCottry's boyfriend, Adrian Davis of Washington state, and Hammon's husband, Hershel Hammon of Indiana, who say that the Sixth Amendment requires the state to bring its witnesses to court, put them under oath and allow them to be cross-examined. They are supported by briefs from the American Civil Liberties Union, the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers and the D.C. Public Defender Service.

On the other side are the states of Indiana and Washington, supported by the Bush administration, 27 other states including Maryland, the National Network to End Domestic Violence and the National District Attorneys Association. Though their arguments vary in emphasis, these parties agree that statements made in the moments surrounding a criminal attack are not testimony and therefore are not covered by the Sixth Amendment.

The cases arise largely because the Supreme Court changed its rules in a 2004 decision. In an opinion written by Justice Antonin Scalia, it barred a statement to police by a wife who would not testify against her husband regarding an alleged assault on a third person. The Sixth Amendment was intended to keep out any previous testimony from a witness unavailable to testify, the court ruled, unless that witness had previously been subject to cross-examination.

Before that, the court had said that an unavailable witness's out-of-court statement could be admissible if a judge found that it fell into one of the exceptions to the rule against hearsay or was otherwise clearly trustworthy.

Yet federal and state courts have struggled to apply Scalia's ruling in practice, and the court agreed to hear the Washington and Indiana cases to clarify its scope.

The 2004 ruling enjoyed the support of the entire court except Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who are no longer sitting.

Still, during the course of an intense two-hour discussion of the two cases, Davis v. Washington , No. 05-5224, and Hammon v. Indiana , No. 05-5705, at least some of the justices seemed concerned about how far to extend the new rule.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, in particular, seemed worried about the implications for other cases in which women tell police about abuse but then are reluctant to risk a court appearance.

"The practical reality is that many women are scared to death of what will happen to them," she told Davis's attorney, Jeffrey L. Fisher. "So neat legal categories don't really fit the realities of this situation."

Ginsburg repeatedly suggested that the court consider a rule proposed by the Bush administration: that statements made to authorities during "emergencies" be admissible.

But Fisher replied that although he did not want to appear "insensitive," the "Sixth Amendment applies across the board."

The court's newest member, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., a former prosecutor, also seemed to lean in favor of the states. He asked lawyers for the defendants questions that implied they were asking for too broad a rule.

"If someone calls and says 'I just saw a blue Toyota with Ohio plates do a hit-and-run,' is that testimony?" he asked at one point.

"Yes," replied Hammon's lawyer, Richard D. Friedman.

But Scalia noted that "it seems to me that there are better ways to solve the problem than to design our whole confrontation-clause jurisprudence based on what happens in spousal abuse cases." The confrontation clause is the part of the Sixth Amendment that guarantees the defendant's right "to be confronted with the witnesses against him."

Decisions in the two cases are expected by July.

Supreme Court Justices Debate Admissibility Of Statements To 911 Operators (AP)

By Toni Locy, The Associated Press

AP, March 21, 2006

The Supreme Court considered Monday whether statements made by victims to 911 operators and police officers at crime scenes should be barred as evidence because they were not made under oath or subjected to cross-examination by a defendant.

In cases from Washington and Indiana, the justices focused on whether the rights of Adrian Davis and Hershel Hammon were violated because their accusers did not testify at their trials.

The issue is significant because the high court's ruling could affect the ability of prosecutors to bring criminal charges -- particularly in domestic violence cases -- when victims or key witnesses are not willing or not available to testify.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg pointed out that "many women in these situations are scared to death" and don't want to testify.

Ginsburg also recalled that "it wasn't so long ago" that police wouldn't bother trying to gather evidence to prosecute cases of domestic abuse.

She worried aloud that if the justices issue a ruling that police consider more trouble than their efforts are worth, officers might wonder why they should bother pursuing domestic violence cases.

Lawyers on all sides of the cases -- as well as the Bush administration -- want the justices to clarify a 2004 decision that barred prosecutors' use of statements from victims or witnesses if a defendant did not have a chance to question them in court.

Justice Antonin Scalia, the author of the 2004 majority ruling, grilled lawyers for Washington and Indiana about a defendant's right to confront his or her accuser.

Scalia worried about what would happen to defendants who were charged with crimes based on "false" statements from witnesses who never testified. And he wondered whether 911 operators, by asking so many questions of victims, aren't being used by police as "a prosecutorial device."

James M. Whisman, senior prosecuting attorney in Seattle, conceded the 911 tape was "powerful" evidence of the abuse victim Michelle McCottry said she endured at Davis' hands.

"Powerful is part of the problem," Scalia said. "To hear her voice on the phone ... it makes it an even more damaging violation" of the defendant's right to confront his accuser.

At Davis' trial, a judge allowed the tape of McCottry's February 2001 emergency call to be admitted into evidence but barred police testimony about what McCottry had said to officers. She disappeared before trial and did not testify despite a subpoena.

DOJ_NMG_0019912

In the other case out of Peru, Ind., Amy Hammon also did not testify. But a judge allowed a police officer to testify that she had told him that her husband, Hershel, had thrown her into the glass panel of a gas heater.

Chief Justice John Roberts appeared to give prosecutors and police the benefit of the doubt in both cases.

Roberts was skeptical when Davis' lawyer suggested that prosecutors, armed with powerful 911 tapes, might keep "bad" witnesses off the stand to win their cases.

And the chief justice said police officers have mixed motives in trying to protect victims and build criminal cases.

Jeffrey L. Fisher, who represents Davis, told the justices it's not always easy to determine when police officers stop protecting victims and when they begin gathering evidence to support criminal charges.

The cases are Davis v. Washington, 05-5224, and Hammon v. Indiana, 05-5705.

Ex-Philippine Leader Say U.S. Bugged Phone (NSDY/AP)

By Jim Gomez, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 21, 2006

MANILA, Philippines -- Former President Joseph Estrada said Tuesday he has been notified by an American court that U.S. authorities bugged his telephone conversations with an FBI analyst accused of revealing U.S. government secrets.

The New Jersey court indicated it had authorized the wiretapping as part of an investigation into Leandro Aragoncillo last year, Estrada said, adding that there was no suggestion he was under investigation.

Estrada, who was toppled by a popular revolt in 2001, previously acknowledged receiving American government assessments of Philippine political events from Aragoncillo, a 21-year Marine veteran who became an FBI intelligence analyst in 2004.

"The notice said that my telephone calls with Aragoncillo were wiretapped," Estrada told The Associated Press in a telephone interview. "The wiretapping was authorized by the court."

Aragoncillo was arrested in the United States last year. He has been charged with conspiring to reveal government secrets, acting as a foreign agent and improperly using FBI computers. Those charges carry a maximum sentence of 25 years.

He has not been charged with espionage, which carries a maximum penalty of capital punishment.

Michael Drewniak, spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Newark, N.J., has refused to comment on the alleged wiretapping, which was first reported by the Philippine Daily Inquirer, citing government sources.

"Even if that were so, I would not comment on it," Drewniak said last week.

Estrada is under house arrest while on trial for corruption charges.

He has acknowledged speaking by phone with Aragoncillo and receiving U.S. government documents on the political situation in the Philippines. But he has played down their value, saying the assessments were similar to those being reported by Philippine newspapers.

Asked about the wiretapping, Estrada said: "My reaction is nothing, because even before this, I have admitted that I've talked with him ... (and) that those details were nothing more than newspaper accounts of what's happening in the country."

Estrada has insisted that Aragoncillo passed on information to the Philippines not in exchange for money but out of his concern for his impoverished homeland.

Aragoncillo became a naturalized U.S. citizen in 1991. He worked at the White House on the security detail for vice presidents Al Gore and Dick Cheney in 1999-2002 before joining the FBI as a civilian intelligence analyst at Fort Monmouth, N.J.

Estrada said he met Aragoncillo when he visited the United States while he was still president and was introduced to him and other White House staffers of Filipino descent. Their friendship blossomed, with Aragoncillo visiting him at the Malacanang presidential palace and in a hospital where Estrada was once confined.

Washington has invoked its Mutual Legal Assistance Treaty with Manila to get files on a number of Filipinos who might have received information from him, a Philippine investigator has said.

Civil Trial In Sex Assault Likely To Be Ugly (LAT)

By Christopher Goffard, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 21, 2006

The suit over the O.C. attack targets the three guilty men, the father of one, two investigators and a lawyer who vows victim will 'rue the day.'

Now that a judge has imposed a prison term on the attackers, the sordid, painful four-year-long case involving Gregory Haidl and two co-defendants — and the woman who says they destroyed her — shifts to the civil courtroom, which may prove the ugliest show yet.

DOJ_NMG_0019913

The victim, now 20 and known publicly as Jane Doe, has sued the three young men convicted of sexually assaulting her while a video camera rolled and she lay unconscious on a pool table one July night in 2002. And she is suing Haidl's father, a rich former Orange County assistant sheriff, alleging that he should have known of the drug- and alcohol-fueled parties raging in his Corona del Mar home, where the attack occurred.

But, as part of her $26-million lawsuit, Jane Doe is also targeting others who, she says, subjected her to years of "harassment, intimidation and torture" after the attack itself.

In a rare legal move, her suit names Haidl defense attorney Joseph G. Cavallo and two defense investigators, John Warren and Shawn Smigel. She says the defense staked out her Rancho Cucamonga house, went through her trash, stalked her, improperly obtained her medical records, broadcast her identity and once cornered her in a parking lot while snapping pictures.

"We're taking these people to task about what they did," said Jane Doe's attorney, Sheldon Lodmer. "They crossed the line in terms of appropriate legal defense."

Cavallo said he did nothing improper in trying to defend a client who could have faced life in prison, and characterized the lawsuit as "revenge" for his zealous representation.

"If they think what I did in the criminal case was aggressive, they're attacking me personally now," Cavallo said. "By the time I get done with Jane Doe, the case won't be worth $10. I know more about Jane Doe than her lawyer and her family."

During the criminal trial, Cavallo and other defense attorneys cast her as a would-be porn star who merely faked unconsciousness on the tape, cross-examining her relentlessly and underscoring her earlier sexual behavior. Cavallo, planning to represent himself in the civil trial, said he would question her even more thoroughly, unencumbered by the rape shield law that limits inquiry into her past during a criminal trial.

"Only 10 to 20% of what we had on Jane Doe and her family came out during the criminal case," Cavallo said. "They're going to rue the day they brought me into this case."

Doe's attorney, Lodmer, said he anticipated that Cavallo would attack his client.

"I'm sure he will use this opportunity, and she's ready to stand up to it," Lodmer said. "He can try and do what he wants. He made life miserable for everyone else in this case."

Jane Doe was 16 at the time of the attack, and the three defendants — Haidl, Kyle Nachreiner and Keith Spann — all 17. The videotape, with Haidl running the camera, depicts the boys violating her limp body with a host of objects, including a pool cue, a lighted cigarette and a Snapple bottle. The first trial ended in a deadlock, with jurors leaning toward acquittal. A second jury convicted them of sexual assault, but not rape, and on March 10 a Superior Court Judge sentenced them all to six-year prison terms.

During the sentencing hearing, Jane Doe spoke in detail about how the attack, and its aftermath, caused her life to unravel.

"Before July 5, 2002, I was a normal 16-year-old teenager," she said. "I was outgoing, cheerful, loving, compassionate and trusting." She said she was a straight-A student who was on her high school's volleyball, track and cross-country teams and added she had "an extremely close relationship with my parents."

She said she found out about the attack, which she did not remember, after Newport Beach police informed her father. After Haidl and his co-defendants were arrested, fliers materialized in Jane Doe's neighborhood identifying her as the accuser. She said she fled to another high school, seeking anonymity but said defense investigators tracked her there, stood in the parking lot and screamed out her name.

Now, she said, she possessed "very little self-esteem and I trust no one." Ultimately, according to her lawyer, the trauma of the case drove her to methamphetamine abuse.

The defense has sharply disputed her depiction of the attack's effect on her life, saying she had serious emotional problems long before that summer night in 2002 and a strained relationship with her parents, who viewed her as an "out of control" teenager who left the house without saying where she was going and stayed out all night.

Jane Doe "has been unaffected to a substantial degree as a result of that evening," Cavallo said.

Cavallo said defense investigators did not scream out Jane Doe's name at her new school, as alleged. "Everyone knew who Jane Doe was anyway," Cavallo said. He said investigators were forced to stake out her parents to serve them with court subpoenas.

William Kopeny, an attorney working for Cavallo, said his client's behavior was protected under the doctrine of "litigation privilege," which holds that a lawyer's actions in connection with a court case cannot form the basis of a lawsuit.

"It's a very wide-ranging privilege," Kopeny said.

The criminal convictions of Haidl, Nachreiner and Spann provide a built-in advantage for Jane Doe in the civil arena, at least in the case against them. In civil court, plaintiffs must prove their case by a "preponderance of the evidence," a much lighter burden than the "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard already met in the criminal case.

"The case against the three defendants who were convicted should not be too difficult," said Lodmer, adding that he expected depositions in the case to begin in the next two months. He acknowledged that the case against Cavallo involved far less trodden legal terrain.

"We're not suing [Cavallo] for anything he did or said inside that courtroom," Lodmer said. "We're suing him for what he authorized outside that courtroom."

States Allow Deadly Self-defense (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, March 21, 2006

A year after Florida became the first state to allow citizens to use deadly force against muggers, carjackers and other attackers, the idea is spreading. South Dakota has enacted a similar law, Indiana Gov. Mitch Daniels plans to sign such a measure today, and 15 other states are considering such proposals.

Dubbed "Stand Your Ground" bills by supporters such as the National Rifle Association, the measures generally grant immunity from prosecution and lawsuits to those who use deadly force to combat any unlawful entry or attack. Several states allow people to use deadly force in their homes against intruders; the new measures represent an expansion of self-defense rights to crimes committed in public.

The NRA and other supporters say the bills are needed in many states that require people under attack in public places to withdraw from the situation, rather than retaliate, unless they can show their lives are in danger. "For someone attacked by criminals to be victimized a second time by a second-guessing legal system is wrong," the NRA's Wayne LaPierre says.

Critics, including the Brady Campaign To Prevent Gun Violence, say the bills encourage vigilantism and would make it more likely that confrontations would turn deadly. Zach Ragbourn of the Brady group says the proposals "are more accurately called 'Shoot First' laws. They allow a person who just feels something bad is going to happen to open fire in public."

The idea that people should use deadly force only to defend their lives is rooted in English common law, author Richard Maxwell Brown says in No Duty To Retreat: Violence and Values in American History and Society. Another common law principle, the "duty to retreat," requires people to avoid potentially deadly confrontations. The principles apply in most states. The duty to retreat generally doesn't apply in a person's home.

LaPierre says the NRA is targeting 29 duty-to-retreat states where people can be prosecuted, sued or both if they don't retreat from criminal attacks.

Ragbourn says the proposals aim to "fix a system that isn't broken. People aren't being thrown into jail for legitimate self-defense. There's no crisis here."

Florida's law could be facing its first test. Donald Montanez, owner of a Tampa towing company, is charged with murder in the shooting of a man whose car was impounded. Prosecutors say Montanez fired as the man drove off without paying a fee. Montanez's attorney, Roger Rigau, says the new law should protect Montanez, who feared being hit by the driver.

CIVIL LAW:

Google's Half Victory (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

Google won a partial victory against the Justice Department late Friday night when a federal judge ruled that the company would not be compelled to hand over a sample of users' search queries.

As Judge James Ware noted in his 21-page opinion, search strings like "Jessica Simpson" or "nudity" would not, by themselves, impinge on users' privacy. But a random sampling of searches could well pull up less generic queries. To borrow the judge's example, "[user name] third trimester abortion san jose" might well raise privacy concerns -- not to mention the embarrassment from the publication of the "vanity searches" that Google users have been known to perform, every half hour or so, on themselves.

Judge Ware did grant Justice's request for a random sampling of 50,000 of the sites Google indexes for its searches, so both sides ended up with something. But as the judge also noted, the government remains decidedly vague on how it intends to use the data it was seeking from the major search engines in the underlying case, which concerns the 1998 Child Online Protection Act. Justice says the goal is to "assess the amount of harmful material available to minors" on the Internet. But it doesn't take a genius -- or a subpoena -- to figure out that there's lots of that if you look for it.

The real question is whether criminalizing whole categories of speech on the basis of vaguely worded "community standards" is the least restrictive way of protecting children. Friday's ruling doesn't address that, as the underlying case is being adjudicated in a different court. But it did establish some limits on what the government can demand from private corporations in seeking to defend this law against a First Amendment challenge. Justice's initial request was for every indexed Web address and two months' worth of search queries. By comparison, what the government will now get looks reasonable indeed.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Judge Gives Maximum 10-year Sentences To 2 Cuban Smugglers (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, March 21, 2006

Two Cuban immigrants who captained a smuggling mission that ended with the drowning of a young boy received the maximum prison sentence on Monday -- 10 years.

U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore hammered the two men after concluding a six-year term proposed under federal sentencing guidelines was not enough punishment for the child's death in the Oct. 13 illegal crossing of the Florida Straits.

A lawyer for both Alexander Gil Rodriguez, 25, and Luis Manuel Taboada-Cabrera, 28, whose relatives sobbed outside the courtroom, said they will appeal the judge's sentences for their alien-smuggling convictions. Attorney Steven Amster said the two Miami men, who were not charged or convicted of causing the death of 6-year-old Julian Villasuso, still faced up to the maximum prison term because his drowning was a factor in the judge's sentencing under advisory guidelines.

"They understand their actions led to this death," Amster said, acknowledging the two men sped off in their go-fast boat when the U.S. Coast Guard tried to stop them. ``But their actions were not so egregious to go above what the sentencing guidelines say."

The two men had reached plea deals in November, expecting to receive lighter sentences. They pleaded guilty to a conspiracy to smuggle 29 Cubans in a 33-foot speedboat that overturned and claimed the life of the boy, who got trapped beneath the capsized vessel.

But Assistant U.S. Attorney Dana Washington said he didn't have enough evidence to charge them with the death of Julian Villasuso.

The boy's death was factored into the sentencing guidelines, doubling the initially proposed prison term from three to six years. But Moore, who as a federal judge has the authority to go higher than those advisory guidelines, didn't believe that penalty was sufficient.

"The question is whether the guidelines adequately take into account the death they caused," Moore said at a hearing in January.

Moore has greater leeway to go above the federal sentencing guidelines. Those guidelines had been mandatory until last year, when the U.S. Supreme Court made them advisory to maintain their constitutionality.

The reason: In 2001, Jorge "Bombino" Aleman was arrested on charges that he organized five smuggling runs between late 1999 and 2001 that ferried more than 100 Cubans to Florida. A January 2001 voyage resulted in the death of Cira Rodriguez, a Cuban who is believed to have died on a small Bahamian cay after smugglers dumped her and the other passengers on the island without food and water.

The following year, U.S. District Judge James Lawrence King sentenced the defendant to life in prison plus five years, overriding the federal sentencing guidelines that called for fewer than 13 years.

Then in 2004, the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Atlanta threw out what was the longest prison term in an alien-smuggling case, ordering that Aleman be sentenced within the federal guidelines.

That ruling came down, however, when the guidelines were still mandatory.

At Monday's sentencing hearing, Taboada-Cabrera apologized to the judge, community and others. "I wish to say I'm really repentant about what happened," he told the judge.

Rodriguez did not say anything in court.

Their attorney said the tragic smuggling trip was not for profit but was rather to bring over their families. Amster said Rodriguez had three family members, including his wife, aboard the speedboat, and that Taboada-Cabrera was supposed to bring his wife and a daughter on the voyage.

Amster also said the U.S. Coast Guard may have played a role in the capsizing of their speedboat that led to the boy's death. Coast Guard officials strongly disagreed.

The alien-smuggling attempt occurred during the early morning of Oct. 13, when Coast Guard officials tracked down a Florida-registered speedboat, carrying the 29 Cubans, about 52 miles south of Key West.

DOJ_NMG_0019916

A chase ensued, as the Coast Guard crew deployed an "entangling device" -- or net -- in front of the speedboat, according to court papers. Finally, the vessel came to a stop. Then, numerous people stood up on board and someone threw an object into the ocean.

"Water immediately began to flow into the stern of the vessel, due to the shift in weight and the excess amount of individuals on board," according to an Immigration and Customs Enforcement affidavit, causing the boat to capsize and the passengers to fall overboard.

Authorities discovered the boy beneath the boat after rescuers pulled to safety the other passengers, including the boy's parents and the smugglers.

Julian's parents and a third passenger with health problems were allowed into the United States. The rest were repatriated to Cuba.

Smugglers Get 10 Years For Child's Death (AP)

By CURT ANDERSON, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 21, 2006

MIAMI — Two men were sentenced Monday to 10 years in prison _ well above federal sentencing guidelines _ for organizing a Cuban immigrant smuggling trip that ended when their speedboat capsized and a 6-year-old boy drowned.

U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore said he was imposing the long sentence because of a marked increase in dangerous pursuits between U.S. authorities and smugglers on the open ocean. Moore also said the two men should pay an extra penalty for playing a role in the boy's death.

Sentences imposed under federal guidelines are "not providing an adequate deterrent for this kind of criminal conduct," Moore said.

Alexander Gil Rodriguez, 25, and Luis Manuel Taboada Cabrera, 28, had faced a maximum of just under six years in prison under the advisory guidelines, which included an enhancement of 2 1/2 years for the death of 6-year-old Julian Villasuso on Oct. 12, about 45 miles south of Key West.

Their boat carried 29 migrants, including Julian and his parents, and the two smugglers who pleaded guilty in November to migrant smuggling conspiracy charges.

Their attorney, Steven Amster, argued that the lower penalty was sufficient punishment, in part because the smuggling trip was not organized for profit.

Taboada apologized to the judge and accepted responsibility for his actions.

"I want to say that I'm really repentant about what happened," Taboada said in Spanish through an interpreter. Gil did not address the court.

Amster said he would appeal the sentence.

The boy was buried in Florida and his parents were permitted to enter the United States, while the other migrants were returned to Cuba. Under U.S. immigration policy, most Cubans who reach U.S. soil are allowed to remain while those intercepted at sea are normally returned to their homeland.

2 Smugglers Get 10 Years Each In Drowning Death Of 6-year-old Cuban (FLSUNSEN)

By Vanessa Blum, Sun-sentinel.com

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, March 21, 2006

MIAMI -- A federal judge on Monday imposed the harshest possible sentence on two men whose effort to smuggle Cubans into the United States last year ended in the drowning of a young boy.

U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore sentenced Alexander Gil-Rodriguez and Luis Manuel Taboada Cabrera to 10 years each in prison, the longest terms possible under federal law.

Moore said he was departing from advisory sentencing guidelines, which called for more modest prison terms of 57 to 71 months, because he felt the guidelines did not reflect the severity of the offense and would not deter similar crimes.

Gil Rodriguez, 25, and Taboada Cabrera, 28, pleaded guilty in November 2005 to illegally attempting to bring migrants into the United States.

Their speedboat was detected by the U.S. Coast Guard and capsized in the Florida Straits on Oct. 13, 2005, as the men allegedly tried to evade capture. Julian Villasuso Jr., 6, who was on the boat with his parents, was trapped under the overturned boat and drowned. There were 31 people aboard the 33-foot-long go-fast boat.

Defense attorney Steven Amster argued that the lower penalty was sufficient punishment, in part because the smuggling trip was not organized for profit. In remarks to the judge, Taboada apologized and took responsibility for his actions.

``I want to say that I'm really repentant about what happened," Taboada said in Spanish through an interpreter. Gil did not address the court.

Amster also suggested that the Coast Guard played a role in the boy's death by casting a net over their boat's engines, causing water to rush over the stern and precipitating the boat's capsizing. There also was a delay in the attempt to rescue Julian after it was realized he was still under the boat.

``The boat had come to a stop. They had given up," Amster said.

But Moore said the smugglers should not expect leniency by attempting to shift blame to the Coast Guard and noted that other migrants on the boat had pleaded with the two smugglers to stop once the chase began.

``It's all too easy while we sit in a courtroom, in a very antiseptic environment, to ignore the dangers and risks these Coast Guard officers take every day," Moore said.

U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta said the strict sentence ``is a reflection of the seriousness of the crime and our resolve to help end this tragic human saga."

The commander of the 7th Coast Guard District, Rear Adm. D. Brian Peterman, said Moore's decision ``sends a clear signal that we will not tolerate smuggling of illegal migrants into the United States."

Amster said he would appeal the sentence, calling it far too harsh for the facts of the case.

The boy was buried in Florida and his parents permitted to enter the United States, while the other migrants were returned to Cuba. Under U.S. immigration policy, most Cubans who reach U.S. soil are allowed to remain while those intercepted at sea are normally returned to their homeland.

Attorney Accuses Bay County Of Cover-up In Boot Camp Death (AP)

By BRENT KALLESTAD, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 21, 2006

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. - Bay County authorities are covering up their role in the death of a boy who was punched and kicked by guards at a boot camp, and his relatives want any trial in the case moved to another area to ensure a fair proceeding, the family's attorney said Monday.

Bay County sheriff's spokeswoman Ruth Sasser declined to comment on the cover-up allegations, but said seven drill instructors involved in the altercation and a nurse who witnessed it will be among about 20 people who lose their jobs when the camp closes next month. The closure plans had already been announced.

Ben Crump, the attorney for Martin Lee Anderson's parents, said they were "outraged" because medical examiner Dr. Charles Siebert last week defended his findings that the 14-year-old died from complications of sickle cell trait, a usually harmless blood disorder.

"How could he deny that the beating of Martin did not play some role in his death," Crump told reporters. "How can you say it didn't play a role? It's almost less than intelligent. It's an insult to the family."

Investigators re-examining the death with a second autopsy said last week that Anderson didn't die of natural causes.

Anderson died Jan. 6 after the confrontation at the boot camp in Panama City run by Bay County sheriff's officials. He had been struck, kicked and dragged to the ground by several guards during a half-hour ordeal that was recorded on videotape.

No one has been charged with a crime, but the family has threatened to sue.

"Martin's parents have said it was a cover-up from day one," Crump said. "The law enforcement officials are doing everything they can to make sure nobody is held accountable for the death of their son."

County spokeswoman Catherine Zehner said the sheriff's department has third-party liability insurance, so she doesn't "think the county commission will get embroiled in a lawsuit."

Gov. Jeb Bush has appointed Hillsborough County State Attorney Mark Ober to investigate and he observed the second autopsy done in Tampa. The U.S. Attorney's office in Tallahassee and the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division also have opened an investigation into Anderson's death.

"No peace until justice," said Anderson's mother, Gina Jones.

California Prisons Uneasily Prepare To Desegregate Cells (WSJ)

By Miriam Jordan

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

CHINO, Calif. -- It's exercise time at the California Institution for Men, and dozens of inmates walk around the track in pairs or small groups -- blacks with blacks, whites with whites, Hispanics with Hispanics.

DOJ_NMG_0019918

Prison culture dictates that inmates stick with their own kind, associating almost exclusively with other inmates from their race or ethnic group, defending them to the death if necessary. And that is why prison officials, inmates and scholars are uneasy as California's prison system prepares to introduce a formal policy desegregating its double cells, after the U.S. Supreme Court ruled last year that prisoners may not be routinely segregated in cells by race. The ruling has ramifications for state correctional systems nationwide.

In 2004, an African-American inmate challenged the California Department of Corrections' unwritten policy of assigning new prisoners and transfers to double cells only with a cellmate of the same race or ethnic group. The corrections department claimed segregated prison cells were necessary to avoid racial violence. Unswayed, the high court last year refused to strike down the inmate's challenge. California's new policy, which officials expect to implement over the next 2½ years, is the result of a settlement of that case.

California's prison population is combustible, divided roughly evenly among three groups: 38% of inmates are Hispanic, 29% are black and 27% white. Recent race-related prison violence in Southern California has focused concerns about thrusting inmates together in biracial cells. For more than a month now, clashes of black and Latino prisoners have gripped Los Angeles county jails, resulting in two deaths and more than 100 injuries. In October, a Hispanic inmate at Chino died from head injuries inflicted in a riot last summer.

Critics of the new policy say the purpose of segregated cells is to keep prisons peaceful and safe, not to discriminate. "You must give broad latitude to the prison administrator," says Joseph McNamara, former police chief of San Jose, Calif., and a research fellow at Stanford University's Hoover Institution. "If not, you let slaughtering happen."

California's prison system, at present still operating largely under the old policy, uses ethnicity as the main criteria when assigning higher-threat inmates to double cells. Racial segregation doesn't apply at mealtimes, in classes or in dormitories where low-risk felons are housed. Prisoners, however, say they live along self-imposed racial divides all day. "It's an unwritten rule," says Reginald Scott, a black inmate in Chino since 1998, who was at his job typing up inmate infractions in a small administrative room. "You don't have coffee with a white or Hispanic guy. You don't trade food, property or anything with someone of a different race."

Criminal-justice scholars say it is impossible to get a clear picture of prison-cell integration across the U.S. because practices vary widely from facility to facility. One national survey of prison wardens in 2000, led by Martha Henderson, now an assistant professor at Southern Illinois University, Carbondale, found only 30% of multiple-occupant cells were integrated. Federal prisons are forbidden under regulations to segregate based on race; California is one of the few state systems to acknowledge the practice.

Under the new California policy, new prisoners will be assigned to "the next available and appropriate cell," without regard for ethnicity. "We are not preparing [offenders] for their return to society if we continue to allow them to be segregated in our housing," said John Dovey, the corrections department's director of adult institutions who is overseeing the new policy.

Academic researchers say racial tension is usually engineered by a small group of inmates. Prisoners say when tensions explode it is almost impossible to stay neutral. "If you run away, your own people deal with you later," says Joe Rodriguez, a Hispanic inmate at the Chino prison. "Once you're in jail, everything becomes racial."

Gangs defined by race -- the Mexican Mafia, the Black Guerilla Family, the Nazi Low Riders and others -- permeate inmate life in California prisons. At Chino, a low- and medium-security facility, inmates working as gardeners and handymen sport gang acronyms tattooed to the backs of their heads.

Lt. Tim Shirlock, an official at the Chino facility who has worked in the state correctional system for 27 years, says the prison staff is "apprehensive" about the desegregation policy. Noting recent instances of racial violence on streets, schools and workplaces in Los Angeles, he says, "If they can't get along in society, you have to wonder whether they will get along here."

Prison systems in Texas and Oklahoma introduced policies to integrate cells in the 1990s. A 2002 study by two Dallas researchers found that Texas' new policy, rather than fueling violence, actually had the opposite effect. Violence in Texas prisons with integrated cells was slightly less likely than in facilities with segregated cells, researchers Chad Trulson, of the University of North Texas, and James Marquart, of the University of Texas, found.

Supporters of desegregation say it is the correctional system's responsibility to foster better relations among inmates. "You want to de-emphasize race, not give power to the instinct to use race," says Margo Schlanger, a professor of law at Washington University in St. Louis, who specializes in incarceration litigation.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, writing for the majority in the California ruling, invoked the landmark 1954 Brown v. Board of Education decision that rejected the idea of "separate but equal." "Indeed," she added, "by insisting that inmates be housed only with other inmates of the same race, it is possible that prison officials will breed further hostility among prisoners and reinforce racial and ethnic divisions."

Today, some two-thirds of Texas' prison cells house inmates of different races. "Many of us had real concern about what would happen" when cells were integrated, says Doug Dretke, Texas' director of correctional institutions. The concerns proved unfounded, he says, adding that less than 1% of Texas inmates today are "racially restricted."

California, though, faces especially high obstacles. Financial cutbacks and a fast-growing inmate population now approaching 170,000 have made it a struggle for the system to house felons and retain staff. The California Institute for Men in Chino houses 6,500 felons -- more than double its capacity. On a recent Wednesday morning, eight correctional officers were guarding about 500 inmates on the yard, a ratio that isn't unusual, says Terry Thornton, a communications official for the California corrections department.

California is creating a desegregation program using Texas as a model. It involves educating prison officers and prisoners and a screening process to weed out inmates whose criminal record or prison history would make them a bad risk for a multiracial cell. One California facility is testing a behavior-modification program that would deny privileges to inmates who undermine the program.

At least some prisoners are prepared to give co-existing a try. "California has let inmates dictate how they should live" for too long, says Franklin Porter, a 45-year-old black inmate. "If they're integrating in other states, it can work here."

Geico's Risk Criteria Challenged (WP)

By Albert B. Crenshaw And Caroline E. Mayer

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

According to an internal Geico document, the auto insurer uses drivers' levels of education and occupations in setting insurance rates.

As a result, Consumer Federation of America argued, blue-collar workers with relatively low levels of education sometimes are charged almost twice as much as better-educated professionals, based on those criteria.

Geico said in a statement that it uses many factors in setting rates and that allegations that education and occupation are being used as the sole criterion are "absolutely untrue."

The document cited by the consumer group and a Geico competitor raises long-standing questions about which criteria insurance companies may use as proper gauges of risk and which improperly discriminate against poor people and minorities.

Insurers, consumer advocates, regulators and politicians have been struggling for years over such issues, including the use of credit scores in assessing risk. The use of credit scores is permissible in about 30 states but continues to be debated.

Yesterday, CFA called on insurance regulators to bar insurers from basing decisions on whether to sell insurance to someone and what rates to charge solely on the applicant's education and income, calling the practice "an underwriting sleight of hand" to avoid existing prohibitions on using race and other criteria.

"No single criterion is ever used to determine a customer's rate," Geico said in a statement late yesterday. "Persons of all educational levels and occupations are offered insurance at our best rate based on a variety of criteria. Income or race based criteria never has a role in underwriting or pricing. These allegations are patently false and intentionally divisive."

The consumer group was joined by New Jersey Citizens United Reciprocal Exchange, a nonprofit insurer and Geico competitor in that state. They based their call for regulatory action on an internal Geico document filed with regulators in New Jersey, which makes more documents public than other states. The document included a guide used by Geico's underwriters to decide which of the company's four subsidiary companies will insure an applicant and to determine what price an applicant will be offered.

The guide, in addition to listing factors such as driving history, age, mileage and vehicle type, includes a section dividing drivers into eight groups based on their education and occupation. Considered "more favorable" are professionals with college degrees and graduate students. "Least favorable" are "minimally skilled clerks, assistants, stock clerks and postal clerks," as well as long-haul drivers and "unskilled and semiskilled blue and gray collar workers."

"Educational attainment and occupation are directly linked to income, which cannot be used in determining insurance eligibility or rates because of its serious adverse impact on lower-income and minority consumers," said J. Robert Hunter, CFA's director of insurance and a former Texas insurance commissioner. According to the U.S. Census Bureau, 89.4 percent of non-Hispanic whites 25 and older held a high school diploma in 2003. By comparison, 80 percent of blacks and 57 percent of Hispanics were high school graduates.

CFA said it sought rate quotations from Geico's Web site for motorists in locations in all 50 states and the District, entering data for drivers who were identical except for education and occupation. The experiment produced higher rates for the blue-collar driver in all but six locations (one of which was Fairfax County).

The differences ranged from 11.12 percent in Chicago to 124.72 percent in New Orleans.

Geico, which has been vigorously advertising low prices, said, "Every criterion, including occupation and education, used by Geico reflects its actual loss experience nationwide over many decades. Geico has justified its use of these criteria with insurance regulators throughout the country for many years."

Geico, the nation's fourth-largest car insurance company, is a subsidiary of Berkshire Hathaway Inc.

Former D.C. insurance commissioner Lawrence H. Mirel, now at Wiley Rein & Fielding here, said carriers constantly seek to find ways to assess risk accurately.

"The heart of insurance is underwriting. You want to make the best prediction you can about who is going to have a claim, and if you're good about that you make money, if not you lose money," he said.

Some other carriers said they use education or occupation along with other criteria, while others said they do not.

Industry officials said that auto insurance is both tightly regulated and highly competitive, so that practices that have a pernicious impact are likely to be stopped, and in any case, with hundreds of carriers in the market, motorists have plenty of places to shop.

"Automobile insurance is a highly competitive market where consumers who don't want to deal with a company for whatever reason have lots of other companies to choose from," said David Snyder, vice president and assistant general counsel at the American Insurance Association, a trade group in the District.

State Farm, the nation's largest auto insurer, does not use occupation and education to determine rates. "We are always looking at variables so we can price our product as accurately as we can, but at the moment those two are not among the ones we are using," said company spokesman Dick Luedke. "To the extent that companies are using different variables, that's good news to the consumers."

Allstate doesn't ask prospective customers about their education, but it does consider occupational discounts in several states. Actuaries, architects, editors, legislators, mail carriers and speech therapists, for example, receive a 10 percent discount while carpenters, clergy, insurance adjusters, plumbers, police officers, teachers, and locksmiths get a 5 percent reduction in their rates.

"Our data shows that these professions incur fewer losses" and the discounts are an innovative way to provide consumers with competitively priced insurance coverage, said spokesman Mike Siemienas.

For Liberty Mutual Group, occupation is a factor in setting rates in some states, said spokesman Glenn Greenberg. "We use no single criterion to determine the price," and any data used are based on "the likelihood of risk," Greenberg said.

San Antonio Business Journal, March 21, 2006

AT&T Inc.'s plan to merge with BellSouth Corp. is seen as a development that will not work in favor of San Antonio's small-business community, according to the majority of individuals who participated in an online Business Pulse poll.

Slightly more than half of the San Antonio Business Journal readers who responded to the survey say San Antonio-based AT&T's (NYSE: T) planned $67 billion stock merger with BellSouth (NYSE: BLS) in Atlanta will lead to less competition in the marketplace, rising prices, less technological innovation and poor customer service.

(The online poll is not scientific and the results represent only a snap shot of some readers' opinions.)

AT&T officials, however, disagree with the negative assessments of the merger and have long maintained that there is sufficient competition in the marketplace as evidenced by the full slate of services offered by cable, wireless carriers and competing local phone companies.

In 1984, the courts broke up AT&T Corp. into a long-distance company and seven regional Bell operating companies: Southwestern Bell, Pacific Telesis, Ameritech, BellSouth, U.S. West, NYNEX and Bell Atlantic.

Since then, Southwestern Bell -- which changed its name to SBC Communications Inc. -- undertook an acquisition strategy to acquire fellow Bells Pacific Telesis and Ameritech and former parent company AT&T Corp. SBC officially changed its name to AT&T on Nov. 18, 2005, and is aggressively re-branding itself as the new AT&T.

By merging with BellSouth, a number of online participants of the Business Pulse survey said AT&T's plan is tantamount to the re-monopolization of the former Ma Bell.

Several survey participants attributed the overall growth in technological innovation the telecommunications industry is enjoying today to the break up of the old monopoly and the resulting competition. If AT&T is allowed to proceed with the merger, it could stifle healthy competition, one survey participant said.

DOJ_NMG_0019921

The merger still needs shareholder and regulatory approval in five states and with the Justice Department and Federal Communications Commission.

About 41 percent of those who participated in the survey said the merger would be a positive development for the small-business community. Many said that AT&T's move is simply a response to the overall consolidation in the telecommunications industry.

About 8 percent of those responding to the poll were undecided.

UPDATE: Proxy Adviser Backs Boston Sci, Guidant Deal (DOW)

By Jon Kamp, Of DOW JONES NEWSWIRES

Dow Jones, March 21, 2006

Shareholders of Boston Scientific Corp. (BSX) (BSX) and Guidant Corp. (GDT) (GDT) should approve the consolidation of the two companies in votes scheduled for March 31, according to Institutional Shareholder Services, an influential proxy advisory firm.

In reports recently directed to shareholders of each company, ISS said "the acquisition of GDT will allow BSX to diversify its product offerings, adding defibrillators and pacemakers, and should ameliorate some of the concerns regarding future growth."

On Jan. 25, Boston Scientific (BSX) and Guidant (GDT) announced a merger agreement, under which Boston Scientific (BSX) will buy Guidant (GDT) for a combination of cash and stock worth about $27 billion. The deal is valued at $80 a share to Guidant (GDT)shareholders as long as Boston Scientific (BSX) shares close within a $22.62-$28.86 collar over a certain period prior to the deal's closing.

So far, Boston Scientific's (BSX) closing price has largely remained within that range. Boston Scientific (BSX) recently traded at $23.28, up 66 cents, or 2.9%.

Guidant's (GDT) shares recently traded at $78.69, up 81 cents from Friday's close, and hit a 52-week high of $78.74 earlier in the session. The stock hit its previous 52-week high of $77.95 during Friday's session.

ISS published its reports Thursday, and the two medical-device makers noted the positive reviews in a joint press release Monday.

Jim Tobin, Boston Scientific's (BSX) chief executive, repeated that the acquisition is expected to close in the first week of April. In a recent filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, Boston Scientific (BSX) said it anticipates antitrust approval for the deal that week.

Guidant (GDT) and Boston Scientific (BSX) are each holding separate shareholder meetings for a vote on the deal at 10:00 a.m. EST on March 31. Guidant (GDT) will hold its meeting at its corporate headquarters in Indianapolis, and Natick, Mass-based Boston Scientific (BSX) will hold its meeting in Boston.

ISS noted that it will take a majority vote from holders of each company to clear the deal. Boston Scientific (BSX) has a head start as major shareholders Pete Nicholas and John Abele, who founded and own roughly 30% of the company, have already entered into voting agreement with Guidant (GDT) through which they have agreed to back the deal.

Boston Scientific's (BSX) major product is its Taxus drug-coated stent, a tiny device used to prop open arteries. Though Taxus is the top-seller in the more than $5 billion market, growth in the overall segment is leveling off. Guidant (GDT)had notable troubles last year with its heart-rhythm devices, including several recalls and problems linked to multiple deaths, but the heart-rhythm segment is still expected to expand rapidly.

Larry Best, Boston Scientific's (BSX) chief financial officer, recently said the company expects to rebuild Guidant's (GDT) position in the business.

Dow Jones, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- Lucent Technologies Inc. (LU) (LU) received antitrust clearance from the Federal Trade Commission to buy the business operations of Riverstone Networks Inc. (RSTNE) (RSTNE) for $170 million in cash.

The FTC said Monday that on Friday it granted Lucent early termination of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act.

Lucent has said the acquisition would complement its broadband, data and optical-networking products. The transaction is subject to bankruptcy court approval and other conditions.

Riverstone Networks (RSTNE) said in a press release Friday it received a $178-million offer from the U.S. unit of Swedish telecommunications giant LM Ericsson (ERICY) to purchase substantially all of Riverstone's assets.

Riverstone said it was reviewing Ericsson's bid.

An auction for the sale of Riverstone's assets is scheduled for Monday. The deadline for bids was Thursday.

Riverstone, Santa Clara, Calif., makes ethernet routers for the telecommunications industry. The company filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection Feb. 7, listing assets of $98.3 million and debt of $130 million.

At that time, Riverstone agreed to sell its assets to Lucent, a telecommunications equipment manufacturer based in Murray Hill, N.J., for $170 million, subject to higher offers.

Lucent's shares recently fell 3.8% to $2.79, after a Barron's report criticized the company's dwindling business prospects.

Counter-bid Likely For Prudential (FT)

By Andrea Felsted

Financial Times, March 21, 2006

Investors were braced for a counter-bid for Prudential, Britain's second biggest life assurer, after its shares rose 5 per cent above the offer price proposed by Aviva.

Shares in Prudential rose 11 per cent to 743½p, ahead of the 706p proposed by Aviva in its all-share offer which, valuing Prudential at £16.8bn

"The share price is telling you that the market is expecting a counter-bid," said Roman Cizdyn, an analyst at Oriel Securities. "As we sit where we are now, Aviva is not likely to succeed. The price is telling you that."

However, Richard Harvey, chief executive of Aviva, said a counterbid was "unlikely" and that consequently, Aviva was not expected to make a hostile offer.

"I think it's unlikely that someone else would come in and that is why we are expecting to proceed on a recommended basis," Mr Harvey said.

France's Axa is seen as the most likely counter-bidder for Prudential, but some analysts said that it had been reluctant to become involved in contested bid situations in the past.

Mr Cizdyn said that Aviva, by showing its hand and admitting that it needed more growth opportunities, had also put itself into play.

Expectations of a counterbid come as Prudential shareholders are set to put pressure on Mark Tucker, chief executive, and Sir David Clementi, chairman, to explain why it would not enter discussions with Aviva.

"We need a robust defence case, which is quantified, as to why they are turning down a 700p-plus offer," said one Prudential shareholder.

One top-30 shareholder said he would be asking Prudential to justify why it would not enter into dialogue with Aviva, but the outcome would depend on the bigger shareholders.

Mr Harvey played down the prospects of Aviva raising its offer, or adding a cash component. "I don't think there is a lot [of sense in] moving cash out of the group that you are expecting to grow very strongly," he said.

The comments came as Prudential reaffirmed its rejection of Aviva's proposed offer.

It followed a statement from Aviva detailing its proposal. The group said that, under the terms of the proposal, Prudential shareholders would receive 82 new Aviva shares for every 100 Prudential shares held. It also expected to generate annual cost savings of £320m before tax by 2009, at a one-off cost to shareholders of £480m.

Aviva also said it would be able to boost Prudential's dividend by the combined group adopting Aviva's dividend policy.

It added that Mr Harvey would be chief executive of the combined group with the rest of the board drawn from both organisations.

However, Mr Harvey refused to comment specifically on whether there would be a role for Mr Tucker.

Aviva CEO Plans To Woo Prudential PLC Investors To Back Takeover Offer (WSJ)

By Charles Fleming

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

Insisting his takeover intentions remain friendly, Richard Harvey, chief executive of the United Kingdom's largest insurer, Aviva PLC, said he would take his case for a merger with fellow U.K. insurer Prudential PLC directly to shareholders, overriding Prudential managers' rejection of his unsolicited £17.1 billion (€24.63 billion or $30.04 billion) takeover offer.

DOJ_NMG_0019923

"My door is open to shareholders," Mr. Harvey said in an interview. He said the two companies have many shareholders in common and that Aviva's investor-relations team is currently working the telephones to explain Aviva's position to investors. "I expect them to arrange a number of rendezvous for me [with shareholders] in the coming weeks,' Mr. Harvey said.

Prudential, which isn't related to the U.S. insurance company of the same name, repeated Monday its opposition to Aviva's proposal. Prudential Chairman David Clementi said in a statement that Prudential's potential as a stand-alone company was "tremendous and distinctive" and that a combination with Aviva would dilute the benefits of its growth. Prudential Chief Executive Mark Tucker was unavailable for comment, a Prudential spokesman said.

Aviva sent its offer to Prudential management last Thursday, suggesting a merger of the two companies in an all-share transaction valuing Prudential at 708 pence a share. Mr. Harvey said Monday that he had gone public with the terms of the offer, not as a hostile gesture but so that shareholders could assess the proposal on an informed basis. He also said the U.K. Takeover Panel would have required the information to be made public following Prudential's public statements over the weekend.

Mr. Harvey said Aviva wasn't considering raising its offer, but Prudential shares soared Monday on expectations that a higher offer would follow, either from Aviva or another as-yet undeclared bidder. Prudential shares were trading more than 12% higher at 747.50 pence in London Monday afternoon.

Mr. Harvey acknowledged as modest Aviva's estimates of £320 million in annual cost savings if the two groups merged. But he said there were stronger arguments for the transaction. He specified the need to match the global reach of Aviva's two main European rivals, AXA SA of France and Allianz AG of Germany, both of which have built up a strong U.S. presence as well as broad European operations.

"You don't just do this to save money. Look at the way the market values AXA and Allianz and their global footprint," he said, saying he was seeking to build "a must-hold world-wide company." Aviva's insurance business is focused on the U.K. and Europe, while Prudential has operations in the U.K., the U.S. and across Asia.

Aviva, shares of which were down slightly at 848.63 pence in London Monday afternoon, currently trades at 11.42 times its estimated 2006 earnings, slightly under AXA's current price-to-earnings ratio of 12.85 but above Allianz's 11.25. Prudential's current price-to-earnings ratio is 14.61 times its 2006 estimated earnings.

Belgium To Seek Concessions On GDF-Suez (AP)

AP, March 21, 2006

PARIS - Belgian Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt said Monday he plans to hold talks to seek concessions on the French government-backed plan for Gaz de France SA to acquire French utility company Suez SA.

Speaking after a meeting with President Jacques Chirac in Paris, Verhofstadt said he had told the French leader that a GDF-Suez deal should not prevent Belgium from opening its gas and electricity markets to more competition.

Verhofstadt also said the two Paris-based companies would likely have to sell assets in order to meet that requirement.

The GDF-Suez deal was announced by the French government last month just days after Italian power company Enel SPA said it might launch a takeover bid for Suez.

Verhofstadt said last week that it would be unacceptable for one company to control 90 percent of his country's electricity market. The Belgian energy regulator is also concerned about the country's nuclear plants coming under French control, according to press reports.

A final deal might have to include "a sell-off of assets in the nuclear domain," Verhofstadt said Monday, adding that his government was seeking to "open the electricity and gas markets in Belgium and to have several operators, as is already the case in telecommunications."

The CEOs of GDF and Suez, Jean-Francois Cirelli and Gerard Mestrallet, met EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes on Monday to discuss antitrust concerns over the planned deal.

Mestrallet said afterward that he and Cirelli had presented the plan at a "very constructive" first meeting, refusing to be drawn on likely concessions.

But Suez spokesman Guy Dellicour said the company does not expect the selloffs required to go beyond an existing agreement to sell three sites, effectively opening 25 percent of the Belgian power market to competition.

Verhofstadt, who will meet the GDF and Suez bosses on Tuesday and Wednesday, has already said more electricity businesses will have to be sold for the deal to go through.

DOJ_NMG_0019924

Enel CEO Fulvio Conti is also set to meet Tuesday with the EU's Kroes, who cautioned earlier this month that energy deals will receive close antitrust scrutiny. The EU executive has for years been pressing stragglers in energy liberalization, including Belgium and France, to open their electricity and gas markets.

FCC Deregulates Verizon's Big-Business Market (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Verizon Communications Inc. got a boost in the big-business market as federal regulators agreed to deregulate its high-volume data lines for its largest corporate customers.

The decision by the Federal Communications Commission essentially lifts price controls and possibly reverses some conditions imposed on the New York telecommunications company last year during its acquisition of MCI Inc. It also gives Verizon pricing flexibility for lucrative high-volume services sold to major corporations, although regulations may continue to stay in effect for smaller business customers.

The action signaled the FCC's willingness to expand phone companies' control over high-speed Internet lines to cover the large corporate market as well as residential customers.

But by granting Verizon's request without guidance, the FCC prompted confusion in the industry Monday. The action could lead to legal challenges by smaller competitors, particularly companies that resell high-volume services, such as Internet access, to small businesses. Also, other phone companies are likely to file requests for similar relief with the FCC.

"It's the most lucrative market today, and this ensures Verizon remains dominant in its territory," said Jessica Zufolo, a telecom analyst for Medley Global Advisors.

Verizon Monday said in a statement it appreciated the FCC's actions. In December 2004, the company asked the FCC to ease rules on data pipes used by its enterprise customers, freeing it from common-carrier obligations, notably rules guaranteeing access at "just and reasonable" rates. The FCC lifted similar rules last year on residential high-speed Internet lines. The change frees Verizon from a variety of rules, including requirements to interconnect with other providers or contribute to the Universal Service Fund, which subsidizes phone services for low-income residents and rural communities.

FCC Chairman Kevin Martin has supported giving the Bells more control over data lines, saying it will encourage investment and the spread of high-speed Internet access. He asked the commission's other members to approve Verizon's request last month, but the effort failed after the FCC's two Democrats voted against the measure, saying it would restrict competition in the enterprise market.

"Like everyone else, it puts us at the mercy of Verizon. If we pay them enough money, I guess we'll get service," said Earl Comstock, chief executive of Comptel, an association of smaller phone companies that compete with the Bells.

The Verizon proposal went into effect Sunday night because an FCC rule grants petitions automatically if the commission doesn't respond. Commissioner Michael Copps, one of the panel's two Democrats, said the decision "erases decades of communications policy in a single stroke. In effect, we provide industry the pen and give it the go-ahead to rewrite the law."

The decision to grant Verizon's request without FCC guidance could prove problematic since the original request was somewhat broad. It is also unclear if the decision only applies to Verizon or all carriers who provide such services. AT&T Inc. said in a statement it was evaluating the decision, but believes it "should apply to all market players."

And it is unclear which obligations Verizon still has on its high-volume lines. For example, rules requiring telecom companies to cooperate with law enforcement on wiretapping and other electronic surveillance may no longer apply. Mr. Martin is already planning to circulate an order to reimpose Universal Service Fund obligations, FCC officials said Monday. The action may also effectively undo some conditions imposed on Verizon last year in its acquisition of MCI, such as requiring it to lease access to high-volume lines to competitors along with a limited price freeze on rates.

Kerzner Agrees To Buyout Offer Topping $3 Billion (WSJ)

By Peter Sanders

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

Casino operator Kerzner International Ltd. agreed to be acquired by a consortium of private-equity concerns for $3 billion in cash plus the assumption of $599 million in debt.

The consortium, including Kerzner Chairman Sol Kerzner and his son, Butch Kerzner, the company's chief executive, agreed to pay $76 a share for the Bahamas-based casino company, an 8% premium to the stock's Friday closing price. The company operates its flagship Atlantis properties in the Bahamas and soon in Dubai, as well as the ultraluxury "One&Only" hotels in exotic destinations around the world. Kerzner International also receives income from the Mohegan Sun tribal casino in Connecticut, which it developed, and has a large casino at its Atlantis property in the Bahamas.

DOJ_NMG_0019925

If successful in their buyout attempt, the Kerzners would see their ownership stake rise to about 25% from about 10%, Butch Kerzner said in an interview. Kerzner officials insist they "will actively solicit superior proposals during the next 45 days," but the proposed deal represents a multiple of about 19 times last year's earnings, according to a person familiar with the situation. "On a multiple basis, this is a rich price," that person says.

Butch Kerzner, 42 years old, said that, to be completely forthright with investors, the company will entertain other offers at a higher price by conducting a "full auction" during the next 45 days. He added that "in certain circumstances, we would vote our shares in favor if there is a higher offer." But he expects the buyout to go through and "looking at the horizon, we want it not just to be an investment, but my father and I want to have a strategic stake in what we want to do."

Another person familiar with the situation said two of the four members of a special committee formed to examine the proposed deal are shareholders with a combined 14% of the stock. That person said both members have agreed to sell their positions at the proposed price.

If completed, the deal is expected to close sometime later this year. Investors reacted positively to the news, driving the stock up 13%, or $9.07, to $79.43, above the $76 offer price, in 4 p.m. composite trading yesterday on the New York Stock Exchange.

Private-equity partners in the deal include major shareholder Istithmar, a closely held entity controlled by the government of Dubai that already owns about 12.3% of the company; Colony Capital LLC; Whitehall Street Global Real Estate Ltd.; Providence Equity Partners Inc. and The Related Companies L.P.

The proposed deal is another in a frenzy of activity focused on the hotel and casino industry. Last week, casino operator Aztar Corp. agreed to be acquired by rival operator Pinnacle Entertainment Inc. for about $1.45 billion. Last month, Hilton Hotels Corp. completed its roughly $5.7 billion acquisition of its international counterpart.

And in January, Fairmont Hotels & Resorts Inc. agreed to be acquired by a Canadian company and Colony Capital for about $3.3 billion. But the proposed deal would be the first in recent memory that would see a hotel company taken private.

Mr. Kerzner insists it will be "business as usual" for his company, which competes at the high end in both the casino and hotel world with major players such as Harrah's Entertainment Inc. MGM Mirage, Starwood Hotels & Resorts Worldwide Inc., Marriott International Inc. and others.

"We're not looking at this as a typical leveraged buyout," Mr. Kerzner said. "We've grown this company over time, and we will be investing more money in the business, not stripping out cash."

In 2004, 81% of Kerzner's revenue came from its megaresort in the Bahamas. Last year, the company pushed forward with a major expansion of its Atlantis property in the Bahamas, which will compete with a newly announced project by Harrah's and Starwood slated for a site nearby. The company is in the continuing race to secure one of two new casino licenses in Singapore, which would see the winner build a multibillion-dollar resort destination there in the coming years.

France Drafts Copyright Law To Open Up ITunes (FT)

By Tom Braithwaite

Financial Times, March 21, 2006

Apple Computer could on Tuesday be forced to open up its digital music business to competitors after a vote in the French parliament.

The owner of iTunes, the online music store, and the iPod digital music player, will have to choose between making downloaded music compatible with rival platforms or pulling out of France if, as expected, the parliament in Paris approves a draft copyright law.

Software in digital downloads from iTunes prevents music being played by any rival to the popular iPod, but the French bill seeks to impose “interoperability” on online music stores and break Apple’s closed system.

“It is unacceptable that . . . the key should be controlled by a monopoly. France is against monopolies,” said Martin Rogard, an adviser at the French Culture Ministry. “The consumer must be able to listen to the music they have bought on no matter what platform.”

Mr Rogard said it was “desirable” that France led in this respect, but hoped that it was the start of a Europe-wide move to open up digital music.

Competitors such as Sony and Microsoft would also have to comply with the legislation, but some rivals see it as a chance to break Apple’s grip on the online music market. Steve Jobs, Apple’s chief executive, has said that 3m songs a day are sold on iTunes. The website has more than 70 per cent of paid digital downloads in some markets.

“The French seem to be leading the way in being a little bit more anarchic and taking a stand,” said Rudy Tambala, head of Virgin Digital, a UK-based online music store. “[Apple made] a smart move. They’ve created the market and they’ve dominated it.”

However, others in the IT industry said forcing Apple to admit competitors to a new market it was instrumental in creating sent the wrong signal to technology companies. CompTIA, a trade association, said the law was the latest in a series of measures in the European Union that were “punishing inventors and stifling innovation”.

The draft copyright law, which implements an EU directive on intellectual property, has already been the source of controversy. Record companies and artists were enraged last year when an ad hoc coalition of MPs succeeded in pushing through a parliamentary amendment that legalised peer-to-peer file-sharing.

The government overturned the amendment but has bowed to pressure from consumers groups to open up the market for digital music. The government has also reduced the fines for illegally downloading music to a mere €38 ($46, £26).

Apple said it was waiting for the law to be passed before making any comment.

Justices Reach Out To Consider Patent Case (NYT)

By Andrew Pollack

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

For the first time in a quarter-century, the Supreme Court will hear on Tuesday a case involving the basic question of what type of discoveries and inventions can be patented.

Both sides say the case, which involves a blood test for a vitamin deficiency, could have a wide-ranging impact on the development of diagnostics, perhaps threatening many of the underlying patents for genetic and other medical tests.

But the array of companies filing supporting briefs — including American Express, Bear Stearns and I.B.M. — indicates that intellectual property in other fields might also be affected.

Some patent specialists say they think the Supreme Court agreed to hear the case, against the advice of the United States solicitor general, to rein in patenting.

"The Supreme Court reached out and grabbed this case," said Edward R. Reines, a patent attorney at Weil, Gotshal & Manges who is not involved in the case. "These circumstances suggest that some members of the court believe there are too many patents in areas where there should be none."

At issue is whether relationships between a substance in the human body and a disease — for example, the familiar association between high cholesterol and a higher risk of heart attacks — can be the basis of a patent, or whether such relationships are unpatentable natural phenomena.

This case, LabCorp v. Metabolite Laboratories, stems from a 1990 patent awarded to scientists at the University of Colorado and Columbia University. They found that a high level in the blood of homocysteine, an amino acid, indicated a deficiency of either vitamin B12 or another B vitamin called folic acid.

Much of the patent describes a specific way to measure homocysteine, and those claims are not at issue. But the 13th claim of the patent is more general: it covers a way of determining vitamin deficiency by first testing blood or urine for homocysteine by any means and then correlating elevated levels with a vitamin deficiency.

The patent is owned by Competitive Technologies, a publicly traded patent management firm in Fairfield, Conn., and licensed to Metabolite Laboratories, a tiny company based at the University of Colorado. LabCorp, one of the biggest clinical testing companies in the nation, with 2005 revenues of $3.3 billion, sublicensed the test from Metabolite.

At first, LabCorp, whose full name is Laboratory Corporation of America Holdings, tested for homocysteine using the specific method described in the patent and paid royalties to Metabolite and Competitive Technologies. But in 1998 it switched to a newer and faster test developed by Abbott Laboratories.

Metabolite and Competitive sued, charging LabCorp with violating Claim 13 of the patent. In 2001 a federal jury in Denver ruled against LabCorp, and the company was eventually ordered to pay $7.8 million in damages and attorneys' fees. The appeals court that handles patent cases affirmed the lower court decision in 2004.

In asking the Supreme Court to overturn the lower court decisions, LabCorp is arguing that Claim 13, because it does not specify how testing is to be done, patents nothing more than the natural relationship between homocysteine and vitamin B deficiencies, blocking other inventors from developing better tests.

"The present-day implications of such a holding are limitless — and dangerous," LabCorp wrote in its brief. "Anyone who discovers a new medical correlation could stifle medical treatment through a 'test plus correlate' claim."

But Metabolite and its allies argue that such correlations are the basis of diagnostics and that not allowing patents would stifle development of new tests. There are tests, for instance, that look at mutations in particular genes to predict a high risk of breast cancer or to predict which AIDS drugs will not work.

"Hundreds, if not thousands, of patents would at once be called into question" if the ruling goes against Metabolite, said a brief jointly submitted by Perlegen Sciences, a company developing genetic tests, and Mohr Davidow Ventures, a venture capital firm that backs diagnostics companies.

Another question in the case is whether doctors could infringe the patent merely by looking at a test result for homocysteine and then thinking about vitamin deficiency. Indeed, the lower courts said LabCorp had not directly infringed but rather had induced doctors to infringe by performing the correlation.

Partly with that in mind, the American Medical Association, the American Heart Association and AARP have submitted briefs in support of LabCorp, arguing, in the words of the heart association, that the patent could have "devastating effects on patient health care."

Millions of homocysteine tests are done each year because high levels of the amino acid are associated with an increased risk of heart attack, stroke, birth defects and other diseases; people often take B vitamins to lower homocysteine and reduce the risk. (Clinical trial results announced last week, however, suggested that taking B vitamins did not prevent heart attacks.)

Court precedents have held that laws of nature, natural phenomena and abstract ideas cannot be patented. "Einstein could not patent his celebrated law that E = mc2; nor could Newton have patented the law of gravity," the Supreme Court wrote in a 1980 decision. '

But in a 1981 decision in Diamond v. Diehr — the last time the Supreme Court considered the issue — the court upheld a patent on a method of curing rubber that made use of a well-known equation governing chemical reactions. The court said that the equation was only part of a broader invention.

Glenn K. Beaton, an attorney for Metabolite, said that as in that 1981 case, "it's not the correlation itself that is patented here," but rather "the use of that correlation to determine B12 and folate deficiencies."

In recent years, controversial patents have been granted on software and on business methods, such as ways of managing investment portfolios or of allowing people to order merchandise on Amazon.com with one click of a mouse.

Bear Stearns, Lehman Brothers and the Computer and Communications Industry Association filed briefs urging the court to use the LabCorp case to restrict such business method patents, or at least not expand them. Other companies, including American Express and I.B.M., say the LabCorp case is not relevant to business method patents.

The solicitor general, in urging the court not to hear the case, said there was not enough of a record from the lower courts on the question of patenting natural phenomena. That is because LabCorp did not raise that argument in the lower courts, instead trying to get the claim invalidated on other grounds. If LabCorp wins the case in a way that weakens patents on diagnostic tests, it could be one of the bigger losers. The company, based in Burlington, N.C., is counting on high-priced, patented genetic tests to fuel its growth.

Bradford T. Smith, executive vice president for corporate affairs at LabCorp, disputed that. "We think this case can be decided very narrowly," without undermining other patents, many of which rely on more than just correlations, he said.

Innovation And Its Discontents (WSJ)

By Adam Jaffe And Josh Lerner

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

The problems of the U.S. patent system are under discussion today with an urgency not seen in decades. The Supreme Court will soon hear oral arguments in eBay v. MercExchange LLC, which promises to be its most far-reaching examination of patent law in many years. Today the court will also consider LabCorp v. Metabolite Laboratories -- the contested matter is whether a patent can be issued for the correlation between a disease and a naturally occurring substance in the human body. That is: Can you actually patent the laws of nature? And shockingly, Research in Motion has been forced to pay $612 million to prevent all of our BlackBerry handhelds from going dark, even though the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office (USPTO) has indicated that it is likely to find all of the patents behind this ransom demand invalid. Congressional subcommittees, with good reason, have recently held hearings asking fundamental questions about developments like these in the patent system.

The importance of this long-overdue focus on patents cannot be overemphasized. The past decade has seen periodic uproars over particular patents, such as Amazon's "one click" patent for online shopping. The troubling patents have been well publicized, but the wrong lessons have typically been drawn. Commentators have tended to focus on the incompetence of the USPTO in allowing "bad patents." Others have concluded that the patent system is not working with respect to a particular area of technology. Concerns about software awards led, for instance, Jeff Bezos of Amazon to propose a new patent type for software; others have suggested that biotechnology be excluded in various ways from the patent regime.

We believe, instead, that the problems with the patent system are systemic and fundamental, the result of two congressional changes to the patent system. At the time they were described as administrative and procedural rather than substantive; but taken together they have resulted in the most profound changes in U.S. patent policy and practice since 1836. One set of changes has made it easier to enforce patents, easier to get large financial awards from such enforcement, and harder for those accused of infringing patents to challenge the patents' validity; another set of changes has made patents much easier to get. The combination has created a perfect storm: a complex and intensifying combination of factors that increasingly makes the patent system a hindrance rather than a spur to innovation. * * *

Congress set us on this road in 1982 when it created a centralized appellate court for patent cases, the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit. Its decisions -- which advocates argued would simply ensure judicial consistency -- are largely responsible for the significant strengthening of the legal potency of patents. Then, a decade later, Congress turned the USPTO into a "profit center." The office has been pushed to return "excess" revenue to the U.S. Treasury. This shift led to pressures to grant more patents, difficulties in attracting and retaining skilled examiners, and a torrent of low-quality patent grants. These include such absurdities as patents on wristwatches (paw-watches?) for dogs, a method of swinging on a swing ("invented" by a five-year-old), and peanut butter and jelly sandwiches. But they also include the patents on broad ideas related to mobile email -- virtually devoid of any details of implementation -- that have imposed a $612 million tax on the maker and users of BlackBerries.

The combination of making patents easier to get and simultaneously more potent when enforced has led to an explosion in patent litigation. Holders of dubious patents -- be they established firms or "trolls" whose only business is patent enforcement -- routinely threaten firms that sell valuable products with shutdown based on alleged patent infringement. Even if the target firm believes that it does not infringe, or that the patents at the basis of the claim are invalid, the cost and risk of proving this in court may be too high. Innovators may choose simply to drop the allegedly offending product, or to settle and pay ransom rather than fight. This is not a problem confined to any single industry. Even in industries where patents have been traditionally rare, such as financial services, patent filings and litigation are exploding. Financial patents are being litigated at more than 10 times the rate of awards more generally.

It might be tempting to view patent law as just another area where litigation has spun out of control. But there is more at work here than a general increase in litigation; and its effects are particularly worrisome, because a faulty patent system can have profound impact on the overall process of innovation. The hugely successful BlackBerry may be able to bear an enormous "innovation tax" and still succeed, but other valuable but not-quite-blockbuster innovations may be driven from the market entirely.

The continued advancement of commercial technology is the basis for the long-term ability of our society to continuously improve our lives -- to promote health and longevity, protect and clean up the environment, and secure our safety against terrorism and other external threats. For all its deficiencies and periodic stumbles, our free-enterprise system has demonstrated a unique ability to generate new technology: Industrialized economies have increased their economic productivity more in the last two centuries than in all the millennia of previous human history. The basis for this advance is the pursuit of profit, which forces firms to innovate. But the profit-based incentive to innovate depends fundamentally on the institutions governing ownership of the fruits of innovation. Specifically, taking new ideas from the notebook to the market often requires huge investments in research and development. This is an inherently risky process, and risk is the enemy of investment.

The legal protection patents provide is supposed to mitigate the risks of these investments, but the flood of dubious patents that nonetheless have amplified legal force is increasing rather than mitigating the risks associated with investments in innovation. While we have not yet killed the geese that lay the golden eggs, we are increasingly hindering and distracting the people and firms that must breed, feed and care for the geese. If we continue on this course, it is inevitable that their output will decline. * * *

We believe that the incentives of the existing system induce all participants -- inventors, competitors and potential litigators -- to invest in abusing the system rather than innovating. Reform of the system must change these incentives by (1) changing the USPTO review process so that the determination of whether a patent application is really new is made with as much information as practical about what related technology is already out there; and (2) leveling the playing field between litigants so frivolous patent holders cannot intimidate true innovators into paying protection money.

Our proposed reforms start with the recognition that much of the information needed to decide if a given application should be approved is in the hands of competitors of the applicant, rather than the USPTO. A review process with multiple levels efficiently balances the need to bring in outside information with the reality that most patents are unimportant. Multilevel review -- with barriers to invoking review increasing at higher levels, along with the review's thoroughness -- would naturally focus attention on the most potentially important applications. Most patents would never receive anything other than the most basic examinations. But for those applications that really mattered, parties would have an incentive and opportunities to bring information in their possession before the USPTO, and the USPTO would have more resources to help it make the right decision. (Changes in this direction are at the heart of the patent reform bill currently under consideration in the House Subcommittee on Courts, the Internet and Intellectual Property.)

If bad patents with important consequences were weeded out by the USPTO, the incentive to file frivolous applications in the first place would be reduced. This would break the current self-stoking cycle in which inventors are induced to make marginal applications by their likelihood of success, and the resulting flood of applications overwhelms the patent office and makes it harder to separate the wheat from the chaff.

Breaking the vicious cycle of bad examination and bad applications is the key to reform of the patent review process. But there are always going to be mistakes, and so it is important that the court system operate efficiently to rectify those mistakes, while protecting holders of valid patents. Today, the legal playing field is significantly tilted in favor of patentees.

The reliance on jury trials is a critical problem. The evidence in a patent case can be highly technical, and the average juror has little competence to evaluate it. Having decisions made by people who can't really understand the evidence increases the uncertainty surrounding the outcome. The combination of this uncertainty with the legal presumption of validity -- the rule that patents must be presumed legitimate unless proven otherwise -- is a big reason why accused infringers often settle rather than fight even when they think they are right.

The right to a jury of one's peers is a venerated concept in Anglo-American law. But there is ample scope for judges to use pretrial rulings and reports of special "masters" commissioned by the court to resolve more of the most technical issues that determine the outcome of patent litigation. While litigation will always be uncertain, it has to be structured so that complex technical issues are addressed in a way designed to elucidate rather than obscure.

The protection for true innovators created by a workable patent system is vital to technological change and economic growth. The problems in the existing patent system are structural, and the fundamental solutions need to be structural as well. As much as the USPTO needs to do a better job, it can only do so if the system is modified so that all parties have incentives to help with the job, and the courts provide a reliable backstop when mistakes are made.

Kerr-McGee Sues To Dispute Federal Royalties (WSJ)

By Steve Levine

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

Kerr-McGee Corp., at a time of rising political scrutiny of oil-company profits, is suing the federal government to avoid about $108 million in royalties on its deep-water production in the Gulf of Mexico.

The issue of royalty payments on Gulf-of-Mexico oil properties owned by the federal government has attracted much criticism in Congress because of high gasoline prices and record oil-company financial results. Some lawmakers have called for a windfall-profits tax on the industry, though such a levy still appears to be a long shot.

In all, the Interior Department estimates that royalty exemptions in the Gulf of Mexico could cost the U.S. treasury some $7 billion over time, depending on the price of oil and the level of production.

Kerr-McGee, which produces oil and natural gas from 17 deep-water fields in the Gulf, filed suit Friday in federal court in Lake Charles, La. The Oklahoma City company is seeking to overturn a January order by the department's Minerals Management Service division that Kerr-McGee and other oil companies pay more in royalties for the fields. Most oil companies complied with the order, but Kerr-McGee was among three that didn't pay.

The case involves fallout from a 1995 congressional act that, at a time of relatively low oil prices and shrinking U.S. production, attempted to increase oil and natural-gas production from the deep-water sections of the Gulf of Mexico. Water depths there often exceed 2,500 feet, and exploration is expensive and riskier than elsewhere. The congressional act exempted oil companies from royalty payments for millions of barrels of deep-water production for leases obtained from 1996 to 2000 as long as world prices didn't exceed a certain level.

The threshold for those leases last year was $34.71 per barrel for oil and $4.34 per million British thermal units for natural gas. Yesterday in New York, oil futures fell $2.35, or 3.7%, to settle at $60.42 a barrel. Natural-gas futures fell 21.8 cents per million British thermal units, or 3.1%, to $6.835.

But, in addition to a price threshold, Kerr-McGee argues the act allowed the companies royalty-free production of tens of millions of barrels regardless of the price of oil. For example, for fields deeper than about 2,600 feet, the companies could produce 87.5 million barrels of oil without paying a royalty. Kerr-McGee says its fields haven't reached that maximum yet. Meanwhile, the company said it has placed $108 million in disputed royalties into a reserve account until the issue is resolved.

Amerada Hess Corp. said in its annual filing last week with the Securities and Exchange Commission that it is withholding $34 million in royalty payments to the government in a similar dispute.

DOJ_NMG_0019930

Walter Cruickshank, deputy director for the Minerals Management Service, said that the Interior Department believes that the companies are obligated to pay royalties once the price threshold is breached, regardless of how much oil they have produced. He said the department will argue the point in Kerr-McGee's court case.

In congressional testimony this month, Mr. Cruickshank said that, as of January, 28 companies weren't disputing the government's royalties demands, that seven others had either paid in full or part while they disputed the request, and that three others hadn't made any payments.

Another issue that has provoked criticism is a disclosure by Interior Department officials that, for reasons they can't explain, the price threshold was lifted for some 1,100 leases made in 1998 and 1999. That meant that, regardless of prices, oil could be drilled royalty-free in those fields.

Critics in Congress say the absence of the threshold for those years could cost the federal government billions of dollars in lost royalties over time. Critics in a House hearing this month said that there should be no royalty relief when oil prices have risen above $60 a barrel, and the oil companies have faced a storm of objections from editorial writers around the country. For 2005, Kerr-McGee reported net income of $3.2 billion on $5.9 billion in revenue.

U.S. Expects Bird Flu This Year (USAT)

By Anita Manning

USA Today, March 21, 2006

Leaders of three federal agencies on Monday said bird flu could reach the USA this year on the wings of migratory birds, but the appearance of the flu strain "will not constitute a reason for panic," Department of Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said.

"We are closely monitoring the rapid spread of the (bird flu) overseas, and we now believe it is likely we will detect it within our borders in the U.S.," he said. "It is important to understand a detection of this virus in birds does not signal the start of a pandemic in people."

The highly pathogenic H5N1 has spread across Asia, Europe and parts of Africa. It is contagious and deadly to poultry and many species of wild birds, and it has infected at least 177 people, killing 98. The virus can't spread easily in humans, but scientists warn it could mutate into a form that is contagious among people, causing a pandemic. (Graphic:

Interior Secretary Gale Norton said a program to test up to 100,000 wild birds for signs of infection this year will focus on breeding grounds in Alaska and islands in the Pacific where migrating birds from Asia are now heading.

All samples taken from birds that test positive for the H5N1 virus will undergo further testing to determine if the strain is highly pathogenic or a more benign form, known as low pathogenic North American H5N1, which previously has been found in the USA and Canada.

She said officials expect up to 100 probable H5N1 test results may be found this year, and tests to determine whether they're the highly pathogenic form may take up to 10 days.

"During that time, the public will need to understand this is a disease of birds," Norton said.

Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said it's important to prepare but to keep matters in perspective. "At this point, if you're a bird, it's a pandemic. If you're a human being, it is not," he said.

HHS is funding development of vaccines for possible pandemic flu strains and is stockpiling drugs and other medical supplies. The United States expects to have 26 million courses of the anti-viral drug Tamiflu on hand by the end of this year, he said.

But local communities need to make their own pandemic plans, Leavitt said.

"Any community that fails to prepare with the expectation that the federal government will, at the last moment, be able to come to the rescue will be tragically wrong. Not because the federal government lacks will, not because we lack wallet, but because there is no way in which 5,000 different communities can be responded to simultaneously, which is a unique characteristic of a human pandemic."

Meanwhile, the Food and Drug Administration said it will ban the use of Tamiflu and other human anti-flu drugs in poultry. The drugs are not labeled for use in poultry, but veterinarians can legally use them off-label to prevent flu in animals.

World health experts fear overuse of the drugs in animals could encourage the emergence of flu strains that are resistant to the anti-virals, according to the FDA.

U.S. To Increase Testing Of Wild Birds For Avian Flu (WP)

By Rob Stein

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0019931

Federal officials announced plans yesterday to sharply increase testing of wild birds to try to detect the arrival of the deadly avian flu in the United States as early as possible and stanch any outbreaks of disease.

With the virus spreading worldwide, officials predicted it could show up in this country as early as later this year, most likely in wild birds during their annual migration from Asia through Alaska.

"It is increasingly likely that we will detect a highly pathogenic H5N1 strain of avian flu in birds within U.S. borders, possibly as early as this year," Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton said in announcing the plan with Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns and Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt. "We are working together to expand our early-warning system."

The dangerous bird flu virus, known as H5N1, has spread from Asia into parts of Europe and Africa, killing or forcing the destruction of millions of chickens and other birds. So far the virus has mainly affected birds, but it has killed 98 people -- about half of those who have been infected. All the victims had close contact with poultry. Officials fear the virus could mutate in a way that makes it spread easily from person to person, sparking a devastating worldwide pandemic.

U.S. wildlife experts have been monitoring wild migratory birds since the virus emerged in Asia in 1997. They have tested 12,000 in Alaska since 1998 and 4,000 traveling across the Atlantic since 2000. Officials have been focusing on Alaska because it is a crossroad for bird migration. No birds have tested positive.

Under the new plan, officials expect to collect 75,000 to 100,000 samples from live and dead wild birds this year, along with 50,000 samples of water or feces from waterfowl habitats across the United States. Officials also plan to investigate any disease outbreaks in wild birds and do spot checks of birds killed by hunters, as well as those being sold in live bird markets and being raised by farmers. The effort is part of the Bush administration's $29 million plan to protect the country against the virus.

"None of us can build a cage around the United States. We have to be prepared to deal with the virus here," Johanns said.

If an infected bird is detected, officials plan to immediately quarantine the area and kill any infected birds to stem the spread of the virus. In addition to human health concerns, officials worry that the virus could devastate the $29 billion poultry industry.

Officials stressed that they expect perhaps dozens of false alarms because of increased testing, and that even if a genuine case is found it does not necessarily mean an outbreak will occur.

"The detection of highly pathogenic H5N1 virus in the United States would not constitute a reason for panic," the agriculture secretary said.

Bird Flu May Arrive In U.S. This Year (AP-Y2)

By Libby Quaid

AP2, March 21, 2006

Bird flu is likely to arrive this year in the United States, with the increased testing of tens of thousands of wild birds expected to reveal dozens of suspected cases, the Bush administration said Monday.

Officials will test 75,000 to 100,000 wild birds this year, or nearly six times the number screened since 1998, according to a government plan finalized Monday. The government also plans to quarantine and destroy any poultry flocks where the virus appears.

The wild bird testing could reveal 20 to 100 suspected cases of bird flu, although follow-up testing is likely to reveal "dozens" are false alarms, Interior Secretary Gale Norton said. The emphasis will be on Alaska and other spots along the Pacific flyway, a common route that migratory birds follow into the U.S., possibly carrying the virus as they do. Tests will also be run on 50,000 water and bird dropping samples from waterfowl habitats, the government said.

Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt stressed that people are not yet at risk from the virus, which has ravaged wild and domestic birds alike in Asia, Africa and Europe.

"At this point, if you're a bird, it's a pandemic. If you're a human, it's not a pandemic," Leavitt said.

Norton cautioned that while officials plan to announce any positive tests for bird flu, it will take another five to 10 days for the Agriculture Department's laboratory in Ames, Iowa, to confirm the results.

"This is a disease of birds and not humans, at this point. Finding a bird with the disease does not signal a pandemic," Norton said.

Human cases of bird flu have been rare, but scientists fear the virus could mutate into a form easily spread among people, sparking a worldwide epidemic. For now, wild birds are getting much of the government's attention.

Officials also worry the virus might spread from wild birds to the nearly 10 billion chickens raised each year in the U.S. Authorities say cooking kills the virus and it is safe to eat properly handled and cooked poultry.

Commercial poultry companies already test every flock for bird flu. If the deadly virus shows up in a commercial bird, the entire flock would be quarantined and killed, and the area would be disinfected. Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said the government would compensate farmers for their destroyed flocks.

Unlike in many of the countries affected by bird flu, the U.S. has a highly consolidated, $29 billion poultry industry that raises the majority of its birds in controlled, indoor facilities. That minimizes contact between wild and domestic birds.

"Our producers are as eager as we are to protect the safety of our poultry," Johanns said.

While the deadly strain of the virus has not yet been found in the U.S., other strains have. Birds, like humans, have a flu season. Less virulent "low-pathogenic" flu viruses are common. But three times — in 1924, 1983 and 2004 — a lethal, "highly pathogenic" strain has emerged in the U.S.

Also Monday, the government banned veterinarians from using human antiviral drugs, such as Tamiflu, to treat animals. The goal is to ensure the drugs remain effective in people. A spokesman for the National Chicken Council said the industry does not use the drugs.

Interior Secretary Says Bird Flu Due This Year (LAT)

By From Times Wire Reports

Bird flu is likely to arrive this year in the United States, with the increased testing of tens of thousands of wild birds expected to reveal dozens of suspected cases, Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton said.

Business Prepares For The Possibility Of Avian Flu In The United States (NYT)

By Melanie Warner
The New York Times, March 21, 2006

The deadly strain of avian flu has not been found anywhere in the Western Hemisphere, but Mark Holden, a chicken grower for Tyson Foods in Ellijay, Ga., is not taking any chances.

Every seven weeks a group of his chickens is tested before the birds are sent to be slaughtered. All people who enter or leave the chicken houses must walk through disinfecting baths. And visitors and workers must wear plastic booties over their shoes.

"Even though we don't have any outbreak now, we want to take all the precautions we can to protect our product," said Mr. Holden, who has been in the chicken business for 10 years and lives across the street from one of his chicken houses.

Poultry producers and restaurants doubt that their chickens will be infected by avian flu or that people would catch the virus even if there were contamination. But they are concerned that if the virus gets to the United States, people will eat less chicken, simply out of fear. And they are revving up big plans to be prepared.

In Senate testimony earlier this month, Michael Leavitt, secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services, declared that it was "just a matter of time" before birds infected with the virus found their way to the United States.

The stakes are enormous. United States poultry producers like Tyson, Pilgrim's Pride and Gold Kist sell 26 billion pounds of chicken each year. Restaurant chains — chief among them McDonald's, KFC and Wendy's — sell 45 percent of that.

Sales of chicken are growing. Over the last 10 years, consumption of chicken has increased by 22 percent, while beef consumption has remained flat, according to the Department of Agriculture.

If Europe and Asia are any indication, chicken sales could take quite a hit. In February, after avian flu was discovered in wild swans, poultry consumption declined 70 percent in Italy. In France, sales are down 30 percent since avian flu hit a turkey farm last month. In some areas of India, sales are down 40 percent since last month's discovery of avian flu in chickens.

These declines came even though none of the 175 human cases of avian flu confirmed by the World Health Organization since 2003 resulted from eating poultry.

Dick Thompson, a spokesman for the World Health Organization, said most of the cases of humans contracting avian flu have been from people coming into direct contact with infected poultry, though one case in Vietnam appears to have been a result of someone drinking infected duck blood.

Public health officials consider it unlikely that people will catch the virus from eating chicken. Chicken producers say that any sick birds would immediately be destroyed and would not enter the market. While the deadly strain of avian flu, called H5N1, now hitting Europe and Asia can reside in poultry meat, the virus is killed by the temperatures normally used to cook poultry.

Nonetheless, a Harvard School of Public Health nationwide telephone survey of 1,043 adults in January found that 46 percent of respondents who eat chicken said they would stop eating it if avian flu hit the United States poultry industry.

In October, Yum Brands, which owns KFC, told investors that, based on its experiences with avian flu in China, it estimated that in the worst situation, chicken sales would drop 10 percent to 20 percent if there were widespread concerns about avian flu.

Chicken processors and restaurant chains are already working feverishly to minimize any sales declines. Companies are working on communications strategies that can be set into motion at a moment's notice. These plans deal with avian flu in birds and not the feared hypothetical mutation of the virus into a human-to-human form. Future mutations could make avian flu contagious among humans, and possibly generate a pandemic.

Tyson, Pilgrim's Pride, KFC, Chick-fil-A and Popeyes Chicken and Biscuits all say they have formed internal avian flu task forces that meet regularly and include top executives and leaders from different departments. These executives have been meeting with government health officials, discussing what information should go on the companies' Web sites and when, and devising sales loss projections.

Popeyes Chicken and Biscuits, the country's No. 3 chicken chain behind KFC and Chick-fil-A, said its task force met weekly, often in conjunction with the Ledlie Group, an Atlanta-based crisis management agency. KFC said that it had created TV and print ads aimed at convincing people that eating fully cooked chicken was safe. The ad campaign, which was produced by Creative Alliance, an agency in Louisville, Ky., where Yum Brands is based, is ready to go if a crisis strikes.

"It's on the shelf collecting dust," said Jonathan Blum, a Yum spokesman.

Tyson, the country's largest chicken producer, is working on an ad campaign that will run if chicken sales decline, or if consumers start to get nervous.

McDonald's, the country's largest restaurant buyer of chicken, said it had been working on avian flu contingency plans, but declined to discuss details.

At many chain restaurants, including McDonald's, chicken has helped bolster sales more than any other menu item. In presentations to analysts and investors, McDonald's has credited its new line of higher-priced premium chicken sandwiches and its chicken-topped premium salads with increasing sales at outlets in the United States that have been open for more than a year.

Arby's, which is known for its roast beef sandwiches but gets 15 percent of its sales from chicken products, said it was spending more money than it had for any other new product to promote its new line of so-called chicken naturals. Chicken naturals are all chicken, with no added water or chemicals.

Some analysts think avian flu in birds, like mad cow disease in beef, may turn out to be a nonissue for consumers. Since mad cow was first discovered in the United States in late 2003, beef consumption has remained constant, according to the National Cattlemen's Beef Association.

"In the U.S. I think we generally have a greater trust in the government to ensure food safety than they do in Europe and Asia," said John Glass, an analyst at CIBC World Markets. "I'd be surprised if U.S. consumers really react to this."

But some in the chicken industry worry that avian flu will be much more frightening to consumers than mad cow. "I get asked about it all the time," said Steve Gold, vice president for marketing at Murray's Chicken, a producer of humanely raised chicken. "I think people have this idea that it's going to be like Alfred Hitchcock with all these birds flying into their community and everyone getting sick."

Mr. Gold notes that unlike mad cow, avian flu is highly contagious among birds and has the potential to travel long distances in unpredictable patterns.

He and others in the chicken industry are busy honing a message that the nation's chicken populations are well protected from wild, migratory birds that may be the initial carriers of the disease.

A Web site set up by the National Chicken Council, the National Turkey Federation and the Egg Safety Center (www.avianinfluenzainfo.com) promotes the industry's modern system of enclosed, confined chicken growing as an effective line of defense against the spread of avian flu.

The 20,000 to 24,000 birds that reside in a single growing house on the average industrial chicken farm lack access to the outdoors, or even to sunlight — something that has long drawn criticism from animal welfare activists and has helped fuel the growth in free-range and humanely produced chicken. The virtue of isolating chickens, said Richard Lobb, a spokesman for the National Chicken Council, is that no chicken is likely to come into contact with wild birds that may be infected.

"Things here are not like they are in Asia where chickens are running around outdoors in people's backyards," Mr. Lobb said. "It's much more controlled."

He added that while thousands of free-roaming and backyard chickens were infected in Thailand in 2004, none of the country's large-scale, commercial chicken flocks in enclosed facilities were hit.

DOJ_NMG_0019934

Mr. Lobb said chickens sold as free-range or organic, meaning they are allowed access to the outdoors, may be more susceptible to avian flu transmission, but this group represents less than 1 percent of the chicken production.

The Egg Safety Center said that consumers should not worry about eggs being infected with the avian flu virus because sick hens either stop laying eggs or lay poor-quality eggs that would not be acceptable for sale.

Some government officials said that if avian flu arrived on United States shores, it would probably be from migratory birds.

Susan Haseltine, assistant director for biology at the United States Geological Survey and an expert on bird migration, said government scientists had their eyes on the bird pathways from Asia to Alaska. "One species with high potential is the pintail," Ms. Haseltine said. "It migrates from Alaska to the southern U.S., to the Gulf Coast and Southern California. They have the ability to fly long distances."

The Department of Agriculture said that since 2000, 12,000 tests had been done on birds in western Alaska and none had been found with the deadly version of avian flu. Ms. Haseltine said there was little bird passage across the Atlantic from Europe.

Other experts say that avian flu is more likely to reach the United States through the illicit trade of poultry from infected countries. Importing birds or poultry meat from countries that have had outbreaks of avian flu is banned, but Rob Fergus, science coordinator for the National Audubon Society, said there were probably instances of smuggled products. "There are a lot of holes in biosecurity in our ports. I'm much more concerned about poultry shipments than wild birds," he said.

There is, of course, still the small chance that North America may be somehow spared from avian flu. But companies like Chick-fil-A are not counting on that. "The question is not if, but when," said Don Perry, a spokesman for Chick-fil-A. "You can't put big nets in the sky to prevent birds from flying here."

FDA To Ban Poultry Use Of 2 Drug Types On Flu Fears (WSJ)

By Jane Zhang

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON – Federal regulators, amid concern of a possible avian-flu pandemic, moved to ban the poultry industry from using two groups of human antiviral drugs to treat their flocks, for fear that may reduce their effectiveness in humans.

The Food and Drug Administration said beginning this summer, it is proposing to ban veterinarians from prescribing off-label, nonhuman uses of Roche Holding AG's Tamiflu and GlaxoSmithKline PLC's Relenza; amantadine (used in generics such as Symmetrel by Endo Pharmaceuticals Holdings Inc.) and rimantadine (used in Flumadine, by Forest Laboratories Inc.). The U.S. has been stockpiling drugs for a possible avian-flu outbreak in humans.

Not one of those drugs is approved for animal treatment, but under a 1994 law, the FDA allows such use. The FDA has the right to ban them if they cause public-health concerns. This is the first time that the FDA has banned human antiviral drugs for animal use.

The FDA and the U.S. poultry industry say these drugs haven't been used in poultry here yet. They are often more expensive than the cost of the birds they would treat. China used one of the drugs last year to treat flocks; this caused resistance to the drug by an avian-influenza strain, said Stephen Sundlof, director of the FDA's Center for Veterinary Medicine. International agencies, such as the World Health Organization and the Food and Agriculture Organization, have called for the ban to prevent the development of resistant strains.

Dr. Sundlof called the move a precautionary measure. He expects the proposal, which is open to public comment until May 22, will become a final rule June 30.

PREVENTING A PANDEMIC

The announcement follows the agency's decision last year to ban an antibiotic used in chickens and turkeys, citing evidence that the antibiotic's use might lead to pathogens that could withstand drugs used to fight human illness. The agency's reasoning for yesterday's move on antiviral drugs sprang from similar concerns about resistant strains. Because influenza viruses mutate, resistance to antiviral drugs can leave fewer treatment choices.

The FDA ban is part of a White House campaign to convince the public that it is preparing for the deadly Asian strain of H5N1, which several officials have said could arrive in Asian birds migrating to Alaska. Finding the Asian strain of H5N1 in wild U.S. birds is "increasingly likely," said Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton.

The U.S. has an "early warning system" to test as many as 100,000 wild birds this year in Alaska and the Pacific Coast flyway, believed to be where the avian flu might show up in the U.S. first, given migratory patterns.

The Agriculture Department allows the poultry industry to use vaccine to treat some viral-respiratory diseases, but the industry doesn't use human antiviral drugs to treat influenza in poultry, said Richard Lobb, spokesman for the National Chicken

Council, a Washington trade group. The chicken industry has vowed to test all flocks for avian flu before sending them to the market, and destroy those infected with some strains, Mr. Lobb said.

Terence Hurley, a Roche spokesman, says the Swiss drug maker has heard of isolated cases of Tamiflu being used in cats and dogs, but not in poultry. "Tamiflu is approved for use in people, not animals."

Michael Fleming, a GlaxoSmithKline spokesman, says the United Kingdom company hasn't studied the impact of Relenza, an inhaled product, on animals. Both companies say they support the FDA decision.

Forest Laboratories and Endo Pharmaceuticals Holdings declined to comment.

Scientists Oppose Move On Grizzlies (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

HELENA, Mont., March 20 — A group of 269 biologists and other scientists from around the country asked the Fish and Wildlife Service on Monday not to lift the protections given to the Yellowstone grizzly bear by the Endangered Species Act.

Doing that, they said, could jeopardize its survival.

A letter from the scientists came on the last day of the comment period on the agency's plan to remove protection for the bear. The service has said that the bear population, estimated at 500 to 600, is fully recovered and growing at 4 percent a year. There are safeguards to restore protection, federal biologists say, if the numbers decline.

Some environmental groups, including the National Wildlife Federation, support the move to remove the bear from the endangered list.

The letter from opponents of the move says the Yellowstone grizzly is cut off from other bears, and therefore new sources of DNA. Because of that, the population needs to be 2,000 to 3,000, the scientists say, to survive a catastrophic event, like disease or the loss of a critical food source.

Conservationists Vie To Buy Forest Habitat (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

FORT BRAGG, Calif. -- The Big River tract in California's Mendocino County is a sprawling expanse of towering redwoods and Douglas firs, woods that for years have provided an ideal habitat for rare spotted owls and endangered coho salmon and steelhead trout. Now, it's all up for sale.

Big River, neighboring Salmon Creek and dozens of other forests across the nation have come on the market in recent years as timber companies shed holdings that are worth more as real estate than as a source of lumber. The trend has spurred a land rush that has conservation groups scrambling to raise money to buy environmentally sensitive tracts in competition with private investors seeking to snap up the land for development.

A recent U.S. Forest Service study predicted that more than 44 million acres of private forest land, an area twice the size of Maine, will be sold over the next 25 years. The consulting firm U.S. Forest Capital estimates that half of all U.S. timberland has changed hands in the past decade. The Bush administration also wants to sell off forest land, by auctioning more than 300,000 acres of national forest to fund a rural school program.

"The nation has never seen anything like this," said Conservation Fund President Lawrence A. Selzer, whose 20-year-old group is hoping to raise $48 million in the coming months to buy the 16,000 acres that make up Big River and Salmon Creek. "It has the potential to permanently and profoundly change the landscape of America."

The United States still has large swaths of forest -- much of it private -- that provide critical habitat for large animals such as bears and cougars as well as recreational opportunities for the public. But if the selling spree continues, environmentalists fear, these areas could be cut up into much smaller parcels in which condominiums and trailer parks would replace soaring trees.

The sales have attracted limited national attention because they are mostly private transactions and involve local planning decisions, but the stakes are enormous. In the Pacific Northwest, New England, Southeast and parts of the upper Midwest, traditional timber companies or newly emerging timber investment management organizations, known as TIMOs, own vast stretches of forest that rival the national forest system.

Today, a third of the U.S. land mass is forest -- the same proportion as in 1907 but just 71 percent of what existed before settlement by Europeans -- and 57 percent of it is privately owned. But competition from cheap imported lumber, soaring land prices and pressure from Wall Street are now prompting timber companies to sell.

Stephen Levesque, the Campbell Timberland Management area manager who oversees the company's forest holdings in Mendocino, said new state regulations have made lumber operations increasingly expensive and developers have come by with tempting offers. The company recently sold off 160 acres that are likely to become lots for residential homes. "There's tremendous pressure for development," Levesque said.

International Paper Co. spokeswoman Amy J. Sawyer said her company is "contemplating selling some or all" of its 6.8 million acres of forest land scattered across the country and focusing on producing more profitable products such as uncoated papers and packages.

"We're exploring whether there's more value in holding and operating the land or in selling it," Sawyer said. "That's what we're weighing."

And the St. Joe Co., a onetime timber and paper outfit, is pushing to build on tens of thousands of its acres on Florida's Emerald Coast. Advocacy groups such as the Natural Resources Defense Council are fighting to preserve the land, whose longleaf pine forests, cypress swamps and wetlands sustain red cockaded woodpeckers and dozens of other endangered and threatened species.

Environmental groups such as the Conservation Fund, the Nature Conservancy and the New England Forest Foundation have tried to limit the environmental impact of the sell-off by purchasing habitats that hold the greatest ecological value, but they cannot afford to buy all the vast expanses and halt this trend outright.

Chris Larson, executive director of Northern California's Mattole Restoration Council, an environmental group, said groups such as his are analyzing the Securities and Exchange Commission filings of timber companies to gauge whether they might sell their holdings to ease their debt. "People are just learning how to do this," he said.

In several instances, they have been able to close a deal. In 2004, the Conservation Fund bought 24,000 acres of working forest along the Garcia River in Mendocino County from Hawthorne Timber Co. for $18 million. It plans to begin logging some trees there this summer to make enough money to pay property taxes and restore key ecological areas.

Now the fund is hoping to buy the Big River and Salmon Creek tracts from Hawthorne and to create a business model other environmental groups can follow.

"We need to move away from this black-or-white idea that either it's preserved or destroyed, it's a national park or not enough," said Chris Kelly, who heads the fund's California office. "If you're trying to protect a landscape, if you're trying to protect 300,000 acres, it's impractical" to preserve the entire area as pristine wilderness, Kelly said.

In November, the Conservation Fund bought nearly 7,700 acres of the most sensitive lands along the headwaters of Maine's Machias River. A month later, it bought 1,600 acres of land in Georgia, just a fraction of the roughly 300,000 acres timber giant Weyerhaeuser recently sold in the state. Fund officials resold the tract to state officials, who plan to turn the area into a nature preserve.

Rex R. Boner, a vice president at the fund, said his and other environmental groups would like to buy more land but "we just don't have the collective ability to do that."

The forest sales have sparked a sense of urgency among conservationists because the holdings constitute much of the remaining intact ecosystems outside of public lands, he said: "It's sort of like Humpty Dumpty. If they're sold, we'll never get them back together again."

Like Georgia, Maine reveals both the promise and the pitfalls of the forest land rush. Maine has the largest contiguous block of undeveloped forest east of the Mississippi -- at least 10 million acres, or more than half of the state's entire land mass. Most of it was once owned by paper companies, but this is shifting quickly. According to the Massachusetts-based Manomet Center for Conservation Sciences, 20 million acres changed hands in Maine's North Woods, north of Bangor, between 1980 and 2000.

In several cases, conservationists, working with local communities and business owners, have been able to stem development's tide. Jeff McEvoy owns Weatherby's lodge in Grand Lake Stream, a town on the edge of Maine's North Woods. When Typhoon LLC, a timber investment company, wanted to sell off 339,000 acres in the region, the New England Forestry Foundation raised $30 million along with locals, enough to buy the development rights and create a 27,000-acre working forest that is logged but supports wildlife.

"People come here for the pristine wilderness experience," said McEvoy, who runs hunting and fishing trips out of a lodge that has thrived for 130 years.

In the nearby town of Greenville, however, a real estate investment trust called Plum Creek Timber Co. has been buying and converting forests into residential and vacation homes. Last year, it proposed turning a stretch of forest into two resorts and nearly 1,000 private lots. Maine's Land Use Regulatory Commission initially rejected the application, and in the coming weeks the company is expected to submit a more environmentally friendly proposal.

In Big River, however, timber companies and conservationists have been able to make common cause. Levesque and his bosses at Campbell Timberland Management would prefer to sell some of their forest to the Conservation Fund so the community can keep its logging jobs and wildlife can continue to thrive. A fisheries biologist with a master's degree in forest hydrology and engineering, Levesque is as enamored of Big Creek as the environmentalists hoping to buy it.

"These are special places," he said, looking up at the redwoods standing by the river's edge. "It's kind of an ecologist's dream."

Slapping King Coal's Wrist (NYT)

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

The Bush administration's accommodation of the mining industry — notably by packing the mine safety agencies with pro-management appointees — has produced a marked decline in major fines for negligent companies. A recent data analysis by The Times documented a risky, business-friendly downturn in penalties since 2001. At the same time, nearly half of the announced fines still go uncollected.

With a rash of 24 mine deaths so far this year, Congress is considering tougher fines of up to $500,000 for culpable companies. But what good are fines if they are not being forcefully used by the federal agencies supposedly responsible for workers' safety? This question must be asked in deadly earnest in the case of the Sago Mine in West Virginia, where a dozen miners perished in January. The company was later found to have been cited for 273 violations in two years' time, not one of them costing more than $460.

Under present practices, fines are rarely levied at the maximum level, and even then companies can negotiate the penalties downward through an industry-friendly appeals process. Fines as low as $60, if collected, amount to jaywalking tickets.

Beyond the slump in fines, the administration's record has been distinguished by budget and job cuts in critical mine safety agencies. Lately, there's been a flurry of reform proposals in response to the deaths in the headlines. But an administration that prefers to fill key regulatory positions with mining lobbyists and executives has a long way to go toward miner safety. It should begin with an urgent reversal of its embarrassing record on penalizing flagrantly negligent companies.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

2 Cos. In FBI Computer Team Cited In Audit (WP/AP)

By MARK SHERMAN, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Two companies that will share in a new FBI computer contract were singled out in a government audit Monday that questioned $17 million in the agency's computer overhaul.

The FBI and its contractors share the blame for $10 million in questionable costs and for 1,205 pieces of missing computer equipment valued at $7.6 million, the Government Accountability Office said in its review of the FBI's Trilogy program.

Two of those companies, CACI and Computer Sciences Corp., are part of the Lockheed Martin Corp. team that last week won a six-year, $305 million contract to build and run the FBI's Sentinel computerized case management system. The total value of the Sentinel project is $425 million.

FBI officials said they were applying the lessons learned in the Trilogy computer upgrade, including keeping tighter reins on their contractors. Sentinel is the replacement for the failed project that was to have been the final piece of Trilogy.

The questionable costs included first-class air travel for government contractors, excessive overtime and $5.5 million in charges that lacked substantiation, the report by Congress' investigative and audit agency said.

The FBI was "highly vulnerable to payments of unallowable costs" because of lax oversight, auditors said.

El Segundo, Calif.-based Computer Sciences, or CSC, was the principal contractor in the effort to put in place a high-speed, secure computer network and 30,000 new desktop computers for the FBI. CACI of Arlington, Va., essentially reported to CSC.

Auditors identified a $456,211 invoice from CACI for which CSC never received sufficient evidence, but paid anyway. "It's not what we asked for but at this point it doesn't really matter. Approve it," one CSC employee wrote another in an e-mail exchange that was included in the GAO report.

In another bill from CSC to the FBI, all but $44,000 of a $1.95 million invoice was listed as "other direct costs" with no additional explanation provided.

Auditors also identified as excessive the $52,000 CACI spent on 60,000 pens that were custom-made for FBI computer training sessions.

DOJ_NMG_0019938

CSC spokesman Chuck Taylor said his company complied with its contract, using first-class travel only to accommodate last-minute schedule changes when lower fares were not available. CSC's billings were within approved limits, Taylor said. CACI did not immediately comment Monday.

A separate report last week from Justice Department inspector general Glenn A. Fine warned that costs could again get out of hand unless the FBI puts strong controls in place. Bureau officials have said they are doing just that.

"The lessons learned from the Trilogy program are guiding us, and the FBI continues to strengthen our internal controls," said FBI spokeswoman Cathy Milhoan.

The CSC unit that worked on Trilogy will not be part of the Sentinel project, Milhoan said. CACI will provide training for new system, as it did for Trilogy, she said.

The FBI has since accounted for more than 1,000 of the missing desktop and laptop computers, printers and servers, she said. The bureau also will seek repayment of inappropriate charges identified by a final audit of Trilogy that has yet to be finished, Milhoan said.

ATF Team To Target Atlanta's Violence (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 21, 2006

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales yesterday said Atlanta would become the 23rd U.S. city assigned a federal Violent Crime Impact Team in an aggressive effort to make that city safer.

"The citizens of the city of Atlanta deserve to live free from violent crime," Mr. Gonzales said in announcing the law-enforcement initiative during a press conference at the U.S. attorney's office in Atlanta. "VCIT will help make Atlanta safer through a coordinated campaign to investigate and prosecute those individuals who threaten our communities with guns and violence."

Washington, Baltimore and Richmond are among the other cities participating in the VCIT program.

The VCIT teams, led by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, consist of ATF agents, U.S. marshals, Drug Enforcement Administration agents and federal prosecutors who partner with state and local law-enforcement officers and prosecutors to proactively and aggressively identify, arrest and prosecute those responsible for firearms-related offenses and other violent crimes.

"Make no mistake about it; Violent Crime Impact Teams have saved lives by getting armed criminals off the streets," said ATF Director Carl J. Truscott.

Mr. Truscott said the teams use technology and human intelligence to identify geographic areas within cities with violent firearms crime; identify the "worst" violent offenders, the criminal organizations that support them and armed career criminals; and use criminal investigations and investigative tools and resources to disrupt and dismantle criminal activity being perpetrated by the targeted persons and organizations.

He said they also arrest and prosecute those persons and their associates in the federal or state jurisdiction that lends itself to the maximum penalty; work with community leaders to cultivate solid and sustained commitment between the community's residents and law enforcement; and evaluate results on a regular monthly basis to assess VCIT progress toward achieving the initiative's goals.

Since its inception in June 2004, Mr. Truscott said, the teams have made 8,892 arrests and recovered 8,485 firearms in the areas where VCIT is deployed -- working in conjunction with Project Safe Neighborhoods (PSN), a strategy geared toward combating gun crime in communities across the country.

VCIT builds on the success of PSN, he said, by adding additional resources to lower the number of homicides and other violent firearms-related crimes in targeted areas.

Other VCIT teams are in Albuquerque, N.M.; Baton Rouge, La.; Camden, N.J.; Columbus, Ohio; Fresno, Calif.; Greensboro, N.C.; Hartford, Conn.; Houston and Laredo, Texas; Las Vegas; Los Angeles; Miami; Minneapolis; New Orleans; Philadelphia; Pittsburgh; Tampa, Fla.; Tucson, Ariz.; and Tulsa, Okla.

U.S. Attorney General Targets Violent Crime, Meth In Georgia (AP)

By Doug Gross

AP, March 21, 2006

WALESKA, Ga. - Anti-methamphetamine laws like the ones passed in Georgia are tamping down the domestic production of the deadly drug, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Monday.

But Gonzales said an increase in the amount of meth being smuggled into the country from Mexico threatens to offset those advances.

DOJ_NMG_0019939

Gonzales joined Gov. Sonny Perdue at a town-hall meeting of law enforcement officials, community activists and others on what they called the methamphetamine crisis in the state.

"Meth threatens to turn the American dream into the American nightmare - not just for the users, but for their families ... and their communities," Gonzales said.

The event was held at Reinhardt College in north Georgia's Cherokee County, where there were 490 meth-related arrests and more than $300,000 worth of the drug confiscated by authorities last year, according to Perdue.

The governor highlighted anti-meth measures taken by Georgia's Legislature over the past few years, such as requiring the drug's key ingredients to be moved behind the counter of stores that sell them and making it a felony to cook meth in the presence of a child.

Perdue has requested $1 million in this year's state budget for a new Georgia Bureau of Investigation meth task force and another million for treatment of people addicted to meth.

"We're seeing the spread of meth labs slow down," Perdue said. "We haven't solved this meth crisis by any means, but we are seeing some positive trends."

Gonzales said some of Georgia's laws were mirrored in the federal Combat Meth Act passed recently by Congress.

But he said federal authorities also have tracked an increase in meth production and distribution by organizations based in Mexico. Gonzales said he has planned a May summit with Mexican officials in Dallas to discuss the trend.

Earlier Monday, Gonzales was in Atlanta to announce the launch of a federal initiative to target violent crime in the worst parts of the city.

The Violent Crime Impact Teams initiative is operating in a total of 23 cities across the country, including Philadelphia, Baltimore, Tampa, New Orleans and Los Angeles.

Several federal agencies, including the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the local U.S. Attorney's Office, will work with local law enforcement agencies on the initiative, which will operate around the city "on any given day, at any given time and in different capacities," said Vanessa McLemore, special agent in charge of the Atlanta Field Division of ATF.

They will use firearms dealer inspection data, gang intelligence information, police call response data and other information to identify crime "hot spots," and the peak times for enforcement actions.

Federal officials declined to identify the "hot spots" they will target in Atlanta.

Mexico Called Key To Stopping Meth Imports Perdue Says State Needs To Network To Be Effective (AJC)

By Clint Williams, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, March 21, 2006

Much of Georgia's methamphetamine problem starts in Mexico, Gov. Sonny Perdue said Monday, making a good working relationship with federal and foreign authorities increasingly important.

To stress the need for help in combating the highly addictive drug, the governor appeared with U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at a meeting at Reinhardt College in Cherokee County.

About 200 people made up the invitation-only group of law enforcement officials, prosecutors, drug rehabilitation professionals and elected officials.

While the number of meth labs in Georgia has declined, Perdue said, "importation of high-grade crystal meth is increasing."

Metro Atlanta has become a hub for eastern U.S. distribution of the drug being manufactured at large clandestine labs in Mexico and in the Western United States, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

Stemming the flow of the drug, known as "ice," will take international cooperation, Gonzales said Monday afternoon, noting that he is to meet with the Mexican attorney general in Dallas in May. The United States is training Mexican officials on how to deal with the cleanup of toxic meth labs and other issues, Gonzales said.

Perdue said it's critical that people become more aware of how destructive meth — a cheap, powerful stimulant — can be. "Meth is deadly to make and deadly to take," the gorvernor declared. "Meth is bad stuff."

Education is a key component in the battle against meth use, Perdue said, adding, "We are probably behind the curve on the education and awareness we need to provide."

Perdue has asked the Legislature to approve a little more than $1 million to fund a 15-member task force in the Georgia Bureau of Investigation. His budget also recommends $1 million more to expand meth treatment programs.

Ex-officer Charged With Drug Possession (BRA)

By PENNY BROWN ROBERTS, Advocate staff writer

Baton Rouge Advocate, March 21, 2006

A former Baton Rouge police officer who once went to jail for selling items from the evidence room now faces more prison time after federal agents allegedly found 6 kilograms of cocaine in a trash can in his garage.

Daryl W. Davis, 38, 18030 Manning Drive, Prairieville, was charged Monday in a criminal complaint with one count of cocaine possession and one count of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon.

He is being held in the West Baton Rouge Parish Prison.

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration has been investigating Davis — who spent 13 years on the Baton Rouge police force — for nearly a year, Assistant Special Agent in Charge Kevin Harrison said Monday.

In an affidavit, DEA Special Agent Mark Lusco writes that investigators believed Davis was "obtaining multikilograms of cocaine from Houston, Texas, and distributing them in the Baton Rouge area."

On Friday, two confidential informants told agents that Davis was about to get "multikilogram" quantities of cocaine, Lusco writes in the affidavit.

Agents began watching Davis that day and stopped him after he made a U-turn "to avoid numerous marked police vehicles with their emergency lights activated," the affidavit says. He reportedly gave them permission to search his vehicle and his Prairieville home.

There, according to Lusco, agents seized the 6 kilograms of cocaine from the garbage can. On Davis' property, they also found a loaded .38-caliber revolver, ammunition, an electric money counter and money packaging materials, Lusco's affidavit says.

Before Davis was arrested, Lusco claims in the affidavit, the former officer admitted to cocaine trafficking but said the gun belonged to his live-in girlfriend.

Davis — who joined the Baton Rouge Police force in 1986 — previously was arrested in July of 1999. He was accused of stealing a cell phone cloning device from the evidence room and selling it for $1,000 to the man from whom police seized it.

He also allegedly helped an evidence room student worker and her boyfriend steal a gun that was evidence in a related case.

The Police Department fired Davis two weeks later when he refused to answer questions posed by Internal Affairs investigators.

Davis was convicted in a bench trial of one count of obstruction of justice and one count of public bribery and sentenced to five years in prison in February 2001. His parole ended last month.

At the time he was sentenced, state District Judge Bonnie Jackson said testimony during the trial suggested Davis was involved in drug activity.

Davis made an initial appearance Monday before U.S. Magistrate Docia Dalby, who appointed a public defender to represent him.

A detention hearing is scheduled for March 27.

Police Testify In Hearing For Drug Suspect (ASPNEWS)

By Troy Hooper, Aspen Daily News Staff Writer

Aspen (CO) News, March 21, 2006

A Little Annie's Eating House employee was bound over for trial Monday after the prosecution portrayed him as a chief trafficker of a local cocaine network.

Seated between defense attorney Arnold Mordkin and an English-to-Spanish interpreter, Fernando Leal-Ruiz quietly listened as law-enforcement officers at his preliminary hearing testified that during a Dec. 2 drug raid they saw him reaching in the direction of a plastic bag that was later determined to contain 44 bindles of cocaine.

An undercover agent from the Drug Enforcement Administration also testified that Leal-Ruiz might have been the supplier of two eightballs of cocaine he purchased in the alley behind Cooper Street Pier and the agent described seeing the defendant repeatedly engage in suspicious activities.

Monday's hearing was the latest courtroom development concerning the December drug raids of two downtown restaurants in an operation coordinated by local, state and federal authorities. The raids drew both criticism and praise, and resulted in a town meeting that focused on the city's drug enforcement policy, which ultimately was left unchanged.

Meanwhile, Mordkin poked holes in police testimony -- a key portion of which was hearsay, which is admissible in preliminary hearings but not in criminal trials -- and pointed out that the evidence presented was entirely circumstantial.

"I realize you don't have to have enough evidence to convict (in a preliminary hearing) but I don't believe there is any evidence at all," said Mordkin, arguing that deputy prosecutor Gail Nichols' position was speculative.

Judge James Boyd ruled that in viewing the evidence in a light most favorable to the prosecution, which is required in a preliminary hearing, there was enough "circumstantial evidence that not only he knew (the bag of cocaine) was there but also that he was in control of it."

During the hearing, DEA agent Dave Storm described how he met a man later identified as Jaime Gamez Acuma at Cooper Street Pier last fall. The agent said he asked Acuma for one-eighth of an ounce of cocaine -- a quantity known on the street as an "eightball" -- on at least two occasions and both times he observed Acuma go into the alley behind Cooper Street Pier, enter the back kitchen door of Little Annie's and return with white powder that a DEA laboratory in San Francisco later determined was cocaine. Storm said he paid $160 for each eightball.

"There was a lot of activity in the alleyway; specifically, a lot of people coming out the backdoor (without food). For an established business to have so many patrons walking in and out of the backdoor became suspicious to us," he said.

Storm testified he purchased the drugs through Acuma, a suspected middleman in the operation, but he never saw Leal-Ruiz directly involved in the transaction. The agent said he did see Leal-Ruiz shake hands with a number of persons and lean into the windows of several vehicles that pulled up in the alley that Cooper Street and Little Annie's shared. In his ruling, Judge Boyd noted Storm's back-alley observations are both consistent with drug dealing and "innocent activity."

Detective Chris Womack, who led the charge into Little Annie's, said when he entered the kitchen on the afternoon of the raids he ordered the only two men in the kitchen, Leal-Ruiz and the head chef, Tom Woodson, to lay stomach-down on the ground. Womack said he and his team discovered 44 blue-colored bindles, which are folded pieces of paper used to carry cocaine, behind some shoes on a shelf that held a box of yams in a storage room where Leal-Ruiz was lying prone. Another 20 yellow-colored bindles were found on the other side of the kitchen near an opening where servers pick up plates of food to deliver to restaurant patrons.

Womack also testified that he spoke with Aspen police officer James Crowley who told him that Martha Byrum, a woman with a history of drug problems, informed him that she bought cocaine at Little Annie's.

Womack said that Crowley told him that Byrum would call up the restaurant and ask for a kitchen worker named "Fernando" and if he was working, she would go to Little Annie's and buy drugs. She identified Leal-Ruiz in a photograph the DEA took as someone who sold her cocaine, according to Womack, although she said sometimes she only dealt with other persons in the kitchen who sold her cocaine - testimony Nichols admitted was flimsy but nonetheless supportive of the conspiracy charge against Leal-Ruiz.

In a brief appearance on the witness stand, an Immigration and Customs Enforcement officer said he saw Leal-Ruiz reaching in the direction of the drugs when he, Womack and either three or four other officers stormed into the kitchen. The ICE officer said he could not see what was in the bag that Leal-Ruiz was reaching for because it was opaque. Mordkin argued that photographs depicting the plastic bag that held the 44 bindles was not opaque but actually transparent.

The next court hearing for Leal-Ruiz is scheduled for April 17.

So far, four of the 10 cases connected to the Dec. 2 raids have been resolved. One of the cases was dismissed and three other men pleaded guilty to felony possession of cocaine. They received sentences of two years' probation.

In other court news:

* Judge Boyd issued an arrest warrant for Basalt resident Karen Kinkaid, who failed to show up to court Monday. Her attorney, Lawson Wills, couldn't provide an explanation on why she didn't show up. The judge said that her previous bond would be forfeited and he set a new bond of $20,000 for a 2005 case involving accusations of illegal-drug possession and he set a $13,500 bond for a new case this year in which Kinkaid is accused of aggravated motor vehicle theft and forgery.

* Andre Jesus Lozano -- who was convicted of stealing credit card numbers from Aspen Valley Hospital, where he worked, to purchase cookie dough, balloons and other items - was sentenced to three years in state prison. He has six previous theft-related convictions, according to Nichols. Brad Osborn, director of the Right Door, said he has been working with Lozano because his stealing problems are a compulsive addiction similar to those experienced by drug addicts. Osborn spoke optimistically about Lozano and recommended the judge allow him to continue counseling. Lozano cried as he admitted acting "greedy" and "selfish" and said he has been feeling emotionally stronger since taking prescribed medication and working with Osborn and another local doctor. "Even in the Department of Corrections there is some help available to you," said Boyd, noting that Lozano expressed remorse and is suffering with a health crisis.

* Aspen resident Sean Gooding, who police last fall accused of threatening two people with a gun at his apartment in the wee hours of the morning, pled guilty to misdemeanor menacing. A related charge against him was deferred for one year.

New Details Emerge In Drug Bust (ATI)

By Chad Abraham

Aspen (CO) Times, March 21, 2006

Relying in part on statements by a woman caught with a crack pipe in the home of Aspen's police chief, a judge ruled Monday there is enough evidence to try a man on cocaine distribution and conspiracy charges.

Fernando Leal-Ruiz of Carbondale was arrested, along with nine others, in the Dec. 2 drug raids on Little Annie's Eating House and Cooper Street Pier.

Leal-Ruiz, a chef at Little Annie's, allegedly had 44 bindles of cocaine, totaling just less than 26 grams, ready to sell from the restaurant's kitchen. Monday's preliminary hearing saw testimony by the Aspen police detective who led the raid on Little Annie's, a DEA agent and an immigration officer.

After her arrest in October, Martha Byrum explained to police how she would buy cocaine from Little Annie's, Detective Chris Womack said on the stand.

She said she would call the restaurant, ask for Fernando and, if he was working, go to the eatery's back door and knock, Womack testified. Whoever answered would sell her cocaine.

Byrum pleaded guilty in January to cocaine possession, second-degree trespassing and a probation violation. She was arrested after walking into Police Chief Loren Ryerson's Aspen home while trying to elude officers.

Dave Storm, a 15-year DEA agent, said he provided that photo to the Aspen Police Department. He testified that he bought drugs from Jaime Gamez-Acuna, who was also arrested, while investigating employees and patrons of the two restaurants. The operation involved video as well as photographs.

Storm's testimony revealed the origins of the controversial busts. The arrests, 11 in all, forced the police department to re-evaluate its drug-fighting policy after some Aspenites criticized authorities for the handling of the operation. The Pitkin County Sheriff's Office was not told about the raid, and many felt that storming the landmark restaurants during après-ski was not in line with Aspen's mellow ethos. Others supported the action.

Storm said he got to know Gamez-Acuna while playing pool at Cooper Street Pier. He later saw him smoking a joint in the alley between that restaurant and Little Annie's, he testified.

When Storm walked up to Gamez-Acuna, whom he called Jimmy, the suspect said, "You don't do weed."

"No, but the other," Storm responded, referring to cocaine.

Gamez-Acuna said he had a friend who sold "eight balls," slang for an eighth of an ounce of cocaine, for $160. He pointed to the back door of Little Annie's, Storm testified.

The agent gave him the cash, and Gamez-Acuna disappeared into Little Annie's, returned with the drug and then went back into Cooper Street, Storm said. The back doors of the restaurants are across an alley from each other.

Storm said he engaged in another drug deal on Oct. 21. While playing pool with Gamez-Acuna at Cooper Street, they agreed to another buy and walked down the back stairs and into the alley, where Storm again produced $160.

Gamez-Acuna went back into Little Annie's and returned with five bindles of cocaine worth $30 apiece, the agent told Boyd.

"It's better than what they're selling up there," Gamez-Acuna allegedly said, referring to Cooper Street.

Storm acknowledged that he did not know who Gamez-Acuna was allegedly getting the drugs from inside Little Annie's. But he said there was "a lot of activity in the alley." During surveillance, he noticed many people quickly going in and out of Little Annie's rear entrance without food. Vehicles also pulled up and people leaned into the windows briefly, he said. Leal-Ruiz was among those Storm said he saw meet vehicles and people in the alley.

During the Dec. 2 operation, Womack led four other law enforcement officials into the back of Little Annie's. The two employees they initially encountered, one of whom was Leal-Ruiz, were ordered to lie face-down.

Dan Fitzgibbon of the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency accompanied Womack during the operation. He testified that Leal-Ruiz, lying prone in a storage area, reached out of his line out of sight. He shouted at Leal-Ruiz at gunpoint to show his hands because he was concerned the suspect may have been trying to get a weapon.

Fitzgibbon then checked the area and saw a Ziploc bag stuffed behind a pile of shoes. He called Womack back, who said the bag contained the 44 bindles. He said there were 20 other bindles in the front of the kitchen, near where the wait staff picks up food for customers.

Prosecutor Gail Nichols told Boyd that Leal-Ruiz had no reason to reach near the shoes other than to try to hide the drugs.

But Leal-Ruiz's attorney, Arnie Mordkin, argued that it had not been proven the bindles were his client's. He grilled Storm on how he handled the bindles and whether they were fingerprinted. Storm said fingerprinting of bindles is rarely done because the paper yields inconclusive prints.

Mordkin also questioned Womack at length about the dimensions of the storage area and whether he moved the shoes to get to the bindles. The defense attorney appeared to be trying to cast doubt on how Leal-Ruiz could have shoved the Ziploc behind the shoes if he was prone on the ground.

Nichols said it was "pretty obvious" that Leal-Ruiz was trying to hide the bag. She also cited Byrum's statements to police - that others were involved in the backdoor sales - as enough justification for the conspiracy charge.

Cocaine was being dealt out the front and back of the tiny restaurant and it would have been impossible for Leal-Ruiz to not know it was going on, she said.

Mordkin countered that there wasn't "any evidence at all" to try his client on the possession or conspiracy charges. The cocaine was on the floor of the storage area and not in Leal-Ruiz's possession, he said. As for reaching in the area where the bag was found, Mordkin said Leal-Ruiz could have been adjusting his shoes - "could have been doing a gazillion things."

"How can he conspire if we never have possession?" he asked.

Mordkin added that there's no evidence Byrum ever bought cocaine from Leal-Ruiz.

"There's no connection. There has to be a connection," he said. Mordkin then sat down heavily.

Boyd disagreed. He said Byrum's statements to police, while hearsay, were admissible in a hearing to determine whether there is enough evidence to try him on the charges. He also cited that Byrum identified him in the picture and mentioned his name in describing how she obtained the cocaine.

Boyd said Leal-Ruiz was not complying with orders to show his hands and reached into an area where the cocaine was found. Both the conspiracy and distribution charges are warranted, he ruled.

Five of the 10 men arrested in the raids are still in the court system. Charges against an 11th man, who was arrested a week after the operation, were dismissed and he was deported. Of the five men whose cases already have been considered, at least three have pleaded to guilty to possession of cocaine and received probation.

Edubiel Hernandez-Cruz, who faces similar charges as Leal-Ruiz, also was in court. His hearing was continued, as was the arraignment of Gamez-Acuna. His lawyer said he and Nichols are close to reaching a plea deal.

Leal-Ruiz's next court date is April 17.

Andersen's Dismissal Is Upheld (NYT)

By Liz Robbins

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

An arbitrator ruled in favor of the N.B.A. yesterday and upheld the league's dismissal of Hornets forward Chris Andersen for violating the league's drug policy.

The arbitrator, Calvin Sharpe, ruled on a grievance filed by Andersen and the players union. Andersen, dismissed Jan. 27, cannot apply for reinstatement for two years.

"Obviously the league has made up their mind what they want to do, and we're all going to have to live with that," Hornets Coach Byron Scott said after practice yesterday in New Orleans.

Neither the league nor the players association would reveal Andersen's offense. The N.B.A.'s collective bargaining agreement specifies that a player can be disqualified only for a fourth positive test for performance-enhancing drugs, or a first positive test for "drugs of abuse," which include amphetamines, cocaine, LSD, heroin, codeine and morphine. Andersen had not previously been suspended under the drug policy.

Anderson's four-year, $14 million contract with the Hornets, which he signed last summer, became void.

Arbitrator Upholds Andersen Dismissal (AP)

AP, March 20, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- Former New Orleans Hornets forward Chris Andersen's dismissal from the NBA for violating the league's drug policy was upheld by an arbitrator Monday.

Andersen was dismissed and disqualified from the league in late January. He is not eligible to apply for reinstatement for two years.

Andersen and the players' union had filed a grievance, but arbitrator Calvin Sharpe rejected it.

According to the league's collective bargaining agreement, a player can be disqualified only for a fourth positive test for performance-enhancing drugs, or a first positive test for "drugs of abuse." The drugs on that list include amphetamines, cocaine, LSD, heroin, codeine and morphine.

Andersen has not previously been suspended for testing positive for performance-enhancing drugs.

Bolivian President Takes 'coca Is Not Cocaine' Plea To UN (IND)

By Daniel Howden

Independent, March 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0019944

Bolivia stepped up a long-running battle with Washington this week by taking its campaign to legalise coca plants to the United Nations in a bid to persuade the international community that the leaf should no longer be banned because of its links to the illegal drugs trade.

The tiny Andean nation, headed by newly elected populist President Evo Morales, is determined to prove that coca can be the source of legitimate products for export and not just the raw material for cocaine.

In Bolivia and across fellow coca-producing nations Colombia and Peru, the leaf has been grown for 3,500 years, and is used in everything from herbal tea to clothing. Its advocates say it can be used, among other things, as an aid to digestion and can provide vital nutrients and vitamins. Its function as an appetite suppressant, they point out, could also come in handy in the struggle against obesity.

Under the slogan "coca is not cocaine", they are calling for coca-based products, ranging from staples such as tea and bread to cosmetic goods such as shampoo, to be mass-produced and exported from all over South America.

But the plant, because of its close link to cocaine, is listed by the UN as a poisonous species, something which Bolivia hopes to change this week as it takes the case for legalising coca to the UN narcotics and crime agency in Vienna.

President Morales, himself a former grower and indigenous Aymara Indian who came to prominence as a spokesman for the coca farmers of the Chapare region of Bolivia, where 90 per cent of the country's coca yield is produced, has condemned his country's cocaine production. He is insistent, however, on its right to harvest more coca.

If he succeeds in changing the plant's status by 2008, Washington will not be happy. The US, which spends $1bn a year on its so-called "war on drugs" across South America, says it would be impossible to legalise coca growing in Bolivia without sending cocaine production soaring.

US officials express serious concerns that the new wave of leftist Latin American leaders - from Bolivia's President Morales to the Venezuelan President, Hugo Chavez - are acting in the interests of cocaine barons.

In most of the Andean states there are already small quotas of legalised coca cultivation supplying traditional products. Washington has argued that any expansion of those quotas would be cocaine production by another name.

Bolivia Urges UN To Defy Washington And Legalise Coca (TEL)

By Sophie Arie in La Paz

Telegraph, March 20, 2006

Bolivia is leading a Latin American campaign to legalise coca plants despite them being vilified by the United States as the source of the world's cocaine industry.

Coca leaves: fans claim it aids digestion and contains more vitamins and nutrients than most vegetables

Under the slogan "coca is not cocaine", politicians, consumers and growers across the Andes are promoting the leaf's qualities and calling for coca-based tea, yoghurt, bread, toothpaste, shampoo and soap to be mass produced and exported.

Its fans claim it helps digestion, provides more vital vitamins, nutrients and fibre than most vegetables and can even combat obesity.

But the plant has been listed by the United Nations as a poisonous species since 1961 because it also contains the alkaloid needed to make cocaine.

Bolivia has this week been arguing the case for legalising coca to the UN narcotics and crime agency in Vienna and hopes to change its status by 2008.

Indigenous communities have chewed its leaf here since 2,500 BC and brewed it as tea to boost their strength and stave off hunger and tiredness.

Even today, Bolivia's tin miners, who work in appalling work conditions, chew coca around the clock to stay awake and dull pain.

Prsident Evo Morales, a former grower who has campaigned for peasants' rights to tend the crop, has vowed to crack down on cocaine production in Bolivia, the world's third largest producer after Colombia and Peru.

But he insists the country should be allowed to grow more coca for natural, legal consumption.

And in neighbouring Peru a frontrunner in next month's election, Ollanta Humala, has suggested baking 27 million loaves of bread from coca leaves for school breakfasts daily.

Small companies in Bolivia, Peru and Colombia, have launched coca-based energy drinks, biscuits, breads and yoghurts, all faintly green in colour and supposedly providing invaluable nutritional benefits.

And although not officially for export, leaf-shaped coca biscuits are a popular buy at airport souvenir shops.

Some also claim that the leaf's ability to stunt appetite could provide a natural cure to the world's obesity epidemic.

Maria Eugenia Tenorio, Bolivia's best known coca cook, even claims to have lost more than two stone in eight months by eating large numbers of coca biscuits.

DOJ_NMG_0019945

"If Bolivians just started cooking with coca, they could solve most of the problems of malnutrition here," she said in her La Paz kitchen, kneading green coca flour into mashed potatoes to make a local version of gnocchi.

The US spends up to $1 billion a year tackling drugs in the Andes.

The idea that more coca can be grown in Bolivia without boosting more cocaine production is "pie in the sky", US officials say.

Canada's Growing Marijuana Problem (BBC)

By Becky Branford

BBC, March 20, 2006

Nearly half of Canadians admit to smoking marijuana at least once Frank proudly surveys the large log cabin he constructed himself, on a two-acre plot of aromatic evergreen forest he now owns.

"All this," he says, "was built on marijuana."

Over four years, Frank - not his real name - tended a patch of marijuana plants in a forest clearing about 45 minutes' walk from where his cabin now stands.

He regularly pooled his harvests with those of several other growers in the small British Columbia (BC) town in which he lives, to sell wholesale to young men from just across the border in the US state of Idaho.

Frank says he made hundreds of thousands of Canadian dollars before hurriedly leaving the business when his American buyers were arrested.

But tens of thousands of illegal "grow-ops" remain in Canada. Estimates suggest marijuana may generate up to C$7bn (£3.5bn; US$6.1bn) a year in BC, the sunny province thought to be at the heart of the industry.

Canada's new Conservative government says people like Frank are a menace to society, putting drugs on the streets and fuelling organised crime - and it has vowed to get tough on them.

But critics accuse the government of being wilfully blind to the historic failures of law enforcement, and ignoring public opinion and the findings of expert committees in favour of a policy of demonising marijuana - a policy they liken to the short-lived Prohibition of alcohol in 1920s and 30s America.

Vietnam roots

Growing marijuana in BC's thinly populated and rugged interior, Frank was continuing a tradition - of sorts - said to have arrived with some 50,000 young American men seeking to avoid being drafted to fight in the Vietnam war.

It's politics that's stopping a change in drug laws and not logic

Lawyer and policy expert Eugene Oscapella But over the intervening decades, the industry has changed. Most of today's grow-ops are indoors, using artificial light to produce stronger strains of cannabis.

The industry has also grown. The Canadian statistics agency reports that in 2004 there were more than 8,000 cultivation offences recorded - up from 3,400 in 1994.

Experts deduce that the true number of grow-ops is much greater, as even large seizures seem to have little effect on the price of marijuana.

The federal police reported in 2002 that the cultivation industry had reached levels "that could be deemed epidemic in the provinces of BC, Ontario, and Quebec" - and they also warn that almost every large-scale operation these days is linked in varying degrees to organised crime.

"Cannabis is the biggest issue facing law enforcement now," says Inspector Paul Nadeau of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP).

He says smugglers have access to "transport vehicles, planes, helicopters. The sky's the limit".

He calls for greater deterrents, pointing out that in BC only about 10% of those convicted of growing marijuana face jail terms (the figure is higher in other provinces), with most offenders getting a fine or suspended sentence.

The Canadian police: 'We are drowning in the numbers' He says judges facing a backlog of cases in the courts "have to be given the means to deal with the problem... We are drowning in the numbers."

In contrast to the previous Liberal administration, which sought unsuccessfully to reduce penalties for possession, the new Conservative government pledged in its election manifesto to steer Canada "off the road to drug legalisation".

It said it would ensure mandatory minimum prison sentences and large fines for serious drug offenders, including growers.

Consumption rises

But critics of tougher law enforcement insist it is doomed to failure - and has failed.

"I don't advocate smoking anything - I think it's bad for you!" says Stephen Easton, professor of economics and a senior scholar at the conservative Fraser Institute think tank, who has studied the industry in detail.

DOJ_NMG_0019946

He and other pro-reform experts accept that there is growing evidence of a link between heavy cannabis use and mental health problems in some people.

Parents and police officers agree the last thing we need is more drugs on the streets

Patrick Charette

Justice ministry "But has criminalisation been successful in deterring consumption? The answer is surely no," he says.

In 2004, the Canadian Addiction Survey found 44.5% of Canadians reported using cannabis at least once - up from 23.3% in 1989.

The proportion of respondents who admitted to using cannabis in the previous year was 14.1% - compared with 9.7% of Britons and 10.6% of Americans in equivalent surveys.

Instead of spending half a billion Canadian dollars each year tackling illicit drug use, Professor Easton argues, federal authorities have an alternative: "Tax and trade it like any other normal commodity."

In fact, several government committees tasked with evaluating Canada's drug laws have recommended legalisation of marijuana - from the 1972 Le Dain Commission to the Senate Special Committee on Illegal Drugs which reported in September 2002.

A recent survey suggested 51% of Canadians supported decriminalisation of marijuana.

Prohibition 'empires'

"There have been studies galore in Canada and elsewhere looking at this issue - it's politics that's stopping [a change in drug laws] and not logic," says lawyer Eugene Oscapella, a founding member of the independent Canadian Foundation for Drug Policy.

"It's hypocrisy, it's cowardice," he says - a charge the justice ministry declined to comment on.

Most marijuana cultivation now takes place indoors, under lights (image: RCMP) Mr Oscapella suggests Canada is fearful of crossing the US government, which he says has threatened to slow bilateral trade worth about US$1bn per day.

Some 85% of marijuana grown in BC is estimated to be exported into the US, though total border seizures of marijuana only amount to about 3% of that discovered entering the US from Mexico.

Mr Oscapella also argues that some sectors have an interest in maintaining what he calls the "Prohibition" on marijuana in Canada.

"You have to look at Prohibition as an industry: the crime-control industry. There are empires built around it - not only organised crime, but government bureaucracies, police departments, privatised prison industries in the US, pharmaceutical and drug-testing companies. These empires thrive on Prohibition."

He says he fears tougher enforcement will lead to a burgeoning prison population, but have little impact on the illicit industry.

Meanwhile, critics charge, the proceeds of the industry continue to feed what a recent editorial in the Vancouver Sun newspaper called the "monster" of organised crime.

As early as 2000, RCMP Commissioner Giuliano Zaccardelli warned this "monster" was threatening to destabilise Canada's parliamentary system.

'Pay the price'

But police insist tougher sentences, not legalisation of cannabis, is what is needed.

This argument is echoed by the new Ottawa government, though it says it will take advice before formulating a detailed drugs policy. It argues any resultant increase in spending on tougher law enforcement will be offset by lower spending on the social problems caused by drug abuse.

"Parents and police officers agree the last thing we need is more drugs on the streets," says the Ministry of Justice's acting communications director Patrick Charette.

"There has been a huge inconsistency in the application of the law - whether you're caught with a joint in a small rural community or downtown Vancouver, you'll get [a different] reaction from the police...

"Rather than simplifying and having a more relaxed approach, we think you need to enforce the law and make sure those caught with drugs and producing drugs pay the price."

Former Track Coach Convicted Of Doping (AP)

AP, March 20, 2006

MAGDEBURG, Germany (AP) -- Former German track coach Thomas Springstein was convicted of doping charges Monday and given 16-month suspended prison sentence.

The court found the 47-year-old Springstein guilty on charges including the alleged doping of young athletes in 2003.

Prosecutors had sought a longer suspended sentence, while the defense pleaded for an acquittal.

DOJ_NMG_0019947

Springstein was accused of supplying testosterone to his athletes, including a 16-year-old girl.

The trial took an unexpected twist when the court was read e-mails found when police raided Springstein's home in search of evidence.

In one e-mail, Springstein complained that the "new Repoxygen is hard to get. Please give me new instructions soon so that I can order the product before Christmas."

Repoxygen is designed for gene therapy on patients with anemia. It can boost an athlete's performance by inducing the release of erythropoietin, or EPO, a substance that stimulates the production of red blood cells to carry more oxygen to the muscles.

The International Olympic Committee and World Anti-Doping Agency already test for synthetic EPO. But there is no known test for Repoxygen, which gives the body the gene to stimulate EPO production on its own.

Springstein has worked with athletes including former East German track stars Grit Breuer and Katrin Krabbe. The two were banned from competition for using the steroid clenbuterol in 1992.

IMMIGRATION:

Exam Week For The GOP Congress (WSJ)

By George Melloan

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

Immigration reform is on the Senate agenda this week. The issue has been festering for years and probably will still be when Congress takes its Easter break, once again demonstrating the weakness of Republican congressional leadership.

It hardly needs saying the U.S. immigration policy is a mess. An estimated 11 million undocumented immigrants are among the 300 million souls who inhabit the nation. Most fill jobs U.S. citizens disdain. It would be hard to run U.S. hotels and restaurants without the maids and busboys who have made their way from places like Quito and San Salvador.

Yet their presence annoys what Weekly Standard editor Fred Barnes aptly calls "paleocons," conservatives of the Pat Buchanan stripe who go hysterical over these brown-skinned, Spanish-speaking toilers. Vigilantism has broken out on the Mexican border, with macho guys packing six-guns searching for wetbacks. More seriously, the hysteria has infected Congress, resulting in House passage in December of a bill that would, along with other drastic measures, authorize the construction of a 700-mile Berlin Wall on the Mexican border.

One guy who really loves that wall is a Yankee-baiting Mexican leftist named Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador. The highly visible testimony to gringo abhorrence of Mexicans is feeding his campaign for the July 2 Mexican presidential election. If he makes it, the U.S. will have only a few friends left in Latin American capitals. The aging, tottering Fidel Castro will have finally achieved his life's ambition of turning the Spanish-speaking world against America.

Illegal immigrants are indeed a problem, although also the principal victims of their illegal status. Because they don't have documents they can be easily exploited in ways offensive to the American sense of justice and fair play. The industry that has developed for sneaking them into the country is used for other purposes, such as smuggling drugs. A few, partly because of attachments to the smugglers, turn to crime in places like Los Angeles and Albuquerque.

The inability of the U.S. to devise a sensible set of immigration policies has broader repercussions beyond Latin America. Microsoft's Bill Gates complains that the U.S. is shutting out foreigners with needed skills. Colleges and universities say that Immigration and Naturalization Service bureaucracy complicates the admission of students, limiting the ability of the U.S. to earn foreign currency and international goodwill by offering the world's youth first-class educational opportunities. Employers protest at criminal penalties if they fail to detect document forgeries and thus don't fulfill their "duties" as surrogate law enforcers.

If Congress had been living up to its responsibilities, these problems would have been addressed long ago. The first requirement is for members to accept the fact that unfilled jobs in a booming economy are going to attract individuals seeking better lives. That's a normal and powerful drive in homo sapiens. Spending taxpayer billions on a hideous wall and more cops might reduce the flow, but it won't stop it or deal with the issue of what to do about those already in the country.

Lawmakers of course have a natural predilection toward exercising police power. Large construction projects appeal as well, especially in a Congress that seems mainly focused on finding ways to pass out federal dollars to key constituencies. But it should be evident by now that those kinds of approaches are limited in coping with honest human instincts.

The equation is simple: The U.S. needs labor; immigrants supply labor. So the solution is to find ways to bring the two together in some legal, orderly way. President Bush understands this, which is why he has proposed the restoration of a guest-worker program. But for some reason -- perhaps because the president's staff is not sufficiently skillful or vigorous enough in pressing his case -- the Republican leaders in Congress seem deaf to the wishes of their own president.

The second part of the equation, what to do about existing illegals, is a bit more difficult, politically at least. The first bit of advice worth taking: Stop treating it as a police problem. Nearly all of the illegals sneaked into the U.S. for nothing more heinous than to offer their honest labor. They violated U.S. immigration laws but they aren't criminals in the sense of posing a threat to persons or property. If approached seriously and with sufficient goodwill, it should not be beyond the mind of man to find ways to make them legal.

In other words, they need to be given amnesty. The paleocons immediately object that doing so would reward them for breaking the law. How about changing the phrasing a little bit? Let's say they are to get amnesty in recognition of the fact that they already have suffered sufficient hardship in getting into the U.S. and living secret lives. Various other schemes that have been mentioned, such as sending them home to wait in a queue, have one fatal defect: They won't convince illegals that it is safe to come out of hiding.

Offering to give illegals green cards and wipe the slate clean is the only practical solution. If they come forward, they can stay on their jobs and travel back and forth to their homes legally. Some who have been trapped in the U.S. by their inability to travel freely will choose to go home permanently. There will be less incentive to sneak in family members, since it will be possible to visit relatives or send remittances. Restoring something like the old bracero program for temporary farm workers would further regularize the flow of labor.

Let's admit that Beltway politics has gone crazy. Aside from the paleocons, there are the labor unions and their "liberal" friends. Most unions long ago gave up representing working people in favor of representing themselves, which is no doubt why they are losing membership. It is hard to think of a class of workers more in need of union support than poor Latinos with no legal rights. But politics are what Congress is paid to manage. It's too bad this Congress is making such a hash of it.

TAX:

Companies Target Your Tax Refund (WSJ)

By Jeff D. Opdyke

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

A variety of companies are trying to get their hands on your tax refund before you do, and state law-enforcement officials are cracking down on some of the practices.

As the April tax-filing deadline approaches, businesses from tax-preparation firms to auto dealerships are offering consumers the opportunity to put their expected refund checks to work weeks before the IRS sends them out -- often by loaning them the expected amount for a high fee. Dozens of retailers, including Olive Garden restaurants and AMC move theaters, have begun offering gift cards in exchange for tax refunds to people who file using TurboTax, the popular tax-preparation software. H&R Block Inc. recently launched savings accounts for customers to channel their tax refunds. And hundreds of car dealerships will prepare your taxes if your refund is applied toward a down payment on a car.

But now, state officials are clamping down on some of these programs, claiming they saddle low and moderate-income families, recent college graduates and others with high fees. Last year about three of every four tax filers received a refund, according to the Internal Revenue Service. Those refunds totaled nearly $218 billion, or about $2,171 per household.

Last week, H&R Block, the nation's biggest tax preparation firm, was sued by New York's attorney general for selling so-called Express IRAs that allegedly earned less money than what customers paid in fees. That action followed a lawsuit last month against Block by California's attorney general, who accused the firm of charging fees that equate to annualized interest rates that can exceed 500% on so-called refund-anticipation loans, the popular instant refunds, which are loans that clients repay when their refunds arrive. Oklahoma's attorney general last week warned consumers away from instant refunds, which are also offered by other big tax-preparation firms, including Jackson Hewitt Tax Service Inc. and Liberty Tax Service, saying the best strategy "is to file your taxes, and wait for your refund check."

Block said at the time that the California suit has "no legal or factual merit," and said it clearly discloses the terms of its loans to consumers. The company also has denied the charges in the New York lawsuit, saying its IRA program offers its customers "a powerful first step toward ensuring a secure financial future."

Block has been aggressively expanding beyond tax-preparation; last week the company said it had been granted a federal savings bank charter that allows it to provide checking, savings and other services through a banking subsidiary. The company this year launched a money-market savings account, which clients can fund with tax refunds. It costs $15 to start, though that is waived if customers deposit a minimum of $1,000 or agree to regular deposits. The firm is also piloting a debit card onto which customers can load their refund. The debit card is free, though the average customer accumulates about $17 in ATM fees before the refund is exhausted, Block says.

Bernie Wilson, Block's vice president for outreach and business development, says the company's goal is to help the low- to moderate-income Americans who do not have traditional banking relationships. "We're helping people save," he says. "We've been very careful to focus on things that will improve the financial situation of clients' lives."

Other firms also are targeting tax refunds. Jackson Hewitt, which has about 5,400 stores nationally, offers taxpayers its "ipower CashCard." It allows taxpayers to have their refund loaded onto what is essentially a prepaid MasterCard, then to access their cash through debit transactions or through ATM withdrawals. Taxpayers must first pay a $30 charge to load their refund onto the card.

Both Jackson Hewitt and H&R Block have teamed up with chains that place check-cashing machines inside some local tax-preparation stores. Taxpayers who opt for an instant refund can turn around and stick that check into the machine and receive cash immediately -- minus another fee that averages 2.7%, according to ACE Cash Express Inc., which provides machines to many Block stores.

Meanwhile, Intuit Inc. began this year offering users of its popular TurboTax tax-preparation software the opportunity to apply some or all of their refunds to gift cards from about 50 retailers, including Starbucks, Sharper Image, Lowe's and Red Lobster. Retailers are offering greater value in the gift card than the amount of money customers put in -- loading the card with $1,200 for a refund amount of $1,000, for instance. However, customers pay a one-time fee of $14.95 to TurboTax for shipping and handling. The offer is available to taxpayers who file their returns electronically.

TaxMax, a unit of CarBiz Inc. of Sarasota, Fla., offers taxpayers to chance to turn their federal tax refund into a down payment on a car -- though at a potentially high cost. The company says it has partnered with about 800 mainly used-car dealerships around the country and charges consumers an average of about $200 to complete a federal 1040A form, a relatively simple form.

TaxMax says customers can show up at the dealership with a driver's license, Social Security card and a W-2 form. A salesman helps fill in two to four pages of paperwork seeking information such as number of dependents and whether the taxpayer wants TaxMax to complete a state tax return for an additional $25 fee. The dealer faxes the paperwork to TaxMax, where the data are entered into a tax program and the return is looked over by a supervisor trained in tax preparation, before it is returned to the dealer and taxpayer. The process takes about 30 minutes. The size of the average return: about $2,300, according to Stan Heintz, chief operating officer for CarBiz, who expects the company to complete about 3,500 returns this tax season.

The J.D. Byrider used-car dealership in Milwaukee expects TaxMax to do about 75 tax returns for its customers this tax season, says franchisee Steve Muller. The TaxMax option "is a very popular program" and the volume of customers relying on tax refunds as down payments on cars has tripled in the past year, he says. Mr. Muller says the tax-selling season begins as early as late November, when buyers come in with their paystub and TaxMax estimates what their refund will likely be for the year.

Liberty Tax Service, with about 1,700 stores nationwide, says about 17% of its customers apply for a refund-anticipation loan, paying $75 or so for loans that average about $2,500. John Hewitt, Liberty's chief executive, says the Virginia Beach, Va., firm tries to discourage most customers from applying for the loans. "We think cross-selling to customers is fraught with difficulties, including pushing these types of products on people that they're bad for," Mr. Hewitt says. Still, he adds, "if you don't have [instant refunds], you're not competitive."

Pastors' Get-Out-the-Vote Training Could Test Tax Rules (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 20 — Weeks after the Internal Revenue Service announced a crackdown on political activities by churches and other tax-exempt organizations, a coalition of nonprofit conservative groups is holding training sessions to enlist Pennsylvania pastors in turning out voters for the November elections.

Experts in tax law said the sessions, organized by four groups as the Pennsylvania Pastors Network, could test the promises by the tax agency to step up enforcement of the law that prohibits such activity by exempt organizations.

Such a test could define the boundaries for churches and other groups.

Although the tax agency has often overlooked political activity by churches, it has repeatedly warned the clergy and religious groups that it intends to enforce its rules with new vigor this year, in part to correct what it considers to have been too much political intervention by churches and charities in 2004.

The first training session, on March 6 in Valley Forge, included a videotaped message from a single candidate, Senator Rick Santorum, the Pennsylvania Republican who faces a difficult re-election fight.

DOJ_NMG_0019950

"I encourage you to let your voices be heard from the pulpit" on vital issues, Mr. Santorum said, urging the pastors to champion a proposed constitutional ban on same-sex marriage, according to a recording made by a person at the session. Americans United for Separation of Church and State, a liberal group critical of the effort, provided the recording to The New York Times.

Colin A. Hanna, founder of the conservative advocacy group Let Freedom Ring and master of ceremonies, called the book "thoroughly and soundly grounded in Christian doctrine and Scripture as the revealed word of God," according to the recording.

Mr. Hanna described Mr. Santorum's book as a rebuttal to another book, "It Takes a Village," by Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, and pointedly said he would not name its author. The session on March 6 attracted 125 members of the clergy, and on Monday, Let Freedom Ring posted a notice on its Web site that the Pennsylvania Pastors Network was hiring 10 full-time organizers to help churches get out the vote, suggesting a sizable and well-financed effort.

Gary Marx, who helped direct the Bush re-election campaign's work with Christian groups in 2004, oversees the get-out-the-vote effort.

A politician speaking to a religious group is hardly new, and the tax code allows churches and other tax-exempt charities to register voters and to express views on public issues.

But the rules forbid supporting a political party or candidate. Inviting just one candidate to speak, singling out one candidate for special praise and highlighting a combination of issues tailored to one candidate's campaign are all factors that the I.R.S. considers problematic.

That is especially the case if the discussion is in the context of a get-out-the-vote effort, said Marcus S. Owens, a lawyer here who is the former director of the exempt-organizations division of the tax agency.

The training session was two weeks after the internal revenue commissioner, Mark W. Everson, spoke at the City Club of Cleveland saying, "We can't afford to have our charitable and religious institutions undermined by politics."

The tax agency found "a disturbing amount" of political activity during the 2004 election, including churches' inviting just one candidate to speak or distributing voters' guides that in effect favored one candidate over another, Mr. Everson said in a statement.

Pennsylvania appears to be the sole state where advocacy groups are pouring so much into working with churches so early. The outcome of the effort, and the way the tax agency responds, could have an influence far beyond the state.

Republicans, encouraged by their success mobilizing religion-minded voters in 2004, are stepping up their efforts to collect church directories around the country to help turn out voters for the midterm races. Democrats are watching the Pennsylvania senator's race closely in part because Mr. Santorum's opponent, Bob Casey Jr., shares Mr. Santorum's opposition to abortion rights, defusing the issue that has galvanized Christian conservatives.

In an interview on Friday, Mr. Hanna said the meetings were unrelated to Mr. Santorum's campaign. He noted that the training sessions explicitly encouraged the members of the clergy to speak about policies and to avoid endorsing candidates, guidelines within the limits of tax laws.

He also noted that one of the speakers was Raymond L. Flynn, a former Democratic mayor of Boston and ambassador to the Vatican who has become a supporter of President Bush and social conservative causes.

Mr. Santorum spoke on the tape for about seven minutes. A spokesman for the senator, Robert Traynham, said his statement was "generic video greetings about a public policy initiative that will be pending before the United States Senate," referring to the debate over the proposed ban on same-sex marriage.

"You are the leaders of the flock," Mr. Santorum told the pastors. "You have a responsibility to be informed and to inform" and "to help guide those who seek your counsel," especially about the importance of banning same-sex marriage.

The Rev. Frank Pavone, national director of Priests for Life, invoked the prophet Ezekiel, whose voice brought a field of bones to life.

"You and I are standing before a field of dry bones, aren't we?" Father Pavone told the training session. "Dead consciences. Destroyed life."

Without mentioning Mr. Santorum or Mr. Casey, Father Pavone emphasized how important control of the Senate would be if another Supreme Court vacancy opened soon, potentially tipping the court against abortion rights.

"This particular president needs the kind of support that he has today but might not necessarily have after 2006," Father Pavone said.

With the abortion issue off the table in the Pennsylvania race, other speakers concentrated on same-sex marriage. Mr. Casey has said he opposes same-sex marriage but he also opposes amending the Constitution to ban it. "It is a point of differentiation," Mr. Hanna said.

DOJ_NMG_0019951

Among the other speakers were two conservative Christian organizers from Ohio, where they worked with Let Freedom Ring on a state marriage referendum that helped increase conservative turnout in the 2004. "As we listen to how they did it in Ohio," Mr. Hanna told the pastors, "think about how it relates to us in Pennsylvania."

On March 6, Mr. Hanna, a former Republican commissioner of Chester County who successfully fought a legal battle to preserve a display of the Ten Commandments, said the new network would provide sermon notes, teaching aides, voters' guides, and legal referrals.

The Rev. Barry W. Lynn, executive director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State, said the network reflected "a growing backdoor, under-the-radar effort to lure churches into political campaigns" that could risk their tax exemptions.

Michael Geer, the president of the Pennsylvania Family Institute and a speaker on March 6, said such critics were trying to "squelch the free speech" of conservative pastors. No one complained, Mr. Geer said, when opponents of the state marriage amendment had an organizing meeting last week at St. Michael's Lutheran Church in Harrisburg, Pa.

Court Rejects Last Whitewater Appeal (AP-Y2)

By Jill Zeman

AP2, March 20, 2006

The seven-year, $70 million Whitewater investigation that toppled an Arkansas governor and dogged Bill Clinton for most of his presidency officially drew to a close Monday when the U.S. Supreme Court declined to hear the last remaining appeal.

Former Gov. Jim Guy Tucker had asked the high court to let him withdraw a guilty plea in a tax-conspiracy case that he said was based on an outdated law. Tucker was accused of crookedly scheming to reduce his tax liability on the sale of cable television system.

"It has been drawn out a long time," said W. Hickman Ewing, who was a chief deputy to Whitewater special prosecutor Kenneth W. Starr. "It just shows you people can keep things going."

Tucker became Arkansas governor in 1992 after Clinton was elected president. He resigned in 1996 after being convicted in a separate case, also brought by Whitewater prosecutors, involving a small business loan. Because of poor health, Tucker never went to prison but served 18 months of home detention.

In the cable case, Tucker's previous arguments led a federal judge to cut the amount of restitution owed from $1 million to $63,000. Tucker argued further that the government used the wrong section of the law when it pursued him.

"It's disappointing that there will never be a report in a court of law as to how this independent counsel, with all its resources and purported brilliance, managed to indict a citizen by use of a repealed statute," Tucker said Monday.

The appeal was the lone remnant of the Clinton-era Whitewater probe, and the cable television case had nothing to do with the Arkansas land development that gave the investigation its name. Starr won permission from then-Attorney General Janet Reno to broaden the investigation when Tucker's name came up in the business loan case.

Tucker has long argued that he would never have been pursued by prosecutors if not for Clinton. Ewing said Monday: "It's probably true."

In a 1996 trial involving the business loan, a federal jury convicted Tucker with former Clinton Whitewater business partners James and Susan McDougal. Tucker quit and was replaced by Mike Huckabee, who still holds the job.

Clinton was never charged.

High Court Rejects Appeal, Ends Whitewater Case (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, March 21, 2006

The Supreme Court yesterday refused to hear an appeal from former Arkansas Gov. Jim Guy Tucker, who asked the justices to allow him to withdraw his guilty plea to tax charges in the Whitewater investigation, closing the door on the 12-year, $60 million probe.

Tucker, who in 1996 was found guilty by a federal jury of conspiracy and mail fraud and later pleaded guilty to conspiracy to defraud the Internal Revenue Service, said through his Little Rock attorney, Jeffrey Rosenzweig, that an appeals court wrongly denied him a new hearing on whether the plea was voluntary.

The justices did not comment in refusing to hear the appeal. In 2004, they declined to consider whether Tucker, who resigned his office after his conviction, was wrongly barred from raising new arguments in challenging his tax conspiracy conviction.

Called the "Whitewater investigation" because of its ties to a questionable real estate development on the banks of the White River in the Arkansas Ozarks, the probe netted 14 convictions or guilty pleas, including those of Bill and Hillary Clinton's

Whitewater Development Corp. business partners, James and Susan McDougal, and one-time Associate Attorney General Webster L. Hubbell, a law partner of Mrs. Clinton's at Little Rock's Rose Law Firm.

The investigation formally ended in September 2000, less legal appeals, when independent counsel Robert W. Ray declared there was "insufficient evidence" to bring charges against the Clintons. In an announcement seven weeks before the Nov. 7, 2000, presidential election, Mr. Ray said the lengthy probe, which focused on accusations that the Clintons obstructed justice and gave false testimony, was "now closed."

At the time, the White House, which had vilified Mr. Ray's predecessor, Kenneth W. Starr, portrayed the Ray report as vindication.

The Whitewater investigation, begun in 1994 by special prosecutor Robert B. Fiske, focused on accusations that the Clintons knowingly participated in criminal conduct related to Madison Guaranty Savings and Loan Association, the Little Rock thrift owned by the McDougals. The thrift failed in 1994 at a cost to taxpayers of $73 million.

The McDougals and Tucker were convicted in a $3.13 million scheme involving bogus loans through Madison Guaranty, which the McDougals owned.

The probe netted 14 guilty verdicts or pleas, including Hubbell, who pleaded guilty to tax evasion, mail fraud and concealment by scheme; Tucker, who was found guilty of conspiracy and mail fraud and pleaded guilty to conspiracy to defraud the Internal Revenue Service; McDougal, convicted by a jury of 18 felonies in Madison's collapse; and Mrs. McDougal, convicted of four felonies.

Other Clinton associates, bankers and real estate officials pleaded guilty to six felonies and eight misdemeanor charges in the case.

Mrs. McDougal was sentenced to two years, but served only 105 days before a judge released her because of a back problem. But she served 18 months on a contempt citation sought by Mr. Starr for refusing to testify before a grand jury about Mr. Clinton's role in the Whitewater affair.

With less than two hours remaining in his presidency, Mr. Clinton pardoned Mrs. McDougal. It was among 140 pardons and 36 commutations signed by the president as he prepared to leave office.

Refunds Grow Fat On Tax Changes (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, March 21, 2006

Americans are enjoying their biggest tax refunds ever — and it's costing them billions of dollars.

Taxpayers overpaid their federal income taxes by a record 29% in both 2003 and 2004, according to a USA TODAY analysis of Internal Revenue Service data.

That has pushed refunds above $200 billion a year. Final figures aren't in for the 2005 tax year, but the average refund so far is $2,423, up 4% from last year.

The fatter refunds are the result of taxpayers withholding nearly twice the traditional safety margin from their paychecks to avoid a year-end tax bill.

The extra withholding gives the government an interest-free loan worth more than $10 billion a year, equal to about $100 per tax return.

“The deficit is a little smaller because of this voluntary tax,” says Leonard Burman, co-director of the Tax Policy Center in Washington.

The increasing use of tax credits and deductions caused the jump in overwithholding.

Changes in tax rates automatically revise withholding levels, but changes in tax credits and deductions do not. Workers getting expanded credits or deductions must fill out new W-4 forms to change the amount of money deducted from their paychecks.

The child tax credit, which rose from $500 to $1,000 per child in 2001, is the biggest reason for a jump in excessive withholding. More than 25 million tax returns claim this credit, worth $55 billion in 2005.

Tax credits are available for a dozen purposes, including college education, adoption assistance and child care expenses. The portion of returns claiming at least one credit rose from 13% in 1995 to 31% in 2003. Credits reduce the tax owed dollar for dollar.

Expanded deductions for health costs, college expenses and retirement accounts also played a role. Deductions reduce income that is subject to tax, rather than the tax itself.

Overwithholding has grown fastest among families earning $50,000 or less a year because they benefit most from tax credits. Many low-income families obtain refund anticipation loans, which typically cost $100 or more, to get their money about 10 days earlier than from Internal Revenue Service.

DOJ_NMG_0019953

"It's crazy to lend your money to the government interest-free and then pay triple-digit interest for a refund anticipation loan," says Chi Chi Wu, a lawyer with the National Consumer Law Center.

But many people love the forced savings and its reward — the fat refund — no matter how much it costs. "Taxes are so complicated people are just happy to come out ahead on April 15 rather than behind," says Ellen Katz, editor of the Tax Savings Report newsletter.

In-House Critic Holds IRS Feet To The Fire (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

For nearly three years, Nina Olson tried to get her bosses at the Internal Revenue Service to change an antifraud program that withheld thousands of tax refunds without notifying the suspected scofflaws.

Tired of being rebuffed, Ms. Olson, the National Taxpayer Advocate, launched an attack. In January, she released internal IRS documents showing that, in more than 65% of the cases she investigated, the agency ultimately determined the suspicions were unfounded and coughed up the refunds. Faced with the wrath of lawmakers and IRS critics, IRS Commissioner Mark Everson ordered a review of the program and promised to let taxpayers know when their refunds were frozen.

"Before going public, I had a lot of sleepless nights," Ms. Olson says now. "I didn't like embarrassing the IRS, but I didn't really have a choice. I had a moment of, 'What's going to happen to me after this comes out?' "

By any standard, Ms. Olson, who is 52 years old, has a tough job. As the taxpayer advocate, one of her tasks is to tell Mr. Everson what he's doing wrong -- and to take action if, in her view, injustices against taxpayers aren't resolved fairly and quickly.

It makes for a delicate and sometimes rocky relationship. Generally, the two meet once a month and discuss problems. "It is really just a nutty position," she says. "You get to say to the boss, 'This is good, but...' " Mr. Everson says there's "undoubtedly a certain amount of tension in the relationship." But he adds, "I don't think that there is an undue amount of tension."

The IRS has many people looking over its shoulder: the Treasury Department's Inspector General, an oversight board, Congress, and the Government Accountability Office. But only Ms. Olson is the designated "voice" of the taxpayer within the IRS. Congress created the position in 1998, when the IRS was under criticism for being unyielding and heavy-handed with taxpayers. Ms. Olson was appointed in 2001.

The give and take between the two can affect how the agency collects $2 trillion in annual taxes from America's 130 million individual taxpayers and 25 million businesses. Technically, Mr. Everson can't fire Ms. Olson: The taxpayer advocate is appointed by the Treasury secretary. But he writes her job evaluations, which can affect whether she keeps the confidence of Treasury Secretary John Snow.

Mr. Everson, a former deputy director of the White House Office of Management and Budget and a vice president of a private food-services company, has been IRS commissioner for three years. In that time, he has increased the number of audits, cracked down on illegal tax shelters, and earned the confidence of Congress to continue with his mission to remake the IRS.

Ms. Olson, who says she never had a boss before coming to the IRS, founded and was executive director of the Community Tax Law Project, of Richmond, Va., the first independent low-income taxpayer clinic in the U.S.

With something of a tough-guy reputation, Mr. Everson, 51, isn't inclined to strike deals with businesses or individual taxpayers to reduce the taxes or penalties they owe. Ms. Olson, while intolerant of fraud, is at the same time trying to moderate and nuance Mr. Everson's aggressive tone.

Though the difference in emphasis can produce clashes, the two often work in tandem behind the scenes to make navigating and understanding the IRS easier and fairer for taxpayers.

Yet there are the times when Mr. Everson and Ms. Olson view IRS problems from vastly different perspectives. In the case of the frozen refunds, Mr. Everson says the IRS wanted to fully investigate suspicious activity without tipping off possible tax cheats. Ms. Olson, who was peppered with complaints from taxpayers saying they had done nothing wrong and needed the money, argued that the program was punishing innocent people as well as guilty ones. Many of the refunds involved the Earned Income Tax Credit, which is designed to help low-income workers.

Another point of contention: Walk-in taxpayer-help centers. To save money, Mr. Everson proposed closing 68 of the agency's 400 walk-in service centers. His argument: Taxpayers should call the IRS or go online for help. Ninety percent of called-in questions are answered accurately, the highest percentage ever, he says. But the closings haven't gone forward because of objections from lawmakers and Ms. Olson, who say that face-to-face service is valuable.

Each year, Ms. Olson submits a report to Congress, detailing problems at the IRS and proposing remedies. She is working on the 2006 report. In past ones, she has criticized the IRS for rushing delinquent tax cases through the system -- a move that's meant to resolve cases quickly but sometimes results in unfair treatment of taxpayers, she says. Ms. Olson also says that IRS letters and notices need to be much clearer. "Many people can't understand the IRS rules," she says.

She also has faulted the agency for pushing some people into the appeals process for delinquent bills too quickly and has urged the IRS to steer clear of private debt collectors. She worries that sensitive taxpayer information will end up in the hands of private collection agencies.

Nevertheless, the IRS recently began a pilot program that would contract out some collections to three private firms. If successful, the program will expand to 10 firms by next year.

Mr. Everson, in response to Ms. Olson's complaints, says that reducing the time it takes for revenue officers to collect overdue taxes is an important initiative that benefits taxpayers with prompter, clearer service. Since assuming office, he has reduced the time it takes to close those tax-collection cases to an average of 38 weeks from more than 47 weeks.

Moreover, he says, while Ms. Olson has the luxury of focusing solely on taxpayers' concerns, he must also worry about ensuring that taxes are paid promptly. The tax gap -- the amount owed by taxpayers but not paid -- is estimated at $290 billion.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Signs Bill To Raise Debt Ceiling (AP-Y2)

AP2, March 20, 2006

With no fanfare, President Bush signed a bill Monday pushing the ceiling on the national debt to nearly $9 trillion.

The measure allows the government to borrow an additional $781 billion and prevent a first-ever default on Treasury notes. It also lets the government pay for the war in Iraq without raising taxes or cutting popular domestic programs.

The debt limit increase was the fourth of Bush's presidency, totaling $3 trillion. With the budget deficit near record levels, an additional increase in the debt limit almost certainly will be required next year.

The measure allows the debt limit to rise from $8.184 trillion to $8.965 trillion.

Bush Signs Bill Boosting Energy Aid To Poor (AP-Y2)

AP2, March 21, 2006

Federal aid to help the poor cope with energy costs will increase by $1 billion to more than $3 billion this year under legislation President Bush signed on Monday.

It took months to get the additional money for the Low Income Home Energy Assistance Program through Congress, in part because of resistance from fiscal conservatives opposed to new spending and from lawmakers from warm weather states who contend that the program favors cold weather regions.

Proponents said the program's budget has failed to meet the needs of the poor as heating and cooling costs soar.

The $1 billion, on top of $2.1 billion already allotted for the current budget year, was obtained by transferring money originally intended for the budget year that begins Oct. 1.

Under a compromise worked out in the Senate, half of the new money would be distributed according to an existing formula that would favor warm weather states while the other half would be spent at the discretion of the president.

Choices Shrink In Drug Plan, Study Says (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — One of the first independent studies of the Medicare prescription benefit has concluded that many low-income California seniors now have access to a narrower range of drugs than when the state covered their medications, according to a report being released today.

The new federal program contains pitfalls for middle-class beneficiaries as well, the report said, because of wide differences in the number of drugs the private Medicare prescription plans cover. For example, among 10 plans the study analyzed, only two covered all of the top 100 medications taken by Medicare patients. Another two covered 99 of the drugs; one plan covered 71.

And higher monthly premiums did not necessarily mean access to a greater number or variety of prescription drugs.

Medicare administrator Mark McClellan took issue with the report's conclusions Monday, saying that many of the medications that plans do not cover have generic equivalents that cost much less and are paid for by the plans.

"The concern I would have is implying that because not every cholesterol drug is covered, that the plans aren't providing access to needed drugs," he said. "If that is the conclusion people draw, that is a misleading conclusion."

The report, among the first assessments based on government data rather than anecdotal evidence, comes as California is experiencing significant problems with the transition of low-income seniors and disabled people from the state Medi-Cal program to the Medicare drug plan. An emergency program instituted by the state as a backstop continues to pay for about 10,000 prescriptions each weekday.

Although focused on the California experience, the report's findings could have national implications, as federal and state lawmakers grapple with ways to work out problems with the new benefit.

"This is true across the country — this is not a California phenomenon," said Jonathan Blum, a vice president of Avalere Health, a Washington, D.C., consulting firm that conducted the study for the California HealthCare Foundation. Its findings will be presented today at a joint hearing of the California Assembly's health and aging committees.

On Jan. 1, when the Medicare benefit took effect, nearly 1 million elderly low-income Californians were automatically transferred into it from Medi-Cal, the state's version of Medicaid. The former Medi-Cal beneficiaries were assigned at random to one of several private plans, with no consideration of the drugs they were taking.

There were big differences in coverage among the plans, which have wide latitude in choosing the drugs they will pay for. Of those plans accepting Medi-Cal beneficiaries, the most inclusive covered 3,360 medications, while the most restrictive covered 626, the report found.

The Food and Drug Administration has approved about 8,000 medications, virtually all covered by Medi-Cal. The Medicare plans are required to offer at least two choices in every major class of drugs.

Focusing the analysis on four classes of medications — drugs used to treat psychosis, AIDS, high blood pressure and high cholesterol — the study found disparities.

"Many … beneficiaries, even if they are properly enrolled in a drug plan, have coverage that is inferior to their coverage under Medi-Cal for the four classes analyzed," the report said.

It also found that co-payments, although modest, are higher than what low-income seniors paid under Medi-Cal.

Among the drugs used to treat schizophrenia and other serious mental illness, Medi-Cal covered 20 medications, according to the study. Of the Medicare plans, one covered 15 of the drugs, while the most inclusive covered 21. The median was 18 medications.

Among AIDS drugs, the plans covered the same median number, 23, as Medi-Cal had.

There was a wider difference in coverage for drugs used to treat high blood pressure and high cholesterol. Medi-Cal covered 12 blood pressure drugs; the number covered by the plans ranged from five to 12, with a median of eight.

Similarly, Medi-Cal covered 14 cholesterol-lowering drugs, while the number covered by the Medicare plans ranged from seven to 20, with a median of 10.

Medications for severe mental illness and AIDS are in a specially protected category, under which Medicare requires the private plans to cover most or all available medications. Those special protections appear to be working, the report found.

But it questioned the policy of randomly assigning low-income beneficiaries to plans in which some of their drugs might not be covered.

"Especially to the extent that [beneficiaries] lose access to drugs that reduce other, higher-cost medical services, the state of California would face higher costs when Medi-Cal pays for the more expensive care," the report said.

Some California pharmacists say that all of the participants in the new drug plans are likely to face more coverage problems next month, after a 90-day transition period expires. Special medical authorization then will be needed to get drugs not on a plan's approved list.

"When April 1 rolls around, there are going to be more frequent incidents of patients having to confront these types of things," said John Cronin, owner of Community Pharmacy of Escondido. "Right now when we transmit [such] a claim, we get a message saying they'll cover it this time, but they're not filling it after April 1. We are basically sending that information to the physicians."

Before signing up for a drug plan, the report recommended, seniors should check not only whether the medications they currently take are covered, but also how many of the top 100 Medicare drugs are included. That way, they can have greater assurance of comprehensive coverage if they require new medicines.

Major Education Official Is Quitting For House Post (NYT)

By Diana Jean Schemo

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 20 — The federal Education Department's top official overseeing colleges and universities has resigned and will become deputy staff director of the House committee on education, the panel announced on Monday.

The official, Sally L. Stroup, the assistant secretary for postsecondary education, said in an interview on Monday that she submitted her resignation last Wednesday and would leave the department in mid-April.

"I've been here four years," Ms. Stroup said. "That was long enough."

DOJ_NMG_0019956

In moving to Capitol Hill, Ms. Stroup will return to her onetime employer, officially known as the Committee on Education and the Workforce, for which she had worked for seven years.

Though her new job carries a less exalted title than the one she is leaving, Ms. Stroup said she would have a broader portfolio, overseeing legislation on disabled students, elementary and secondary schools, labor and other issues.

Her departure was first reported by The Chronicle of Higher Education on Friday.

Before joining the Education Department in 2002, Ms. Stroup was briefly a lobbyist for the University of Phoenix, the largest for-profit university in the country.

The committee's new chairman, Representative Howard P. McKeon, Republican of California, has been considered an ally of the for-profit education industry, like his predecessor, Representative John A. Boehner, Republican of Ohio, the new House majority leader.

In recent months, the committee for the first time permitted institutions that teach more than half their courses online to receive federal student aid, a boon to for-profit institutions like the University of Phoenix.

The committee is expected to complete an updating of the Higher Education Act, the main federal law governing colleges and universities, in the coming months. Ms. Stroup has said that as assistant secretary she withdrew from any policy or regulatory matters directly involving the University of Phoenix.

She said on Monday that she did not expect to have to step aside in the same way in her new job, because legislation would address higher education or for-profit universities generally, not a single institution.

"I would never recuse myself from those kinds of things that have a broad reach across an entire industry," she said.

G.O.P. Makes Its Pitch To Firefighters' Union (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 20 — With the election season heating up, the Bush administration and the Republican Party used a good deal of energy and charm on Monday to woo a group that has long been part of the Democrats' base: organized labor.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff; Senator Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska; and the Republican National Committee chairman, Ken Mehlman, spoke to the annual legislative conference of the main firefighters' union, saying they were eager to work with the union on issues of common ground.

The White House chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., had been scheduled to speak, but canceled, citing illness. Mr. Mehlman praised the union for an increasing focus on bipartisanship and said if the firefighters and other unions worked with Republicans they could achieve more of what they were seeking, including greater preparedness for emergencies.

"We've sometimes disagreed, but we've always kept the dialogue open," he said. "There are areas where we can work together over the coming year."

Mr. Mehlman said the Republicans hoped to attract more union voters this year than in 2004, when 38 percent of union members backed President Bush, according to surveys of voters leaving the polls.

"I do think we can make greater inroads," he said.

Harold A. Schaitberger, the president of the International Association of Fire Fighters and the first prominent labor leader to back Senator John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts, for president in 2004, voiced the views of an increasing number of union leaders in saying it was important to work with Republicans.

"I realize that historically the Democrats have been friendlier toward workers," said Mr. Schaitberger, whose union has remained in the A.F.L.-C.I.O. as five unions have left the federation. "The bottom line is that at almost every level of government the government is split, and most legislatures are split. And you have to work both sides of the aisle to move an agenda."

The Teamsters, the service employees and other unions have begun cooperating with Republicans. But rarely have the Republicans made such strong overtures toward a union as they did on Monday toward the firefighters.

The firefighters have cachet because they are viewed as pillars in many communities and because 343 New York firefighters were killed on Sept. 11, 2001.

Sarah Chamberlain Resnick, executive director of the Main Street Republican Partnership, a group of Republican lawmakers that works closely with unions, said it was no coincidence that Republican leaders were courting union members.

"When the president is at 34, 36 percent in the polls, you have to begin to reach out," Ms. Resnick said. "The unions are not the president's base. So the White House is starting to reach out."

Her group has told unions that it is smart to reach out to Republicans.

"Republicans are in control, so it's good to have some friends who are in the majority," she said.

Mr. Chertoff promised that the administration would do a better job dispatching vital supplies to firefighters and other emergency workers when they respond to disasters.

DOJ_NMG_0019957

Mr. Hagel urged the firefighters to help build a bipartisan consensus to deal with overarching problems like terrorism, poverty and health care.

Underlining the Republicans' difficulties in wooing union members, Howard Dean, the Democratic chairman, received far more applause than any Republican speaker. "We want American jobs that will stay in America," Mr. Dean said to thunderous applause.

He also called for "retirement security," saying Democrats, unlike many Republicans, would not seek to reduce public-employee pensions.

Some union leaders have voiced fears that labor's flirtation with bipartisanship could undercut efforts to return control of Congress to the Democrats, who have been friendlier to labor on issues like workplace regulation and raising the minimum wage.

As part of the bipartisan approach, Mr. Schaitberger said his union would back candidates, Republicans and Democrats, who have stood with the firefighters on issues like increased spending to hire first responders.

He said his union would back the re-elections of Republicans like Gov. Rick Perry of Texas and Senator Mike DeWine of Ohio but would seek to defeat Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in California and Senator Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania, two other Republicans.

"For those politicians who support our agenda, we will support them," Mr. Schaitberger said. "And for those who are looking to roll back the rights and improvements we've earned, we'll oppose them at every turn."

He criticized Mr. Bush for proposing to eliminate federal financing to hire additional first responders.

Mr. Schaitberger has revamped his union's political contribution so that 35 percent went to Republicans in 2004, up from 9 percent in 2000.

"We have one party that doesn't really care for us as labor and another that takes us for granted," he said. "I'm not sure which is worse."

Allen's 'Paycheck Penalty' Not Popular Among Peers (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, March 21, 2006

Sen. George Allen, testing the 2008 presidential waters while facing his own re-election in the fall, says members of Congress should not get paid if they miss the deadline for passing a federal budget.

The Virginia Republican's so-called "paycheck penalty" proposal has piqued the interest of fiscal conservatives, but is unpopular among his colleagues.

Mr. Allen's critics call the proposal disingenuous, noting that last week the senator voted to increase the federal debt limit to $9 trillion.

"There's a great need for fiscal responsibility in Washington," Mr. Allen said yesterday. "It's absurd that a full-time legislature at the Capitol can't get their job done by October 1st. There is no excuse why this can't get done on time."

Mr. Allen said that voting to raise the debt limit was difficult, but he defended it as "responsible" to avoid higher interest rates on government bonds.

The deadline for passage is the end of the fiscal year, Sept. 30, but Congress rarely meets that date.

Lawmakers, who earn $165,200 annually, are not penalized for being late and often agree on multiple continuing resolutions before resolving the budget just before Christmastime.

Mr. Allen said the system makes it difficult for lawmakers to scrutinize all the spending because they are eager to get home for the holidays.

Harris N. Miller, a Northern Virginia businessman seeking the Democratic nomination to challenge Mr. Allen in November, balked at the proposal.

"Being a senator is very serious business, which includes using the taxpayers' dollars wisely and learning words like 'no,' " Mr. Miller said. "It's clear that he's failed at his job."

Mr. Miller also called on Mr. Allen to return $229,308 to taxpayers -- the amount that Mr. Miller calculated the senator has received after the budget deadline since he took office in 2001.

Mr. Allen said yesterday that the proposal works only if paychecks for all of the lawmakers are withheld, "to apply real pressure."

Former Secretary of the Navy and author James H. Webb, who faces Mr. Miller in a June 13 Democratic primary, did not respond to calls or an e-mail to his campaign staff yesterday.

So far, no lawmakers have co-sponsored Mr. Allen's bill, which is pending review in the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0019958

Mr. Allen said that Virginia, where he served as governor in the 1990s, knows how to keep a fiscal house in order. Chief executives there are allowed a line-item veto, a tool that he used several times when signing budgets. Lawmakers there, as in most states, also are required to pass balanced budgets.

Mr. Allen first introduced the idea during a speech to the Conservative Political Action Conference in February. In courting fiscal conservatives there as he explores a bid for the White House, he also proposed a presidential line-item veto and a balanced-budget constitutional amendment.

During the conference, the political insiders attending ranked Mr. Allen as most likely to be the Republican presidential nominee in 2008.

Alphonso Jackson: The Pinup And The Papa (WP)

By Laura Blumenfeld

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

The girls had wet lips, chasmic cleavage and hair that a man could get lost in. Their pictures hung on the wall above Brandon Rawlins's bed, at the Howard University freshman dorm.

"Who's that?" Rawlins asked, furrowing his brow at the blown-up photographs above Blakeley's bed.

"The secretary of housing and urban development," Blakeley said. "He's my mentor."

"Where's he live?"

"In D.C.," Blakeley said. "He's a Cabinet secretary."

Rawlins blinked. "What made him be your mentor?"

When Blakeley was a high school sophomore, he saw Alphonso Jackson give a speech. "I asked him a question, and he was really angry. I thought we should get an apology for slavery, and he disagreed. I said, 'Being a black Republican is an oxymoron.' "

Housing and Urban Development Secretary Jackson had heard it before, but when Blakeley confronted him, Jackson said, he saw something rare. Blakeley seemed angry, like many young black men, but also "extra intelligent." Six months later, Jackson sent Blakeley a note. Three years and many conversations later, Jackson wrote him a reference to Howard University. By the end of Blakeley's first semester, Jackson had brought him to the White House.

"Hey, give him my number," said Blakeley's friend Nick Owen. "Spread him around."

Jackson, 60, grew up in Texas the youngest of 12 children, the son of a foundry worker, the product of St. Peter's Academy for Coloreds, and the bearer of his own load of anger. To Jackson, becoming a Republican as a young man meant trading self-pity for self-reliance. He attended law school and then served as public housing director in St. Louis, in Washington, and in Dallas, where he befriended George W. Bush. Now he runs a $34 billion agency and relaxes by playing golf at his vacation home in Hilton Head, S.C.

But Jackson's happy ending is meaningless, he said, unless it is retold through the lives of other young blacks. It is why he reached out to Blakeley and why, on weekends, he is tape-recording his memoirs for his first grandchild. Jackson is a grandfather now and has a story to tell, one that he hopes will cast a spell.

"You think about your legacy when you get to be 60," Jackson said to Blakeley over a breakfast of eggs, bacon and sausage at the Hyatt on Capitol Hill one recent morning. The two men meet every few months. Jackson was escorted by security guards. Blakeley wore a $5 blazer and a $2 tie from a secondhand store. Blakeley is one of four children his single mother had with four men; for a while, he said, he lived in a homeless shelter.

"I expect to see you 15 years from now a deputy secretary or secretary, if not a millionaire," Jackson told him. "I've seen the denigration of black males. It's not what white people have done. It's that we haven't expected enough from our kids."

Jackson is a compact man, with a round, endearing face and spectacles that deflect his acknowledged temper. He is intense, a double-brewed man, like the two tea bags he dunks at once into his hot water, one herbal and the other caffeinated.

"I'm going to find you a great girlfriend. A great girlfriend makes your life easier," said Jackson, who remarried in 1988 after a divorce. "Women provide stability."

"What about fraternities?" Blakeley asked.

"You'll make friends for life," Jackson said. "The first lady's sorority sisters are around all the time."

Blakeley talked about his classes. "I was doing a report on Justice Thomas. Why can't I find anything positive?"

Jackson frowned. He meets Thomas, an old friend and fellow conservative, for breakfast here every six weeks. "Just give me one opinion that Thomas has written adverse to black people."

DOJ_NMG_0019959

Blakeley nodded as if they were two men facing the same problem: "When I went to the White House, guys in my class said, 'You're a house Negro.' You should've heard them."

"They want to portray us as being callous and cold," said Jackson, stabbing a sausage with his fork. "And I don't mind." He chomped the sausage. But after Blakeley ran off to his 9 a.m. class, Jackson approached a table of NAACP leaders. He put his arm around one and said, "What are we going to do? You going to keep beating me up?"

It is a phrase -- "beat me up" -- that comes up often, sometimes figuratively, but also literally. One Sunday morning at Jackson's Alexandria townhouse, as he sat in the living room recording his life story for his granddaughter, he lifted his pant leg to his knee, revealing a jagged scar. In 1965, while working on voter registration in Alabama, he was beaten and was attacked by dogs.

Jackson's wife, Marcia, 50, sat listening, with luminous eyes. As the gears on his tape recorder turned, Jackson spoke of being arrested for using a whites-only bathroom, of witnessing a white policeman shoot and kill a neighbor, of learning that his father's land had been seized when he was wrongfully accused of raping a white woman.

Beside Jackson lay a photo album filled with 8-by-10s of his 20-month-old granddaughter, Lauren. She calls Marcia "Mimi" and Jackson "Papa."

"Lauren needs to know that's part of her heritage. Not to be bitter about but to project her to do well," Jackson said. "I was angry, very angry. I pushed myself through anger to be my best."

Jackson's initials are "ARJ," monogrammed on his orange turtleneck. The R is for Roy, his alter ego. "When I come in mad, Marcia says, 'Okay, Roy's here.' "

If there's a moral to Jackson's bedtime story, it is the triumph of action over anger. Jackson recalled the moment he realized he had succeeded: "At the first State of the Union, when they presented the Cabinet," Jackson's voice caught. He stared at Marcia, as his eyes turned red.

"You thought about your mom and dad," Marcia offered.

Marcia continued: "How much you appreciate all their sacrifices."

But what had caught in Jackson's throat, took hold inside of hers. The tape recorder whirred. The room was quiet. And when Lauren grows up and listens, she'll know this is the happiest part of the story, because her Mimi and her Papa are crying.

By Sylvia Moreno

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

West Texas, where George W. and Laura Bush grew up and met, was dropped from consideration as a site for the George W. Bush Presidential Library.

Former commerce secretary Donald L. Evans, a West Texan himself and chairman of the presidential site-selection committee, delivered the bad news in a letter late last week.

"This was a difficult decision for the committee," Evans wrote to David A. Miller, chairman of the West Texas Coalition, which represented Texas Tech University in Lubbock and Midland College in Midland. "Your team has brought to light many important ideas, and it is our hope that the final selection and site will make you and the institutions you represent proud."

The West Texas Coalition had proposed a contemporary-style or Spanish Renaissance library on 100 acres west of Texas Tech's Health Science Center and, at Midland College, a Laura Welch Bush Center for Early Literacy.

Still in the running as library sites are Southern Methodist University in Dallas (Laura Bush's alma mater), the University of Dallas and Baylor University in Waco. Although SMU has little land available for new building, it is perceived to be the favorite because Laura Bush is a member of the board of trustees.

Longtime Bush adviser Karen Hughes and White House counsel Harriet Miers -- who also is advising the library selection committee -- also possess SMU degrees.

A Dallas lawyer recently sued SMU, alleging that the school used fraud and intimidation to oust residents of a condominium complex east of the campus to make room for the proposed Bush library.

SMU officials have denied the allegations, saying the school started buying the condo units long before a library was in the works. The condo purchases began in 1998, when President Bush was still Gov. Bush. SMU subsequently gained control of the condo board, designated the condos beyond repair and declared it will tear down the 347-unit complex.

One school not mentioned is Texas A&M University, which is home to the George H.W. Bush presidential library.

Intelligence Community Works At Common Pay System (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

The intelligence community -- comprising 16 government agencies -- plans to take the first steps this year toward pulling its tens of thousands of employees into a common pay system.

The IC, as it's known in the government's jargon, operates with a patchwork of pay rules that makes it difficult for intelligence agencies to share, reassign and recruit employees, according to officials. A White House commission last year called on John D. Negroponte , director of national intelligence, to create a more uniform pay and personnel system to help integrate operations and shape a more agile workforce.

Since that report, the departments of Homeland Security and Defense have firmed up plans to roll out performance-based pay systems this year. Pay changes also may come to parts of the FBI, such as its new national security branch.

"There can be no doubt that pay modernization is coming to the IC, and generally, I believe that is a good thing," Gen. Michael V. Hayden , principal deputy director of national intelligence, recently wrote intelligence employees.

Designing a common pay system for spies, code breakers, scientists, analysts and others around the world will be one of the most ambitious personnel-management projects undertaken by the government in decades.

There is no chain of command for unified management of intelligence personnel. Intelligence agencies use a range of pay models, from the traditional grade and step system to broad salary scales. Some offer special pay rates for hard-to-fill jobs, and some are steeped in traditions tied to agency mission.

There are also communities within the intelligence community, such as the national clandestine service and an evolving analytic group.

"It's the most complicated transformation that I've been involved in," said Ronald P. Sanders , who is helping steer the effort.

Sanders, chief human capital officer for the intelligence community, came to the post last year after a stint at the Office of Personnel Management, where he helped oversee plans to overhaul the pay and workplace rules at the departments of Defense and Homeland Security. He also has played key roles in personnel management at the Defense Department and the Internal Revenue Service, where he helped implement a restructuring ordered by Congress.

In an interview, Sanders pointed to the memo sent by Hayden to employees and his promise that officials "will reach out to you to share our thoughts and proposals, understand and address your concerns, and incorporate your ideas."

Sanders said there is no deadline for overhauling pay in the intelligence community, and, he added, there are no prescriptions, solutions or recommendations on the table.

He said officials will try to introduce the new system in phases.

The first phase will focus on research and listening to employees in the intelligence community, Sanders said. Out of that phase, IC officials will develop a series of options for consideration by IC leaders later this year, and their decisions will form the basis for drawing up a tentative plan. The last phase calls for taking the proposal back to the IC workforce to explain "what it looks like and why," Sanders said.

The IC has a mixed record on pay systems. A few agencies have adopted modern compensation practices, but CIA employees balked in 2001 when the agency explored possible changes in the way employees would be evaluated and paid. Employees were concerned about how pay changes might affect their pension credits and how performance ratings would affect pay raises. In the end, the CIA project was put on hold.

But Sanders said the IC cannot afford to allow pay disparities, created by the current patchwork of systems, impede the sharing of people. In addition, he said, many agencies need more flexible pay practices so they can better compete when recruiting candidates for entry-level jobs, particularly those who speak foreign languages and have other specialized skills and knowledge.

"There is this shared sense of mission amongst all parts of the community," Sanders said. "So that's a kind of binding force that offsets the structural impediments to building community, and it's something that we want to leverage."

Invest In Teachers (USAT)

By Tom Mooney

USA Today, March 21, 2006

Public schools and the teaching profession should welcome classroom help from experts in fields such as science and math, as well as history, literature and the arts. But recruiting such experts — whether from academia, business or other professions — on a part-time or temporary basis will do little to alleviate teacher shortages in crucial subjects or reduce staggering overall attrition rates from teaching.

The Bush administration's proposal to import the concept of adjunct faculty from higher education and apply it to America's high schools is just another quick-fix attempt to avoid tackling the real problems that limit and drain the teaching talent pool. Low pay, poor working conditions and the lack of opportunity for advancement cause too many talented people to take a pass or just pass through.

Subject matter expertise is critical to effective teaching, but training in research-based methods of instruction is equally important. A brilliant chemist, engineer or historian might be unable to manage, much less motivate, engage and successfully instruct adolescents. Their expertise ought to be tapped as guest lecturers or tutors supporting the classroom teacher. They also can be invaluable in continuing education programs, and helping teachers advance their own expertise and keep up with developments in their fields.

The president's proposal is unlikely to be helpful, and it could erode the quality of teaching in America's high schools. The last thing secondary education needs is to replicate the extensive use of exploited adjunct faculty that is turning our public colleges and universities into academic sweatshops.

Tom Mooney is president of the Ohio Federation of Teachers.

Teachers Spurn Talented Rivals (USAT)

USA Today, March 21, 2006

Earlier this month, two top Army scientists from the Aberdeen Proving Ground in Maryland sat down with teachers from the nearby public high school to advise them on setting up a robotics course. Aberdeen scientists will also co-teach classes, mentor students and appear at school career days.

This sort of collaboration might sound non-controversial, but it's not. Teachers' union leaders are resisting a plan by President Bush to build an "adjunct teacher corps" of 30,000 experienced scientists and mathematicians, like those at Aberdeen, to assist in the nation's schools. The union leaders say raising teacher pay and improving working conditions, not bring in outside experts, is the way to enhance math and science teaching.

Those objections miss the larger point. The USA faces a challenge to its technology leadership that can't be ignored. Although this country was built on innovation, it now risks passing that mantle to international competitors, according to several recent credible reports.

Business and government leaders say retaining a creative edge requires doubling the number of math and technology majors by the year 2015. Meeting that goal requires reaching students early with instruction that is both competent and inspirational.

As it is now, fewer than a third of U.S. fourth- and eighth-grade students score at the proficient level in math. And U.S. students score below the international average on tests of math and science knowledge.

Inadequate instruction is at least part of the reason for those scores. An estimated 38% of math teachers in grades 7-12 lack either a major or minor in math.

A child who receives mediocre math and science instruction in elementary school is unlikely to complete algebra by eighth-grade. Completing algebra by that grade is a key predictor for who will pursue a college degree in science or math.

Here's where Bush's $25 million adjunct teacher plan, being considered by Congress, could prove invaluable. Some of these volunteer experts might advise teachers and mentor students, as the Aberdeen scientists are doing. Other scientists might become certified to try teaching as a full-time second career.

The private sector can support this. IBM already offers $15,000 in tuition and stipends to company scientists in New York and North Carolina who are interested in post-retirement teaching careers. The American Electric Power utility runs teacher workshops to improve math and science education.

Real-world experts know how to make their subjects interesting to students. Former Lockheed Martin chairman Norman Augustine, who chaired a National Academy of Sciences report on science education, recalls a recent visit he made to his grandson's preschool. After Augustine used the floor to lay out paper models of the planets, the students asked about Pluto. Because of rotational patterns, Pluto isn't always the outermost planet, he told them. And there's evidence of planets beyond Pluto, he said.

The students were fascinated.

Augustine and other private scientists bring detailed knowledge that can capture students' imaginations. Teachers should see them as educational partners, not as a threat to their livelihoods.

Be Sure Before You Censure (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0019962

By H. W. Brands

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

RUSSELL FEINGOLD, the outspoken Democratic senator from Wisconsin, wants to censure President Bush for authorizing wiretaps of Americans without court orders. His fellow Democrats haven't exactly leaped to his side, but a recent poll indicated that 46 percent of the public considers censure warranted. If that figure increases, Mr. Feingold may have company.

Still, history shows that he ought to move carefully. While many have compared the censure proposal to the impeachment of President Bill Clinton, there is a more relevant precedent: In 1834, America's most famous political orator, Henry Clay of Kentucky, arranged the Senate's only successful censure of a president, Andrew Jackson — and he never stopped paying for his accomplishment.

The bad blood between Clay and Jackson dated to the election of 1824, in which Jackson received the greatest number of popular and electoral votes, but not a majority of either. Clay finished third in the popular count and fourth in electors. The contest went to the House, and Clay threw his support to John Quincy Adams, who won the presidency and thereupon named Clay secretary of state — and next in line, in the practice of the day, for the White House. Jackson defeated Adams in an 1828 rematch, spoiling Clay's plans for the succession. But Clay maneuvered Jackson into vetoing a measure to renew the charter of the Bank of the United States, a privately controlled precursor to the Federal Reserve system. Clay forced the issue because he anticipated that the bank veto would undermine business confidence, which it did. Clay was wrong, however, in thinking this would fatally weaken Jackson in the 1832 election, in which Clay ran as the candidate of the new anti-Jackson coalition, soon to be called the Whigs.

Jackson was re-elected handily, and afterward withdrew the federal government's deposits from the Bank of the United States as punishment for its collusion in Clay's machinations. "The bank, Mr. Van Buren, is trying to kill me," Jackson told Vice President Martin Van Buren. "But I will kill it!"

Amid this so-called Bank War, Clay proposed to censure the president for removing those deposits without Congressional approval. The proposal enraged Jackson, who castigated Clay for being as "reckless and as full of fury as a drunken man in a brothel." It provoked an uproar in the Senate and the press, with Jackson's supporters rallying behind him as the defender of democracy against the moneyed interests, and his critics alleging that his interpretation of executive authority was revolutionary and unconstitutional. (Beyond the shouting, there were plausible arguments on both sides — as in the case of the Bush wiretaps.) On March 28, 1834, the Senate critics carried the day, approving the censure resolution by a vote of 26 to 20.

Clay thought he had won a great triumph. But the 1834 midterm elections returned control of the Senate to the Democrats, as the Jacksonians were called by then. And the Democrats refused to let the censure issue rest. Senator Thomas Hart Benton of Missouri, who had once shot Jackson in a street brawl (the president still carried bullet fragments in his shoulder) but eventually became the president's most devoted partisan, campaigned incessantly against the censure and all who had voted for it. His efforts helped make the retiring Jackson the focus of the 1836 presidential election, bringing voters out in force for Van Buren, Jackson's uncharismatic protégé.

The Democrats celebrated Van Buren's victory by voting to expunge the censure resolution from the records of the Senate. As Jackson, old and ill, prepared to leave Washington for the Hermitage, his plantation near Nashville, Benton choreographed an elaborate ceremony in which the original handwritten journal of the Senate from 1834 was carried into the chamber and the Senate's secretary, after drawing bold black lines around the censure resolution, wrote across it, "Expunged by order of the Senate."

Benton retrieved the secretary's pen and sent it to Jackson as spoils of victory, while Henry Clay was left to mutter against the "foul deed which, like the blood-stained hands of the guilty Macbeth, all ocean's waters will never wash out." Clay continued to pay for his temerity: in 1844, even as Jackson declined toward death, Clay lost his third (and final) race for the presidency to another Jackson protégé, James K. Polk.

Russ Feingold is no Henry Clay, at least not yet. And if he hopes to discredit Mr. Bush, as he doubtless does, I'd suggest he find means other than censure. The last thing today's Democrats want to do is to make George W. Bush look like Old Hickory.

Man Overboard (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

I have a new theory about what's behind everything that's wrong with the Bush administration: manliness.

DOJ_NMG_0019963

"Manliness" is the unapologetic title of a new book by Harvey C. Mansfield, a conservative professor of government at Harvard University, which makes him a species as rare as a dissenting voice in the Bush White House. Mansfield's thesis is that manliness, which he sums up as "confidence in the face of risk," is a misunderstood and unappreciated attribute.

Manliness, he writes, "seeks and welcomes drama and prefers times of war, conflict, and risk." It entails assertiveness, even stubbornness, and craves power and action. It explains why men, naturally inclined to assert that "our policy, our party, our regime is superior," dominate in the political sphere.

Though manliness is "the quality mostly of one sex," Mansfield allows that women can be manly, too, though the sole example he can seem to come up with, and deploys time and again, is Margaret Thatcher. "Is it possible to teach women manliness and thus to become more assertive?" he wonders, but not really. "Or is that like teaching a cat to bark?" Me-ow!

"The problem of manliness is not that it does not exist," Mansfield concludes. "It does exist, but it is unemployed." Well, um, excuse me, but I think -- it's just my opinion, now, maybe you disagree, and I'm sure we could work it out -- Mansfield has it exactly backward. Manliness does exist. The problem is that it's overemployed -- nowhere more than in this administration.

Think about it this way: Is a trait exemplified by reluctance to ask directions -- "for it is out of manliness that men do not like to ask for directions when lost," Mansfield writes -- really what you want in a government deciding whether to take a country to war?

The undisputed manliness of the Bush White House stands in contrast to its predecessors and wannabes. If Republicans are the Daddy Party and Democrats the Mommy Party, the Clinton White House often operated like Mansfield's vision of an estrogen-fueled kaffeeklatsch: indecisive and undisciplined. (Okay, there were some unfortunate, testosterone-filled moments, too.) Bill Clinton's would-be successor, Al Gore, was mocked for enlisting Naomi Wolf to help him emerge as an alpha male; after that, French-speaking John Kerry had to give up windsurfing and don hunting gear to prove he was a real man. And Bush's father, of course, had to battle the Wimp Factor. Mansfield recalls Thatcher's manly admonition to 41 on the eve of the Persian Gulf War: "Don't go wobbly on me, George."

No wimpiness worries now. This is an administration headed by a cowboy boot-wearing brush-clearer, backstopped by a quail-shooting fly fisherman comfortable with long stretches of manly silence -- very "Brokeback Mountain," except this crowd considers itself too manly for such PC Hollywood fare. "I would be glad to talk about ranchin', but I haven't seen the movie," Bush told a questioner.

There are, no doubt, comforting aspects to the manly presidency; think Bush with a bullhorn on top of the smoldering ruins of the twin towers. After a terrorist attack, no one's looking for a sensitive New Age president. Even now, being a strong leader polls at the top of qualities that voters most admire in Bush.

But the manliness of the Bush White House has a darker side that has proved more curse than advantage. The prime example is the war in Iraq: the administration's assertion of the right to engage in preemptive and unilateral war; the resolute avoidance of debate about the "slam-dunk" intelligence on weapons of mass destruction; the determined lack of introspection or self-doubt about the course of the war; and the swaggering dismissal of dissenting views as the carping of those not on the team.

The administration's manliness doesn't stop at the water's edge. Pushing another round of tax cuts in 2003, Vice President Cheney sounded like a warrior claiming tribute after victory in battle: "We won the midterms. This is our due," Cheney reportedly said. After the 2004 election, Bush exuded the blustering self-assurance of a president who had political capital to spend -- or thought he did -- and wasn't going to think twice before plunking down the whole pile on Social Security.

Mansfieldian manliness is present as well in Bush's confident -- overconfident -- response to Hurricane Katrina (insert obligatory "Brownie" quote here). And the administration's claim of almost unfettered executive power is the ultimate in manliness: how manly to conclude that Congress gave the go-ahead to ignore a law without it ever saying so; how even manlier to argue that your inherent authority as commander in chief would permit you to brush aside those bothersome congressional gnats if they tried to stop eavesdropping without a warrant.

Mansfield writes that he wants to "convince skeptical readers -- above all, educated women" -- that "irrational manliness deserves to be endorsed by reason." Sorry, professor: You lose. What this country could use is a little less manliness -- and a little more of what you would describe as womanly qualities: restraint, introspection, a desire for consensus, maybe even a touch of self-doubt.

But that's just my view.

Fed Chief: Rates Not Sign Of Slowdown (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

DOJ_NMG_0019964

USA Today, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said Monday the fact that long-term interest rates have stayed low, even though the central bank has been raising short-term rates since mid-2004, does not indicate a major, looming economic slowdown.

But in a speech to the Economic Club of New York, Bernanke said the reasons for the tame long-term rates, unusual during a period of Fed tightening, are unclear, as are the implications for future policy.

If low long-term rates signal investor expectations of a slower economy, a Fed response might be to ease short-term rates. If other factors, such as a decline in long-term inflation fears or higher demand, are in play, that would be more stimulative, and the Fed might need a higher short-term rate, he said.

"I will do a better job of raising questions than of answering them," Bernanke said in his prepared remarks. Bernanke said the Fed should monitor bond yields carefully, "but only in tandem with the signals from other important financial variables."

Long-term interest rates are usually higher than short-term rates because investors demand a premium to guard against uncertainty over the longer time horizon. But since mid-2004, when the Fed began raising short-term rates to guard against inflation, long-term rates have remained unusually low.

The Fed has pushed its target for short-term rates up 3.5 percentage points to 4.5%. The 10-year nominal Treasury note yield, at less than 4.75%, is not much above the Fed's short-term rate and is about even with yields on bonds maturing in one to three years.

Fed funds futures, a market in which investors make bets on future Fed decisions, indicate traders expect the central bank to raise short-term rates by another quarter-point when it meets March 27-28, with a 50% chance of an additional quarter-point increase in May, according to Moody's Economy.com.

Sometimes in the past, a small gap between long- and short-term rates has been followed by an economic slowdown, but Bernanke said he "would not interpret the currently very flat yield curve as indicating a significant economic slowdown to come." In a previous episode, when an inverted yield curve was followed by recession, interest rates were quite high, Bernanke said. Also, if the flatter yield curve reflects lower inflation expectations, it is a positive for the economy.

In a question-and-answer period following his speech, Bernanke said although there are risks, the outlook for consumer spending is still strong. He noted that although home price appreciation is likely slowing, wages were increasing, household wealth is growing and many consumers have locked in mortgages at low rates in recent years.

"Consumer finances are consistent with continued reasonable growth in consumption, enough to keep the economy growing at or close to its potential," Bernanke said. Economists keep a close eye on consumer spending because it accounts for two-thirds of all U.S. economic activity.

Global View Is Backed By Fed Chief (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

Ben S. Bernanke, the newly installed Federal Reserve chairman, suggested yesterday that the central bank would need to pay more attention to global financial conditions in setting interest rates, moving beyond its traditional focus on domestic economic forces.

In a speech to the Economic Club of New York at the Grand Hyatt Hotel in Manhattan, Mr. Bernanke said that to understand the reasons behind movements in American bond yields "an explanation less centered on the United States might be required."

In only his third speech since being sworn in as Fed chairman last month, Mr. Bernanke was also skeptical about the argument that the economy will slow in the near future, a view that many investors may take as a sign that the Fed is not quite near the end of its string of interest rate increases.

Mr. Bernanke built the prepared text of his speech around one of the most pressing puzzles in financial markets today: Why do long-term bond yields remain so low despite steadily rising short-term interest rates?

Traditionally long-term rates have fallen when investors have anticipated a slowdown in the economy or a decline in inflationary pressures. But Mr. Bernanke argued that other factors —including a worldwide imbalance between abundant savings and less robust investment — may be a more powerful explanation for the current phenomenon.

Over time, however, the challenge will come in determining whether global forces are likely to push rates lower than otherwise might be the case — or higher. The answer, Mr. Bernanke said, will be increasingly crucial to the conduct of monetary policy. If long-term yields are low primarily because investors are buying more long-term bonds — be they Chinese central bankers trying to manage the yuan's exchange rate or global investors more comfortable with long-term securities because of a decline of economic volatility — they would be adding an extra lift to consumer spending and business investment. That would tend to push the Fed to raise its key interest rate a little more than it might otherwise have considered appropriate.

"If spending depends on long-term interest rates, special factors that lower the spread between short-term and long-term rates will stimulate aggregate demand," Mr. Bernanke said. Other things being equal, he added, this "argues for greater monetary policy restraint" and higher short-term interest rates.

On the other hand, if the low bond yields are indicating that investors expect an economic slowdown around the corner, it might require the Fed to take a different tack.

The behavior of long-term bond yields has perplexed financial investors for many months. Starting in June 2004, the Fed has raised short-term rates from 1 percent to 4.5 percent in quarter-point increments. Yet the 10-year Treasury bond yield has inched ahead only slightly, and is now less than a quarter of a percentage point higher, creating a pattern known as a flat yield curve.

Financial investors awaited Mr. Bernanke's speech in hopes of combing it for signs of when the Fed might end its series of interest rate increases. The Fed is widely expected to raise its key rate another quarter of a point at its meeting next week, but analysts are divided over whether it will echo that increase in May.

Yet beyond discarding the notion of an economic slowdown, Mr. Bernanke refrained from providing any precise indication of what to expect from the Fed. "The implications for monetary policy of the recent behavior of long-term yields are not at all clear-cut," he said.

There was virtually no reaction in the bond market to Mr. Bernanke's speech, with yields on 2-year notes and 10-year bonds remaining nearly identical.

"This speech is not going to change anybody's mind that the Fed will raise interest rates next week," said Ashraf Laidi, chief currency analyst at MG Financial Group in New York. "But it leaves up in the air what the Fed will do at its next meeting in May."

Mr. Bernanke agreed that domestic factors were still highly important in determining long-term rates, pointing out that the drag on consumer spending from higher-priced energy and expectations that the housing market will cool might be keeping long-term interest rates low even as short-term rates rise.

But he threw a new element into the mix: the possibility that what he has referred to as a "global savings glut" — an excess in global savings over global investment — might also be weighing on long-term rates, with ambiguous implications for American monetary policy.

Considering all these elements left Mr. Bernanke perched on the fence. To the extent that lower long-term yields merely reflect investors increased appetite for long-term debt, he said, "the policy rate associated with a given degree of financial stimulus will be higher than usual."

But "to the extent that long-term rates have been influenced by macroeconomic conditions, including such factors as trends in global savings and investment, the required policy rate will be lower."

Bernanke Dismisses Fears Of US Slowdown (FT)

By Andrew Balls

Financial Times, March 21, 2006

Ben Bernanke, chairman of the Federal Reserve, dismissed the idea on Monday that the low level of long-term interest rates meant investors were pricing in the likelihood of a sharp and imminent slowdown in the economy.

“Although macroeconomic forecasting is fraught with hazards, I would not interpret the currently very flat yield curve as indicating a significant slowdown to come,” Mr Bernanke said, in a speech prepared for delivery in New York on Monday night.

The Fed chairman said that – unlike in past episodes where a flat yield curve had preceded a recession – both short and long-term interest rates remained low. Also, other financial indicators, including narrow corporate bond spreads, suggested that market participants did not harbour “significant reservations” about the economic outlook.

But he said the low level of long-term rates had “ambiguous” implications for the central bank’s policy decisions, as low rates reflected forces boosting US economic performance as well as the drag from the trade deficit.

Mr Bernanke said low long-term rates were in part the result of a decline in the “term premium” investors demand for holding longer-dated securities. This was stimulating economic activity and requiring tighter monetary policy to offset the effect of overall looser financial conditions in the economy.

The lower term premium in part reflects well-anchored inflation expectations, and expectations that the steadier macroeconomic performance of recent years would continue, he said.

But, drawing on his past speeches on the “global savings glut”, Mr Bernanke said low long-term rates also reflected low levels of intended investment in the global economy relative to savings. Sluggish domestic demand growth outside the US, and in turn weak demand for US exports, was holding down global interest rates, resulting in a lower federal funds rate than would otherwise be needed, he said.

The new Fed chairman was careful to avoid drawing conclusions for policy and gave no hint about the point at which the US central bank would stop raising rates. Interest rate futures show that investors are pricing in a rise in the federal funds rate of another quarter point to 4.75 per cent at the Fed's March meeting, and about a 70 per cent chance of a rise to 5 per cent in May

Mr Bernanke concluded: "The implications for monetary policy of the recent behaviour of long-term yields are not at all clear-cut. Given this reality, policymakers are well advised to follow two principles familiar to navigators throughout the ages. First, determine your position frequently. Second, use as many guides or landmarks as available."

The Fed chairman played down the idea that purchases of US bonds by Asian central banks were an overwhelming influence on long-term rates, pointing out that interest rates were also low on other securities less favoured by official investors.

Further Rate Hikes By Fed Uncertain, Bernanke Says (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke said yesterday that it's unclear whether the central bank, seeking to keep the lid on inflation, should raise short-term interest rates much more because unusually low long-term interest rates are stimulating the economy.

Bernanke, in a speech delivered in New York, challenged recent suggestions by many analysts and some Fed officials that the central bank might have to increase its benchmark short-term rate higher than it otherwise would because low long-term borrowing costs continue to spur consumer and business spending.

"The bottom line for [Fed] policy appears ambiguous," Bernanke said, addressing a key concern among investors eager to divine how much higher central bank policymakers will raise their key short-term interest rate.

Bernanke, speaking just one week before his first central bank policymaking meeting as chairman, also repeated that unusually low long-term interest rates do not now presage an economic slowdown, as they have some times in the past.

Futures markets show that investors expect the Fed to raise the rate to 4.75 percent from 4.5 percent next week, and they believe the committee probably will increase the rate again in May to 5 percent.

The Fed has raised the rate at 14 consecutive meetings since June 2004, when it was at 1 percent. The federal funds rate, the rate charged on overnight loans between banks, directly influences other important short-term rates throughout the economy, such as banks' prime rate on business loans and the rates on many consumer loans linked to the prime. Those rates have risen steadily over the last 20 months.

But investors and economists remain puzzled about why long-term rates have not risen as well, and how the Fed should respond.

In the past, a rising federal funds rate also caused increases in long-term rates, such as the yield on the 10-year Treasury bond, which is a benchmark for mortgage rates. But, instead, those rates fell for many months after the Fed began raising the federal funds rate, a surprising development that former Fed chairman Alan Greenspan called a "conundrum."

Long term rates have been rising this year, but remain low. The average rate on a 30-year mortgage, for example, was 6.34 percent last week, or just slightly higher than it averaged in June 2004, according to Freddie Mac.

The yield on the 10-year Treasury bond, at 4.66 percent when the U.S. markets closed yesterday, was "not much" higher than the federal funds rate, Bernanke noted. Indeed, the 10-year yield was slightly lower yesterday than it was the day before the Fed started lifting the federal funds rate.

The appropriate Fed response to this situation is unclear, because it depends on why long-term interest rates remain so low, Bernanke said.

On one hand, investors globally appear to be demanding less compensation for the risk of lending money over time because they expect low inflation and healthy economic growth to continue for many years, he said.

In this case, the Fed would have to raise the federal funds rate to keep inflation in check, Bernanke said, because "the effect is financially stimulative and argues for greater monetary policy restraint."

On the other hand, low long-term rates appear also appear to reflect a surge in the demand for long-term securities by foreign central banks, oil producers, pension funds and other savers worldwide, Bernanke said. He attributed much of this to a "global saving glut," or an excess of saving relative to investment.

In this case, the weak demand for capital means global interest rates, and the Fed's benchmark short-term rate, "will be lower than they otherwise would be," he said.

Bernanke Delves Into Market Puzzle (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0019967

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

Unusually low long-term interest rates could require the Fed to keep the short-term rates it controls higher -- or lower -- than normal, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said. It all depends on what is keeping long-term rates down.

Tackling one of the biggest current puzzles in financial markets, Mr. Bernanke turned to a theory he popularized a year ago to suggest that the Fed ought to keep rates lower than it normally would. He said a glut of world saving -- a result of high saving and weak investment demand across many countries -- might be keeping long-term rates unusually low.

If that is so, then the "neutral" short-term interest rate -- one that neither stimulates nor restrains spending -- will also be lower than normal, Mr. Bernanke said in a speech to the Economic Club of New York last night. Mr. Bernanke has discussed before what he has dubbed a "global saving glut," but his remarks yesterday were the most explicit in explaining what the phenomenon means for Fed policy.

However, Mr. Bernanke said other explanations for low long-term interest rates, such as a shortage of long-term bonds or strong demand from pension funds, would require the Fed to set its key short-term rate target higher than normal. Thus, "the implications for monetary policy of the recent behavior of long-term yields are not at all clear-cut," he concluded.

The Fed, he said, must watch bond yields closely but "only in tandem" with other financial-market prices, data on growth and inflation, and "a goodly helping of qualitative information."

Since June 2004, the Fed has raised its target for the Federal-funds rate charged on overnight loans between banks from 1% to 4.5%, but long-term Treasury yields have remained between 3.75% and 4.75%. Long-term rates are now barely above short-term rates, creating a flat "yield curve," which in the past has often presaged a slowdown or recession.

For the first time since Mr. Bernanke became chairman, the Fed's policy-making committee meets Monday and Tuesday. It is expected to raise the funds rate by one-quarter percentage point to 4.75%. It also is likely to signal a bias to raise rates further, though possibly with less certainty than it has to date.

Although Mr. Bernanke steered away from any clear signal on the direction of interest rates, his speech was notable in that he gave more weight to factors favoring a lower "neutral" funds rate than have some other current and previous Fed officials. Most officials who have studied the issue agree a variety of factors are at work; what differs is their emphasis.

Former Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan had previously suggested low long-term rates mainly reflected increased -- and perhaps, unwarranted -- confidence by investors that future economic growth, market conditions and inflation will be predictable and stable. New York Federal Reserve Bank president Timothy Geithner in a recent speech argued an important factor holding long-term rates down was foreign central banks' purchases of U.S. bonds. Mr. Bernanke, though, gave little weight to the impact of foreign central bank buying. That should have only a "short-term" impact, he said, noting that "long-term yields continued to fall over recent quarters" even as foreign central bank buying of Treasurys slowed.

Mr. Bernanke, like other officials, argued the yield curve did not seem to be foreshadowing a slowdown.

He also sounded an upbeat note on the economic outlook in response to questions after his remarks. While U.S. consumers may boost their saving in coming years as housing prices moderate, that "would not necessarily be a problem for the sustained expansion" and their spending continues to be lifted from past increases in home prices. He added that only about 10% of residential mortgages will be repriced this year, so the impact of higher interest rates will be gradual. He also said it was encouraging that "we are beginning to see cyclical recovery in Europe and Japan."

He also reviewed several structural factors that could be holding down long-term rates. He noted the economy was also less volatile in the 1950s and 1960s and the structure of interest rates was similar. He said pension funds may demand more long-term bonds to fund the benefits of future retirees, while at the same time issuance of very-long-term U.S. dollar bonds has diminished. If these factors explain why long-term rates are so low, "the effect is financially stimulative and argues for" a higher Fed-funds rate, "all else being equal."

Early Data Hint At Weaker Growth For Year Ahead (WSJ)

By John McAuley

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

A gauge of future economic activity slipped 0.2% in February to 139, according to preliminary estimates by the Conference Board.

The private research group said its composite index of leading indicators edged down in February after a revised 0.5% increase in January, when the index was originally reported to have increased 1.1%.

The February reading for the leading index came in slightly less weak than the -0.3% median estimate of 21 economists surveyed by Dow Jones Newswires.

The index was equal to 100 in 1996.

DOJ_NMG_0019968

Though the index of leading indicators has been volatile since Hurricane Katrina struck last year, the reading has been generally flat over the past five months. "This suggests that economic growth in the year ahead should be weaker than in the past year," said Steven Wood, an economist at Insight Economics, in a note to clients. "However, it does not suggest that growth will be extremely sluggish or will turn negative."

The Conference Board noted that five of the 10 indicators that constitute the leading index showed improvement in February. The largest positive contributions came from manufacturers' new orders for nondefense capital goods, followed in order by real money supply, average weekly manufacturing hours, new orders for consumer goods and materials, and the interest-rate spread.

The negative contributors were: vendor performance, the index of consumer expectations, average weekly jobless claims, building permits and stock prices.

The Conference Board's composite index of coincident indicators increased 0.3% in February to 122.1, after no change in January. The index of lagging indicators was up 0.1% in February at 122.6, after a revised 0.5% rise the month before. The Conference Board is a nonprofit research and business membership group that computes the composite indexes formerly compiled by the U.S. Department of Commerce.

Investors Sit On Their Hands (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

Oil prices plunged Monday, a development that normally would send stocks soaring. But Wall Street seemed paralyzed by news of an afterhours speech by Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke, and stocks remained little changed.

Benchmark light, sweet crude futures for April, set to expire Tuesday, fell $2.35, or nearly 4%, to settle at a one-week low of $60.42 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. While the decline didn't spur stocks higher ahead of Mr. Bernanke's speech and a report Tuesday on producer price data, oil is on the radar, and further declines could lend support to stocks.

Jay Suskind, director of trading at Ryan Beck in Florham Park, N.J., said that if oil prices fell significantly below $60, traders will take note. "If it breaks one way or the other, it will have an impact," he said. "It gives more credence to inflation being under control, because certainly energy has a lot to do with it."

Falling oil prices helped at least one group of stocks Monday: airlines. The Dow Jones Transportation Average was up 0.5%, with Continental Airlines and AMR the average's best performers, up 5.4% and 3.3%, respectively. Transport stocks have been hitting all-time highs and the average is up nearly 10% year-to-date.

Overall, the Dow Jones Industrial Average was down 5.12 points to 11274.53, with McDonalds losing 1%. An earlier advance put the average about 30 points shy of its highest level since January 2000, the same month the Dow industrials hit their all-time closing high of 11722.98. Wal-Mart Stores was the best-performing component, up 2.3%, after the retailer said it plans to add 150,000 new jobs in China over the next five years.

Other indexes were little changed but still near multiyear highs. The Nasdaq Composite Index, heavy with technology stocks, rose 7.63 to 2314.11. Microsoft gained 1.4% on reports that it is working on a secret hardware project with chip maker Transmeta; Dell was ahead by 2.3% on news it plans to double the number of its mostly call-center employees in India to 20,000. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slid 2.17 to 1305.08.

Treasury bond prices were higher, sending yields lower. The benchmark 10-year Treasury note was up 5/32, or $1.56 for each $1,000 invested, at 98 25/32 to yield 4.66%. The 30-year bond was up 11/32 at 96 30/32, yielding 4.70%.

With little economic data on tap today, stock and bond traders are mostly waiting on Mr. Bernanke's speech tonight at the Economic Club of New York, and tomorrow's report on the producer prices. Little is expected from the speech, but that isn't stopping the market from following the new Fed chief's every utterance just a week before he presides over his first Federal Open Market Committee monetary-policy meeting.

"Bernanke is going to define what is going to happen to interest rates," said Paul J. Nolte, director of investments at Hinsdale Associates in Chicago, adding that the Fed chief isn't likely to say anything new or too eventful ahead of next week's meeting. "Everyone is lining up for one and done at this point. Wall Street is going to parse his words very closely to get to expectations."

While policy makers are widely expected to raise rates another quarter-percentage point to 4.75%, the outlook after that has become less clear amid signs that economic growth is slowing. Last week, stocks rallied after the consumer price index excluding food and energy rose just 0.1%, raising hopes that the Fed won't raise rates more than once or twice more. This week will bring more fodder with the PPI, due tomorrow morning. The measure of wholesale prices rose at a 0.3% rate in January, and the "core" rate, which excludes food and energy, jumped 0.4%, sending stocks lower.

In today's sole economic release, the Conference Board said that leading indicators fell 0.2% last month, a more moderate decline6 than the 0.3% decline expected by economists. While the figure shows that economic growth is slowing and supports the case for the Fed halting its rate increases, market reaction to was limited.

The housing market may offer more evidence of a slowdown amid rising interest rates. Boston Fed President Cathy Minehan said in a speech to the New England Realtors Conference that while the short-term economic outlook remains positive, there are other risks to the longer-term outlook, she said, and the housing sector is "one of the greatest areas of uncertainty." Also speaking today is San Francisco Fed President Janet Yellen at the 2006 national Community Reinvestment Conference.

After the market closed, Oracle said its fiscal third-quarter net profit jumped 42% as revenue climbed 18% on stronger demand for its database and business applications software. A new crop of value investors will be carefully watching7 Oracle's financial results, The Wall Street Journal reported, digging for clues about whether the software giant's stock has become cheap enough to buy. Shares were up 1% in regular trading, but pulled back in after-hours trade.

In major market action:

Stocks were mixed8. On the New York Stock Exchange, where 1.42 billion shares traded, 1,464 stocks rose and 1,869 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 1.97 billion shares traded, 1,527 rose and 1,505 declined.

Bonds gained9. The benchmark 10-year Treasury rose 5/32 point, or $1.56 for every $1,000 invested, to yield 4.66%. The 30-year bond added 11/32 to yield 4.70%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar advanced.10 It traded at 116.28 yen, up from 115.82 yen late Friday, while the euro fell to $1.2165 from $1.2195.

Blue Chips Pull Back In Cautious Trading (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

Following its biggest weekly gain in two months, the Dow Jones Industrial Average edged backward, as investors awaited an evening speech on interest rates by the Federal Reserve's new chairman, Ben Bernanke.

As analysts speculated about whether Mr. Bernanke would use his speech to the Economic Club of New York to hint at when rate increases might end, the Dow Jones Industrial Average inched down 5.12 points, or 0.05%, to 11274.53, little changed from Friday's 4½-year high. It is up 5.2% this year. Trading volume was below average.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index also pulled back from last week's 4½-year highs, though the Nasdaq Composite Index managed a small gain.

"People were just kind of waiting to hear" Mr. Bernanke's interest-rate comments, said Mike McDonald, a trader at Boston-based brokerage firm Canaccord Adams. An end to rate hikes soon would help stocks by holding down costs for businesses and consumers.

The index of leading indicators declined in February, the Conference Board announced, suggesting that economic growth may be slowing. Slower growth makes it easier for the Fed to stop raising rates.

Treasury-bond prices rose slightly, pushing yields lower, on hopes for some kind of signal from Mr. Bernanke.

Investors also were expecting that today's report on February wholesale prices would show a decline, to go with the very small rise in February consumer prices announced last week. Tame inflation reduces fears of an overheating economy, which makes it easier for the Fed to stop raising rates.

Oracle announced strong quarterly profits, but, in a sign of investors' rising expectations, it wasn't enough to keep the stock from falling 3.1% in after-hours trading.

The Nasdaq composite rose 0.33%, or 7.63 points, to 2314.11, up 4.9% this year. The S&P 500 fell 0.17%, or 2.17 points, to 1305.08, up 4.6% this year.

Crude-oil futures sagged $2.35 to $60.42 a barrel on signs that supplies remain strong. Gold, however, continued its rebound, up $1.10 to $555.20 a troy ounce.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.39%, or 0.84 point, to another record, 214.85.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks were mixed1; bonds gained2. The 10-year Treasury note rose 4/32, or $1.25 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.658%. The 30-year bond was up 10/32 to yield 4.699%.

The dollar strengthened.3 Late in New York, it traded at 116.21 yen, up from 115.82, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2170 from $1.2195.

The Daily Grail: 'Da Vinci Code' Trial Wraps Up (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0019970

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

LONDON, March 20 -- The "Da Vinci Code" copyright infringement trial, which ended in a London courtroom Monday, combined lively peeks into a celebrity author's lifestyle and hours of legal arcana so numbing that they put a white-wigged attorney to sleep within feet of the judge.

Fans of media-shy author Dan Brown learned that his inspiration to write fiction came on a Tahitian vacation when he read Sidney Sheldon's alien-invasion thriller "The Doomsday Conspiracy." The next day lawyers were arguing about obscure points of religious history, such as whether and why Pepin the Fat murdered Dagobert II, and what Godefroi de Bouillon was really up to during the First Crusade.

In 12 days of testimony over three weeks, authors Michael Baigent and Richard Leigh tried to prove that Brown stole the idea for his mega-selling novel from a nonfiction book they published in 1982, "The Holy Blood and the Holy Grail." Judge Peter Smith, a man so soft-spoken that his words often seemed to have trouble escaping his thick black mustache, said he hoped to issue a ruling by April 8.

At stake is a multimillion-dollar slice of Brown's pie, which includes sales of nearly 40 million books and an upcoming Hollywood film starring Tom Hanks that, if "Da Vinci's" luck holds, is expected to sell movie tickets and Raisinets from here to the Sea of Tranquillity. (And next week the paperback, a massive 5 million copies, will finally hit U.S. shelves.)

John Baldwin, attorney for Random House U.K., the British publisher of both "Da Vinci" and "Holy Blood" and defendant in the lawsuit, said in his closing statement that the case of Baigent and Leigh is "in tatters." Baldwin said Baigent's testimony was so unreliable that he is either "deluded," "extremely dishonest" or a "complete fool."

Jonathan Rayner James, attorney for Baigent and Leigh, was equally unimpressed with Brown, a clean-cut former prep-school English teacher who traveled from the seclusion of his New Hampshire home to spend nearly three days on the witness stand.

"His evidence should be approached with deep suspicion," James argued in his closing statement, calling Brown uncooperative. He said Brown was evasive about key facts, such as when he purchased a copy of "The Holy Blood," which Baigent and Leigh wrote with a third author, Henry Lincoln, who is not a party to the lawsuit.

In the courtroom, Brown appeared to take great pains to remain polite and patient during lengthy questioning by James, one of Britain's leading copyright specialists.

Brown, who explained his wife, Blythe Brown, does a lot of his research, acknowledged reading "The Holy Blood and the Holy Grail." He mentions it prominently in "The Da Vinci Code" and on the stand he admitted that he had "reworked" passages from it for use in his book. He said he never copied directly and using the reworked passages is "how you incorporate research into a novel."

Brown said the book was one of dozens he used to research his novel, and he didn't consult it until well after he had formulated the main plot. But James argued that he had a copy of the book much earlier and that it was much more important to the research than Brown admitted.

Smith, the judge, aggressively challenged James's arguments throughout the day Monday and repeatedly questioned the basis for the suit. He asked James how he could argue that Brown was hiding the fact that he read "The Holy Blood and the Holy Grail" when his characters in "The Da Vinci Code" discuss it admiringly in one scene.

"What's his point in shouting it from the treetops in the text?" Smith asked.

The trial attracted reporters from around the world, and all manner of hangers-on. Bored-looking British teenagers on a school trip came one day, while a steady stream of cheery American tourists -- most of them obvious Brown fans -- made their way through the metal detectors and up to the 10th-floor tribunal in London's ornate Royal Courts of Justice.

On Monday two young men in their early twenties wandered in, one wearing a Las Vegas sweat shirt and the other clutching Frommer's guide to London. With Brown long since departed, they crept back out after 15 minutes of dry-as-dust legal arguing between James and Smith.

Lynn Picknett and Clive Prince attended every day of the trial. Brown used a book they wrote, "The Templar Revelation," in his research and mentioned it in his novel. Rather than suing, Picknett and Prince said they sent Brown a thank-you note.

"It was something of an honor, we thought," Picknett said.

Much of the case, and almost all of Monday's final arguments, centered on what can be protected under copyright law, and how extensively an author can use the product of another's research and writing.

James argued that Brown had lifted the central themes of Baigent and Leigh's book. But Baldwin countered that those themes were not protected by copyright law because they were so general, and most of them had been published in other books before Baigent and Leigh's.

DOJ_NMG_0019971

Both books involve the idea that Jesus married Mary Magdalene, that they had a child and that the bloodline continues to the present. There are also significant differences, including that Baigent and Leigh posit that Jesus did not die on the cross. Brown sticks to the traditional story of Jesus's death.

Brown attended the trial until he finished testifying, but his place at the front table was empty Monday. Leigh and Baigent were still in their familiar seats, Leigh in his regular brown leather jacket and aviator sunglasses, with stringy hair, mutton chops and mustache, looking like he just rode his Harley in from Daytona Beach.

Baigent, whose book "The Jesus Papers" comes out next month, sat next to Leigh wearing a crisp gray suit and tie. In the hall as the last day of the trial started, he said he was ready for it to be over.

"I'm shattered," he said, referring to his exhaustion. "It's just been really tiring."

Swing Is Still King At The Polls (WP)

By Mark J. Penn

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

We hear it every day: America is divided into two camps -- red and blue -- and the key to elections is just energizing the base.

But in fact, while the base is critical, it's not the whole picture. Behind all the rhetoric, the reality is that swing is still king. The two or three or 10 voters who are the quietest in focus groups, who never demonstrate and who belong to no political party, will be the ones who determine the political course of America.

This is less true in Washington, where everyone has to choose sides to survive, but outside the Beltway, trends show that voters are increasingly open and flexible, not rigid. They are looking at candidates' records and visions, not their party affiliation.

In the past 50 years independents have grown from one-quarter to one-third of the electorate, according to Gallup polls. In California, the number of independent voters more than doubled between 1991 and 2005. The fastest-growing political party in the United States is no party.

According to the American National Election Studies at the University of Michigan, the number of split-ticket voters in the electorate -- meaning people who vote for a Democrat for president and a Republican for Congress, or vice versa -- has gone up 42 percent since 1952. That shows a radical new willingness on the part of Americans to look at individual candidates, not party slates. It is a sign of a thinking electorate, not a partisan one.

When asked, Americans have a characteristic swagger and express that they definitely will or will not vote for candidates and parties. In 1995, 65 percent of voters said they would never vote for Bill Clinton. One year later they reelected him in a landslide.

Recent polls show that rather than a static electorate, we have a dynamically changing one. Based on the polls six months ago, journalists were declaring Republican hegemony. Today, Democrats have the widest margin in two decades on the generic congressional vote.

Was there a sudden surge in the number of hard-core Democrats answering surveys, or was it just a matter of America's swing voters deciding that President Bush is failing on the economy, the war and, recently, national security, by compromising the ports? Clearly, there is a massive swing electorate out there that is receiving more information from more sources than ever before -- and acting on it.

According to CNN exit polls, in the presidential elections of 1996, 2000 and 2004, one-fifth to one-third of voters made up their minds in the last month before the vote. Indeed, in the summer of 2004, voters swung from an eight-point lead for John Kerry to a 13-point lead for Bush, and in the end gave Bush a victory by only three points.

We can expect the same variability in the 2006 and 2008 elections. In a Gallup poll from last August, 83 percent of Americans said either that they hadn't seriously considered who they'll support or that they weren't really paying much attention. Asked in January whether they would vote for a Republican or Democrat for president in 2008, 34 percent of registered voters said "neither" or that they could go either way.

And an analysis of the last presidential election shows that while turnout was indeed higher, it was higher on both sides, canceling out the impact of the appeals to the two bases. Middle-aged women and Hispanic voters were the key voting blocs that made the difference, swinging the vote from Kerry to Bush. In fact, in 2004 women made up 54 percent of the U.S. electorate, the highest percentage in history. Their interest in and impact on politics has been increasing.

Choosing between appealing to the base and the swing vote is, as President Bill Clinton would say, a "false choice." His signature policies -- family and medical leave, 100,000 cops, middle-class tax cuts, a strong national defense, and a balanced budget -- drew support from both Democratic die-hards and voters in the vitalcenter.

In 1996 we identified soccer moms as the critical swing voters. Today they remain at the center of the swing vote, but they're a decade older and their kids are going off to college. Now they get their information from the Internet as well as TV, radio and print media, making them the most informed swing voters in history. And while they had little time when their kids were 6 and 8, many of those boomers are now getting some extra time to think about what's going on in America and the world.

These voters are untethered to either political party. While it's become conventional wisdom to say that voters' minds are firmly made up, and that certain candidates can or cannot win, it's just not true. The growing bloc of swing voters takes a hard look at candidates much later in the process, and they adjust and shift as they gather information. They may seem like wallflowers in the political process right now, but they are the ones a successful campaign eventually needs to cross the finish line.

Sabo to retire

Rep. Martin Olav Sabo is retiring after 46 years in state and national politics, saying Congress has become more polarized and less hardworking during his years there.

The 68-year-old Minnesota Democrat, known for his understated style, said he sensed it was time to quit.

"I've always believed the fundamental problem with politics today are people who overpromise and overstate. I've tried to do the opposite," Mr. Sabo said Saturday. "I've also tried to treat my colleagues with respect. I don't recall ever making a public statement critical of my colleague, whether it's Democrat or Republican."

Mr. Sabo was first elected to the state House the same year John F. Kennedy won the presidency, then spent almost 28 years in Congress. He serves on the House Appropriations Committee and has helped steer millions of dollars to the Minneapolis-St. Paul area.

His retirement at the end of the term is expected to set off a stampede among Democrats eager to succeed him in his liberal Minneapolis district, where John Kerry won 71 percent of the vote in the 2004 presidential election, the Associated Press reports. State Rep. Keith Ellison and Gary Schiff, a member of the Minneapolis City Council, both said they will run in the Sept. 12 state primary.

Nominee blocked

Sen. John Ensign, a former veterinarian, didn't like the way pet evacuations were handled after Hurricane Katrina, but Senate insiders say that is not why the Nevada Republican has a hold on the nomination of Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen to be the Coast Guard commandant.

Adm. Allen, who took over post-Katrina operations after Mike Brown was fired from the Federal Emergency Management Agency, was nominated by President Bush in January to take over the 200-year-old Coast Guard.

Jack Flynn, Mr. Ensign's spokesman, says his boss has a "series of questions we want answered from the nominee before the senator is comfortable moving forward," but declined to say what issues the questions address.

The hold has baffled some former Coast Guard officials, including Stephen Flynn, a retired Coast Guard commander and senior fellow for the Council on Foreign Relations.

"Surely, he can find a better way to advance his pet issue of pet evacuation other than tripping up the appointment of the most highly respected Coast Guard leader of the one agency that earned universal acclaim in the Katrina disaster," Mr. Flynn said.

Mr. Ensign met with Adm. Allen last fall to discuss rescue efforts and the plight of abandoned animals, but a Capitol Hill source familiar with the hold procedures says it is not related to animal rescues.

Ultrasound images

Michigan Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm will sign a bill requiring abortion providers to give pregnant women the option to see ultrasound images of their fetuses, a spokeswoman says.

Mrs. Granholm, a Democrat, generally has opposed legislation that regulates or limits abortion, but the bill was amended so it no longer requires pregnant women to see the ultrasound images, spokeswoman Liz Boyd said Sunday.

Until now, Michigan law has required that women seeking abortions be allowed to review diagrams and descriptions showing a developing fetus, but not their own.

Pro-life advocates hailed the new law. Right to Life of Michigan said it ensures that pregnant women have fuller access to accurate information before having abortions. Critics called it a further erosion of women's rights, the Associated Press reports.

Former Vice President Al Gore said yesterday he has no plans to run for president in 2008, but hasn't ruled out a future in politics.

"I'm enjoying what I'm doing," Mr. Gore told an audience at Middle Tennessee State University, where he gave a lecture on global warming, according to the Associated Press.

"I'm not planning to be a candidate again. I haven't reached a stage in my life where I'm willing to say I will never consider something like this," he said. "But I'm not saying that to be coy. I'm just saying that to be honest -- that I haven't reached that point."

Vacation days

The House of Representatives is on track this year to be in session for fewer days than the Congress Harry S. Truman labeled as "do-nothing" during his 1948 re-election campaign, USA Today reports.

Members of Congress are taking an entire week off for St. Patrick's Day. It's the latest scheduling innovation to give members more time to meet with constituents. Through Friday, the House was in session for 19 days this year, compared with 33 for the Senate, USA Today reporter Kathy Kiely writes.

If they stick to their current schedule -- including two weeks off in April, a week in May and July, plus all of August -- House members will spend 97 days in Washington this year. The House was in session 108 days in 1948, according to the chamber's archives, compared with 141 days last year.

Failure to vote

Republican U.S. Senate hopeful Kathleen Troia McFarland, who repeatedly skipped New York elections, failed to vote for President Reagan even while working for him in Washington, the New York Post reports, citing newly acquired records.

Mrs. McFarland, a Park Avenue matron who says she drafted Mr. Reagan's "Star Wars" defense proposal while serving as a high-level Pentagon official from 1982 to 1985, didn't vote in 1984, when the president was seeking re-election, records obtained by the Post show.

An official voter profile from the Washington, D.C., Board of Elections & Ethics shows Mrs. McFarland, who hopes to challenge Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, registered to vote from a Washington address in June 1983, when she served as deputy assistant secretary of defense for public affairs, a position she describes as equivalent to a three-star general.

Schumer's 'skinheads'

"Don't look now, but we think Charles Schumer just compared Arab businessmen to skinheads," the Weekly Standard's Scrapbook column says.

"According to a piece in the New York Observer last week, Schumer's beating the drums to kill the Dubai ports deal came under fire from many quarters, with some critics suggesting that opposition to the deal was driven by xenophobia or anti-Arab racism. Mr. Schumer heatedly disputes that view. 'Let's say skinheads had bought a company to take over our port,' he said. 'I think the outcry would have been the same.'

"So why exactly do businessmen who happen to be Arabs deserve to be compared with skinheads, Mr. Schumer?"

A Gore Comeback? New Run At President Has Historic Precedents (AJC)

By Scott Shepard

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — Is history calling Al Gore back into the political fray?

History says candidates who won the popular vote but lost in the electoral college have all gotten their revenge with victories in subsequent elections. And now, after years of calling himself a "recovering politician," Gore is flirting again with politics.

Or is he?

Even those who were part of his inner circle in 2000, when Gore lost the White House to George W. Bush in one of the closest and most controversial presidential elections in American history, still don't have a clear idea what the former vice president is thinking in terms of a 2008 campaign.

"I do not know for sure if he's looking or flirting," Donna Brazile, his 2000 campaign manager, said in an interview Monday. "But, I have an opinion — Gore remains a headliner and can raise money and rally the base."

Speculation about Gore's intentions has intensified in recent weeks due to three events: his Martin Luther King Jr. holiday speech in January lambasting the president for "breaking the law" with his warrantless domestic surveillance program; his message to Democratic donors in February soliciting funds for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee; and his party fund-raising appearances this month in Florida, the scene of the contentious vote recount that ended with a Supreme Court ruling that made Bush president in the 2000 election.

Gore's activities prompted pollster Lee Miringoff to include Gore in a recent poll on possible Democratic 2008 contenders. It found Gore was second only to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York. Clinton was the favorite of 33 percent, Gore was the choice of 17 percent.

"The numbers suggest that a case could be made for Mr. Gore in 2008 ... though it's a little unclear what he may have in mind," Miringoff said in an interview. "Clearly, he is someone to be watched, especially as an alternative to Hillary Clinton."

Chris Lehane, who was Gore's chief spokesman in the vice presidential office and later in the presidential campaign, noted in an interview that "Gore has been pretty public that he does not intend to run in 2008" and, he added, "I do think that this is indeed where his head is right now."

But political analysts, in considering the prospect of a Gore comeback, cite the historic precedents of candidates who won the popular vote but lost the electoral college vote, only to win later: Andrew Jackson, losing in 1824 and winning in 1828, and Grover Cleveland, denied in 1888 but triumphant in 1892.

Gore "may be a man whose time has come in his party," Dick Morris, a political adviser to Bill Clinton for 20 years, wrote recently in his column for The Hill newspaper. "Like a completely refurbished 'pre-owned vehicle,' Al Gore seems to be positioning himself to Hillary Clinton's left and greener than John Kerry ... His slogan might well read 're-elect Al Gore.' "

Longtime Republican operative Roger Stone Jr. made similar points in a column for the New York Observer, citing "uncanny parallels" in the careers of Gore and Richard Nixon, who narrowly lost the White House in 1960 but rebounded to win it in 1968.

But Brazile acknowledged that there are "some voters [who] want a complete break from the past and may not look favorably on [his] return to the political fight."

Gore's office in Nashville did not respond to telephone inquiries Monday, but the former vice president has previously told The Associated Press he has "no plans to seek the presidency in 2008."

There is no evidence he is assembling any kind of campaign organization. In a recent survey of Gore's friends and organizers in New Hampshire, James Pindell, managing editor of PoliticsNH.com, found none had been contacted about 2008.

"They seem to be convinced he is not running" and will not visit the state, which traditionally hosts the first presidential primary, Pindell said Monday.

Occasionally, Gore even seems like an anti-candidate. For example, he is scheduled to be in Seattle on Thursday to talk about global warming, but he has insisted on no press coverage, sparking some angry newspaper editorials.

However, "in the Internet age, there is the potential for someone with his profile to mount a non-conventional campaign," said Lehane, "someone with a high name identification, someone who could raise money online, someone with prime time experience and someone who could potentially attract support from the angry left."

Rice Not Interested In Football Job For Now (AP-Y2)

AP2, March 20, 2006

Condoleezza Rice, a bona fide football fan, is not applying for the newly opened post of NFL commissioner — not now, anyhow, her spokesman said carefully on Monday.

Rice, who is avid particularly in support of the Cleveland Browns, is enjoying being secretary of state "at the moment," spokesman Sean McCormack said.

The wiggle-room in his response after NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue announced he would retire resonated off frequent only half-joking statements by Rice that as a lifelong football fan she aspires to run the league one day.

She may also aspire to be president or vice president, at least there has been speculation that she might wind up on the Republican ticket in 2008.

The owner of the New England Patriots, Bob Kraft, for one, seems to be in Rice's corner for the football post.

Kraft told CNBC that he had dinner with Rice a few months ago and found her to be "tremendously capable and highly competent."

"I am flattered that she is interested in joining us," Kraft said. "But, of course, I am only one of 32."

BANGALORE, India, Mar. 20 — Dell, the world's largest maker of personal computers, plans to double its employee strength in India to 20,000, and is scouting for a site to set up a manufacturing unit in the country, its chairman, Michael Dell, said today.

"There is a fantastic opportunity to attract talent," Mr. Dell said, referring to the country's technically qualified, English-speaking pool of workers. "We will ensure a major recruitment push in engineering talents," he said in a press meeting during a visit to Bangalore, India's outsourcing capital.

Dell, which is based in Round Rock, Tex., has four call centers in India, where the bulk of its 10,000 employees work, as well as software development and product testing centers.

Dell plans to double its hardware engineering staff to 600 in one year, Mr. Dell said.

Dell's statement today followed similar pronouncements by Microsoft Corp and Cisco Systems which plan to double and treble, respectively, their Indian headcounts.

Many Western multinationals, particularly technology companies, have recently been moving many key functions such as design and research and development to India. Many of these were earlier in the forefront of shifting software development and back office work like call centers to this country.

Salaries in India are rising rapidly, but still are about a fifth of what they are in the West for comparable jobs.

Mr. Dell said his firm was talking with several state governments about a site for manufacturing plant..

In a market where the penetration of computers is very low, companies such as Dell are eager to set up a manufacturing base to help expand sales. Dell accounts for about four percent of the 4 million computers purchased in India.

Sales of computers in India are expected to grow to 20 million a year in the next few years.

The GOP's Shrinking Middle (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

Members of Congress retire all the time, but some retirements are leading indicators of the direction of our politics. Rep. Sherwood Boehlert's announcement last week to call it quits matters, and in a depressing way.

The affable 69-year-old New York Republican is one of the last of a breed: a liberal Republican, though he calls himself a "moderate" and has the record to prove it. Boehlert's departure does not leave the House bereft of liberal Republicans -- Rep. Jim Leach of Iowa is more liberal than Boehlert. But Leach, alas, is an outlier. The spotted owl is in good shape compared with liberal Republicans.

Boehlert chose to retire in the year when National Journal, the political world's answer to Sports Illustrated, featured him as the ultimate "Down the Middle" guy. In its Feb. 25 issue, the magazine published its annual ratings, which showed that Boehlert's votes were more liberal than those of 52.2 percent of House members and more conservative than 47.8 percent. Boehlert's district includes the Baseball Hall of Fame in Cooperstown, and it's hard to move the ball more to the middle of the plate than he does.

It's been downhill for his brand of Republicanism from the moment he set foot in Washington as a congressional staffer in 1964. That's the year Barry Goldwater won the Republican presidential nomination and the great flight of the Republican liberals began.

After Goldwater's landslide defeat, two Republican progressives who later became conservatives, George Gilder and Bruce Chapman, wrote a brilliant book called "The Party That Lost Its Head," detailing how and why the party's liberal wing responded so anemically to the conservative challenge. But it was too late. The party of Abraham Lincoln and Theodore Roosevelt was destined to become an annex of the conservative movement.

Boehlert has always been unabashed in embracing his liberal roots. Over breakfast on a sunny summer morning in Cooperstown five years ago, Boehlert embraced two of the most progressive politicians of his lifetime. "People say to me: 'Why are you the kind of Republican you are?' Because in my formative political years, when I was coming up in New York, my governor was Nelson A. Rockefeller and my senator was Jacob K. Javits."

Why does the decline and fall of liberal Republicanism matter? After all, rationalizing the political system into a more conservative GOP and a more-or-less liberal Democratic Party makes the alternatives clearer to voters, who are offered, in Goldwater's famous phrase, "a choice, not an echo."

But it turns out that a Republican Party dominated by conservatives is no more coherent than the party that left room for progressives. The huge budget deficit is conservatism's Waterloo, testimony to its political failure. The conservatives love to cut taxes but can't square their lust for tax reduction with plausible spending cuts. Oh, yes, a group of House conservatives has a paper plan involving deep program cuts, but other conservatives know that these cuts will not pass, and shouldn't.

Paradoxically, because the liberal Republicans didn't pretend to hate government, they were better at fiscal responsibility. They were willing to match their desired spending levels with the taxes to pay for them. It didn't make for exciting, to-the-barricades politics. It merely produced good government.

Boehlert, being an optimist by nature, was always ready to declare that the "moderates' moment" had finally arrived. Last November, after I had written a column taking some moderate Republicans to task for backing the outrageous budget bill that passed under the cover of darkness at 1:30 a.m., there was Boehlert on the phone insisting that he and fellow moderate Mike Castle (R-Del.) had wrung some important concessions out of the House leadership. Maybe so, I replied, but I had a higher opinion of moderate Republicans and expected more of them than that lousy budget bill.

The problem may be that Boehlert and Castle did get as much as they could, given the numerical weakness of their variety of Republicanism, but that's not good enough. I suspect Boehlert knows this. Absent a robust progressive wing, congressional Republicans will continue to produce fiscally incoherent government. Democrats now have the task of representing their own brand of politics, and that of progressive Republicans, too.

I'll miss Boehlert and his optimistic moderation. Our politics worked better when a sufficiently large band of Republican moderates and liberals could take the edge off polarization and orient government toward problem-solving. But the liberal Republicans are gone. We have to deal with the GOP we have, not the GOP we wish still existed.

Citing Foreign Law (WP)

IN A SPEECH last month at the Constitutional Court of South Africa, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg made some unfair insinuations about critics of the use of foreign law in American courts. Justice Ginsburg was defending what is, in our view, a perfectly defensible proposition: that American courts should "learn from legal systems with values and a commitment to democracy similar to our own." Yet in doing so, she managed to link those who take an opposing view to the legacies of slavery and apartheid and to paint them as "fuel[ing] the irrational fringe" in its threats against judges.

To hear Justice Ginsburg describe the matter, you'd think the use of foreign law presents an easy question, legally and morally. In her speech, she quoted language from Chief Justice Roger Taney's infamous Dred Scott decision that rejected the notion that European opinions ought to guide American understanding of the Constitution. She went on to note that South Africa under apartheid also rejected the influence of foreign law, while its 1996 constitution explicitly invites its consideration. And she attacked members of Congress for introducing bills to eliminate the use of foreign precedents in American judicial decisions. Such legislation, she suggested, was responsible for an incident in which someone posted a call on the Internet for her and then-Justice Sandra Day O'Connor to be assassinated.

We don't support such legislation, but its advocates present one side of a valid debate, and there is no cause to blame them for the incitements of others. In the debate over foreign law, neither side has a monopoly on wisdom.

We agree with Justice Ginsburg and the court majority that American courts need not pretend that foreign courts do not exist. Law review articles, after all, constitute a legitimate, even routine, source of guidance for American adjudication; why not the considered judgment of a competent foreign tribunal? At the same time, Justice Antonin Scalia offers some reasonable criticisms of how the court has used foreign precedents -- that is, selectively, when foreign law supports results that the court cannot justify based on American authorities alone. As Justice Scalia points out, justices cite foreign precedents in capital cases, where European law is far more liberal than American law, but not in abortion cases, where it is more restrictive.

One doesn't have to agree, in other words, that foreign law has no place in American courts to worry that courts are using foreign law too politically. And one doesn't need to be Chief Justice Taney -- or a South African racist or an aspiring domestic terrorist -- to believe that it would be better if courts did not interpret America's founding documents in light of foreign authorities that postdate them. Justice Ginsburg has a strong case to make without stooping to such insinuations.

Some U.S. Officials Fear Iran Is Helping Al Qaeda (LAT)

By Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — U.S. intelligence officials, already focused on Iran's potential for building nuclear weapons, are struggling to solve a more immediate mystery: the murky relationship between the new Tehran leadership and the contingent of Al Qaeda leaders residing in the country.

Some officials, citing evidence from highly classified satellite feeds and electronic eavesdropping, believe the Iranian regime is playing host to much of Al Qaeda's remaining brain trust and allowing the senior operatives freedom to communicate and help plan the terrorist network's operations.

DOJ_NMG_0019977

And they suggest that new President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad may be forging an alliance with Al Qaeda operatives as a way to expand Iran's influence or, at a minimum, that he is looking the other way as Al Qaeda leaders in his country collaborate with their counterparts elsewhere.

"Iran is becoming more and more radicalized and more willing to turn a blind eye to the Al Qaeda presence there," a U.S. counter-terrorism official said.

The accusations from U.S. officials about Iranian nuclear ambitions and ties to Al Qaeda echo charges that Bush administration figures made about Iraq in the run-up to the U.S.-led invasion three years ago.

Those charges about Iraq have been discredited. And in the case of Iran, some intelligence officials and analysts are unconvinced. If anything, they suggest, the escalating tensions between Shiite and Sunni Muslims in Iraq would logically cause Iran's Shiite government to crack down on Al Qaeda, whose Sunni leadership has denounced Shiites as infidels.

A U.S. intelligence official said he did not see any relaxation in Iran's restrictions on Al Qaeda members.

"I'm not getting the sense that these people are free to roam, free to plot," the official said.

Still, the official acknowledged that the relationship between Tehran and Al Qaeda officials within Iran was largely unknown to U.S. and allied intelligence, especially since Ahmadinejad's election last summer.

To some U.S. intelligence officials, what worries them most is what they don't know.

"I don't need to exaggerate the difficulty in determining what these people are up to at any given moment," the intelligence official said.

The U.S. counter-terrorism official was more blunt. "We don't have any intelligence going on in Iran. No people on the ground," he said. "It blows me away the lack of intelligence that's out there."

U.S., European and Arab intelligence officials spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss the issues publicly.

Ties between Iran and Al Qaeda were highlighted by the Sept. 11 commission, which disclosed a wealth of details about such connections in its final report. The commission said Iran and Al Qaeda had worked together sporadically throughout the 1990s, trading secrets, including some related to making explosives.

Iranian representatives to the United Nations did not return repeated phone calls seeking comment.

In November, the State Department's third-ranking official, Undersecretary R. Nicholas Burns, said the United States believed "that some Al Qaeda members and those from like-minded extremist groups continue to use Iran as a safe haven and as a hub to facilitate their operations."

A year ago, Iranian delegates to a global counter-terrorism conference circulated a document describing Iran as "a major victim of terrorism." The document blamed links between drug trafficking and terrorism for "thousands of security problems," especially along Iran's eastern border with Afghanistan and Pakistan.

Al Qaeda operatives and family members have lived in Iran for years, many since late 2001, when they fled the U.S. bombing of Afghanistan. Many other Al Qaeda figures fled to Pakistan — a U.S. ally — and are believed to be there still.

Three months ago, Iran declared that no Al Qaeda members remained in the country, but U.S. officials rejected the claim. At other times, Iranian officials said that Al Qaeda members there were kept under house arrest and their activities monitored.

In Tehran, analysts said American officials were misreading Iran's intentions. The fact that the government has not turned over Al Qaeda suspects to the United States should come as no surprise given the state of relations between the two countries, said Nasser Hadian, a political analyst at Tehran University.

"They won't. Why should they" without receiving something in return? he said. "Unfortunately, now everything is becoming commercialized, if I may use that term. Everything is being assessed on its value in negotiations, and that is on both sides."

Some of the suspects have been indicted in the United States in connection with terrorist attacks, including the 1998 bombings of two U.S. embassies in East Africa, but Iran has refused to extradite them.

Among them is Saif Adel, believed to be one of the highest-ranking members of Al Qaeda, behind Osama bin Laden and Ayman Zawahiri. Whatever restrictions might be placed on the network's activities within Iran, Adel — who has a $5-million U.S. bounty on his head — was able last year to post a lengthy dispatch about Al Qaeda activities in Iran and Iraq that was widely circulated on the Internet. U.S. intelligence officials consider the posting authentic.

In the dispatch, Adel said he had used hide-outs in Iran to plot with Abu Musab Zarqawi to make Iraq the new battleground in the group's war against the United States. Iran had detained many of Zarqawi's men, Adel wrote, but they ultimately slipped into Iraq and began attacking U.S. forces.

For several years, the U.S. counter-terrorism official said, satellite feeds have helped officials monitor some of the day-to-day activities and movements of Adel and other senior Al Qaeda operatives in Iran. The intelligence suggests that the Al Qaeda leaders have been monitored by Iranian authorities but could move and communicate somewhat, the official said.

U.S. officials also said that other senior Al Qaeda figures — including Zarqawi, now the group's point man in Iraq — had moved in and out of Iran with the possible knowledge or complicity of Iranian officials.

The Al Qaeda members in Iran include three of Bin Laden's sons, including Saad and Hamza, who are thought to be his heirs apparent. Some of Bin Laden's wives and other family members are suspected of being there as well, as is Al Qaeda spokesman Sulaiman abu Ghaith, U.S. officials say.

Of special concern, they said, is the number of Al Qaeda operatives in Iran who are of Egyptian descent and loyal to Zawahiri, the Cairo-born physician who merged his Egyptian Islamic Jihad with Al Qaeda in the years before the Sept. 11 attacks.

Adel is a former Egyptian police official. In addition, U.S. officials confirmed intelligence showing that three other Al Qaeda operatives with Egyptian roots — Abdallah Mohammed Rajab Masri, also known as Abu Khayer; Abdel Aziz Masri; and Abu Mohamed Masri — are in Iran. Authorities believe them to be, respectively, the head of Al Qaeda's shura, or leadership council; a biological weapons expert who heads the terrorist network's effort to develop weapons of mass destruction; and its top explosives expert and training camp chief.

The U.S. counter-terrorism official said the Egyptians' presence was troubling because Tehran for more than a decade has actively supported Egypt's two largest militant groups — Egyptian Islamic Jihad and Gamaa al Islamiya — in their terrorist campaign to topple the Cairo government.

Though the bitter Sunni-Shiite divide has prompted Tehran in the past to say it had "no affinity" with Al Qaeda, U.S. officials believe there is a history of cooperation between Iran and some Sunni militant groups, including Al Qaeda. Iran nurtures such relationships, they believe, to enhance its regional influence and punish Arab political enemies through intimidation and violence.

Adel traveled to Iran in the early 1990s as part of a delegation sent by Bin Laden to learn bomb making, U.S. officials say. They fear he and other Egyptians may have maintained ties with Iranian military and intelligence services.

The Sept. 11 commission concluded that Iran had harbored Al Qaeda operatives wanted in the U.S. embassy bombings in East Africa and other terrorist attacks. It quoted one top Al Qaeda official as saying Iran had made a "concerted effort to strengthen relations with Al Qaeda" after the 2000 attack on the U.S. warship Cole in Yemen.

Imprisoned top Al Qaeda operatives also have told U.S. officials that Iran let Islamic militants traveling to and from Afghanistan and Pakistan pass freely across its borders without passport stamps — including at least eight of the 19 future Sept. 11 hijackers, the now-disbanded commission reported.

The commission strongly urged the Bush administration and Congress to investigate the ties between Iran and Al Qaeda. Last week, commission member Timothy Roemer said in an interview that Washington still had not adequately addressed those ties.

U.S. and allied intelligence agencies say that, more recently, they have picked up indications of closer cooperation. The intelligence includes European wiretaps of militants discussing how Iranian officials would help them or look the other way.

U.S. officials fear Ahmadinejad may be strengthening ties with Al Qaeda with the help of Iranian intelligence and military agencies, particularly the Revolutionary Guard.

The intelligence official and others noted that Ahmadinejad himself rose through the ranks of the guard, an elite military unit. U.S. government officials have accused the guard of financing and orchestrating terrorist acts in the region by groups including Hezbollah, which is suspected of blowing up U.S. military facilities and embassies in the 1980s and killing hundreds of Americans.

Rep. Brad Sherman of Sherman Oaks, the ranking Democrat on the House International Relations subcommittee on terrorism and nuclear proliferation, who receives classified briefings on Iran, said U.S. intelligence indicated that Tehran was engaged in some kind of collaboration with Al Qaeda leaders.

"The cooperation is substantial," Sherman said. "Key operatives of the most successful terrorist organization in history are spending their time in the No. 1 state sponsor of terrorism.... That is of massive concern."

U.S. officials fear that an Iranian hard-line faction or even a rogue official could conspire with Al Qaeda or provide access to the country's military arsenal.

Despite the mutual antipathy between Sunnis and Shiites, some U.S. officials argue that the Iranian regime and Al Qaeda share a common enemy — the United States — and that both oppose the establishment of a pro-Western democracy in Iraq.

John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, told Congress on Feb. 2 that Iran was engaged in a broad campaign "to disrupt the operations and reinforcement of United States forces based in the region, potentially intimidating regional allies into withholding support for United States policy toward Iran and raising the costs of our regional presence" for the U.S. and its allies.

Bush Warns Iran On Israel (AFP)

AFP, March 20, 2006

US President George W. Bush said he hoped to resolve the nuclear dispute with Iran with diplomacy, but warned Tehran he would "use military might" if necessary to defend Israel.

"The threat from Iran is, of course, their stated objective to destroy our strong ally Israel. That's a threat, a serious threat. It's a threat to world peace," the US president said after a speech defending the war in Iraq.

"I made it clear, and I'll make it clear again, that we will use military might to protect our ally Israel," said Bush, who was apparently referring to Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's call for the destruction of Israel.

On the atomic dispute, Bush said he hoped "to solve this issue diplomatically" with a "united message" to Tehran from Washington, London, Paris, Berlin as well as Russia "hopefully" and China.

The message would be that "your desire to having a nuclear weapon is unacceptable," he said.

Bush also touched on Iran's agreement to discuss Iraq with the United States, saying that "it's very important, however, for the Iranians to understand that the discussion is limited to Iraq.

"We're using this as an opportunity to make it clear about our concerns of interference within a democratic process that is evolving," he said, saying that the talks will not decide Iran's relations with a sovereign Iraq.

"Ultimately, Iraq-Iranian relations will be negotiated between the Iraqi government and the Iranian government," he said.

Security Council Fails To Reach Accord On Iran (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, March 20 -- The Security Council's five permanent members and Germany failed to reach agreement at a meeting Monday on how to respond to the Iranian nuclear crisis but said they would forge ahead in the coming days to break the impasse.

The deadlock comes as U.S. and European officials confirmed that Britain had presented the United States with a paper outlining a possible diplomatic strategy to resolve the crisis, including new talks and concessions. But the British representative at Monday's talks, John Sawers, said Britain had not made such a proposal at the meeting.

Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns said the United States is not going to participate in direct negotiations with Iran on the nuclear issue.

Top foreign policy coordinators for the United States, Russia, China, France, Britain and Germany issued a joint statement that echoed an agreement Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had reached with those five governments in January. The statement expressed "deep concern" that Iran has "failed to respond positively" to requests by the United Nations' Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency to suspend its uranium enrichment activities and allow for more intrusive U.N. inspections of its nuclear energy program.

The impasse follows weeks of negotiations over how to respond to Iran's behavior. The United States, France and Britain believe the threat of Security Council sanctions is required to pressure Iran to meet international calls to suspend its nuclear enrichment activities, which Iran insists are for peaceful purposes.

Russia and China oppose sanctions, and they want the Iranian crisis to be handled by the International Atomic Energy Agency, which is considered more likely to pursue a negotiated settlement.

The paper circulated by British officials detailed an approach that could include new multinational talks with Iran. The talks would be aimed at satisfying demands by China and Russia that the United Nations' major powers had exhausted all diplomatic options to resolve the standoff with Iran, a senior administration official said Monday.

On Sunday, after the Associated Press reported that the British were discussing such an approach, another senior administration official denied that Britain had made such a proposal.

The United States has sought to avoid being drawn into new negotiations with Iran, saying Tehran has used talks to buy time to develop its nuclear know-how.

Britain Calls For New Talks With Iran (AP-Y2)

By Edith M. Lederer And George Jahn

AP2, March 20, 2006

Britain is calling for new talks with Iran about its suspect nuclear program but will push for militarily enforceable U.N. Security Council sanctions if those talks do not make progress, according to a letter obtained by The Associated Press.

The proposal is angled toward Russia and China, allies of Tehran who staunchly oppose firm Security Council action.

Senior diplomats from six key nations that have been struggling to find a way to deal with Iran's suspect nuclear program met Monday at U.N. headquarters.

DOJ_NMG_0019980

Representatives from the five veto-wielding council nations — the United States, Russia, China, Britain and France — and Germany will try to overcome differences on a statement demanding a quick report on Iran's nuclear program.

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said earlier that Monday's meeting "will basically consider the longer-range issues, although obviously in the capitals in Moscow and Beijing, certainly, they will now have a look" at the latest text of the Security Council statement, and hopefully the senior diplomats will have instructions "that will allow us to make progress."

Bolton said he would like to see agreement on the statement when the Security Council meets again on Tuesday afternoon.

Britain's U.N. Ambassador Emyr Jones Parry also said he hoped the high-level diplomats meeting Monday would "look at the wider strategy of how we develop our relations with Iran." He added: "But let's be clear that negotiation of the (statement) will be done in the council."

The British hoped the Russians and Chinese would agree to tougher council action on Iran should that be needed in exchange for Western willingness to engage in new negotiations.

Moscow has offered to enrich Iran's uranium but is insisting that Iran must freeze its own uranium enrichment program — a possible pathway to nuclear arms.

Moscow and Beijing also want the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency, the International Atomic Energy Agency, to assume the main role in cajoling Iran on enrichment and its refusal to fully cooperate with an IAEA probe.

The March 16 letter, which is marked "confidential" and displays the seal of the British Foreign Office, is from John Sawers, a top British negotiator.

"We are not going to bring the Russians and Chinese to accept significant sanctions over the coming months, certainly not without further efforts to bring the Iranians around," the letter said.

"The Iranians ... will need to know that more serious measures are likely. This means putting the Iran dossier onto a Chapter VII basis" — shorthand for binding Security Council resolutions, including sanctions, that can be enforced by military means.

The letter was addressed to U.S. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, German Foreign Office Political Director Michael Schaefer and French Foreign Ministry Political Director Stanislas de Laboulaye.

It suggests making suspension of all uranium enrichment by Iran "a mandatory requirement of the Security Council, in a resolution we would aim to adopt, I say, early May."

"In return for the Russians and Chinese agreeing to this, we would then want to put together a package that could be presented to the Iranians as a new proposal," the letter said. "Ideally this would have the explicit backing of Russia, China and the United States as well as the EU-3" — France, Britain and Germany.

But any talks with U.S. involvement likely would need to focus on economic and security guarantees meant to reassure Tehran that Washington has no plans to force a regime change. Critics of U.S. policy have maintained for years that Tehran was unlikely to compromise on its nuclear program without such a direct guarantee.

In Washington, German lawmaker Ruprecht Polenz said "we would really love it" if the United States participated in the process.

The six countries agree that Iran should not develop nuclear weapons, but they differ on the best way to get Tehran to halt uranium enrichment, which can be used either in a civilian nuclear program to generate electricity or to produce nuclear arms.

Russia and China have said tough council action could spark an Iranian withdrawal from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and eventually lead to tougher measures, such as sanctions.

The United States, Britain and France want a statement listing demands already made by the IAEA — including the suspension of uranium enrichment and steps toward greater transparency and more cooperation. They also want IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei to report to the council on Iran's progress in meeting those demands in two weeks, which Russia and China say is much too soon.

Negotiations between Iran and France, Germany and Britain, acting on behalf of the European Union, collapsed in August after Tehran rejected an incentives package offered in return for a permanent end to uranium enrichment. Its subsequent moves to develop full-blown enrichment capabilities led the IAEA's 35-nation board to ask for Security Council involvement earlier this year.

Iranian President Wants West To Apologize (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, March 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0019981

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on Monday said the West should apologize to Iran for accusing it of trying to develop a nuclear weapons program and said his country would continue to resist international pressure to halt its nuclear energy program.

"Today they tell our nation that nuclear energy is a bad thing and it is not necessary for our people to have it. But the nation of Iran has stood (for its right)," he said in a televised speech to mark the Iranian New Year, which begins Tuesday. "Those who head war and crimes accused the Iranian nation of war seeking. They insulted our nation. I do advise them to apologize."

Iran insists its nuclear program is for peaceful energy purposes but Western countries who believe otherwise have pushed for United Nations action — including possible sanctions — against the country.

Ahmadinejad stressed that Iran would not give up its nuclear rights.

"Today we announce with pride that the peaceful knowledge and technology are at our disposal in order to be used for different purposes, including electricity generation, and we have not borrowed it from anybody that can take it away from us," he said.

Ahmadinejad reiterated that Iran should be compensated for a two and a half year suspension of its nuclear activities. Under heavy pressure from the West, Iran suspended its enrichment of uranium and related activities in 2003 and began negotiating with Germany, Britain and France to reach an agreed framework for its nuclear development. It resumed nuclear research earlier this year when talks failed.

The United States and its European allies want Iran to permanently abandon uranium enrichment and all related activities, a technology that can be used to produce nuclear fuel for reactors or materials for a nuclear bomb.

Jews Wary Of Becoming Fall Guy For Iran's Woes (WT)

By John R. Bradley

The Washington Times, March 21, 2006

TEHRAN -- Members of Iran's Jewish community fear they are being set up to take the blame if President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's drive to establish a nuclear program ends badly for the country.

Members of the 30,000-strong community say they already are being viewed as a potential fifth column after a series of speeches in which the firebrand president has spoken of a "Holocaust myth" and heaped scorn on Europe for its defense of the "Zionist entity."

"Ahmadinejad has decided to pick on the easiest victim, Israel," said Meir Javedanfar, a specialist on Iran and director of the Middle East Economic and Political Analysis Co. "Every time Ahmadinejad has internal problems, he will attack Israel again, using it as a tool."

Iranian Jews, many of whom have family ties with Israel, are hitting back with forceful public rebuttals. But privately, they acknowledge fears of orchestrated political attacks if the United States or Israel conducts air strikes against Iran's nuclear facilities.

There are still painful memories of events six years ago in the southern city of Shiraz, where 13 Iranian Jews and eight Muslims were accused of spying for Israel.

It was widely thought that they were being used as pawns in a struggle within the Islamic regime, with hard-liners seeking to embarrass President Mohammed Khatami and his comparatively moderate administration.

Now there are signs that Mr. Khatami and other reformers are using the Jews to try to undermine Mr. Ahmadenijad's political agenda.

Mr. Khatami publicly contradicted the president this month, describing the Holocaust as a "historical reality."

"We should speak out if even a single Jew is killed. Don't forget that one of the crimes of Hitler, Nazism and German national socialism was the massacre of innocent people, among them many Jews," the cleric said in widely published remarks.

The prominent centrist newspaper Sharq also has taken on Mr. Ahmadinejad, saying, "The Jewish question was never a problem for Iran or Islam."

The debate has forced supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei to speak out in support of the president in spite of widespread reports that he is unhappy with Mr. Ahmadinejad, who recently called for Israel "to be wiped off the map."

After the 1979 Islamic revolution, thousands of Jews left for Israel, Western Europe or the United States, fearing persecution. But Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, Iran's first post-revolutionary supreme leader, issued a "fatwa" to protect Jews and other religious minorities, reducing the outflow to a trickle.

Tehran has a Jewish nursing home and a Jewish library with a reading room used by both Muslim and Jewish university students. The capital also has a Jewish hospital and 11 functioning synagogues.

Haroun Yashayaei, the leader of the Jewish community, wrote publicly to Mr. Ahmadinejad last month, asking how he could "ignore all of the undeniable evidence existing for the exile and massacre of the Jews in Europe during the Second World War."

DOJ_NMG_0019982

The president's questioning of the Holocaust, he wrote, "has created astonishment among the people of the world, and spread fear and anxiety among the small Jewish community of Iran."

"At the moment, there is no direct political pressure on the Jewish community," Mr. Yashayaei said in an interview.

Explaining why he wrote the letter, he said, "It is more a question of emotional stress. I was angry at what the president said, and it is my right to tell him what I think."

Jews have scored several legal victories in recent months, said Morris Motamed, a Jewish member of the Majlis, or parliament.

One of those ended a practice under which a Jewish family received far less money in compensation than a Muslim family when a relative was killed in an accident.

Another bill, expected to be passed in the coming months, will remove discriminatory aspects of the inheritance laws.

Iran's Jews, however fear that such progress could be reversed by a coming conference called by Mr. Ahmadinejad to "investigate evidence for the Holocaust."

In such a climate, Mr. Motamed said, "a backlash in the wake of [U.S. or Israeli] air strikes becomes a real possibility."

Speaking To Tehran, With One Voice (NYT)

By Jessica T. Mathews

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

Washington

WITH the Iranian nuclear crisis about to land in the Security Council, the events that led up to the war in Iraq point clearly to what needs to be done.

In the decade preceding the Iraq war, Mr. Hussein was able to defy the major powers when they were divided. Exploiting his advantage as a single actor and Washington's indecision over whether it most wanted nonproliferation or regime change, Mr. Hussein consistently outmaneuvered his diplomatic opponents.

But he also knew that he could not buck the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council when they were serious and united (as, for example, during the toughened United Nations inspections in the months just before the war), and he did not even try.

The situation with Iran today is the same. Washington cannot decide whether the top priority of its Iran policy should be regime change or nonproliferation; as a result, others of the major powers do not trust and will not fully support its antinuclear efforts. Tehran has easily exploited this lack of unity among the major powers to frustrate every attempt to rein in its nuclear program. It has recruited international support through energetic diplomacy to the group of developing countries known as the G-77. Just as Mr. Hussein did, the leaders in Tehran have made diplomatic mincemeat of the big powers.

Iran has been so successful in this that some experts in the West have turned defeatist. Their view is mistaken. The idea that "it's too late" to stop Iran's progress toward building nuclear weapons is technologically wrong. "There's nothing we can do about it" ignores a range of options between economic sanctions, going to war and more of doing nothing. And the argument that "we can learn to live with it" misses the nature of the challenge.

A nuclear Iran is dangerous enough, but this crisis is only proximately about Iran. More important, it is about the likely consequence of an Iranian bomb, namely, that Saudi Arabia, Turkey and Egypt would produce their own bombs, and, thanks to the concomitant international failure to deal with North Korea, the nonproliferation regime would collapse. What is at stake is not a choice between 9 and 10 nuclear weapons states, but a choice between 9 and 30 or more.

The major powers may yet be able to unite to stop Iran at this late hour, but not without a decisive change in American policy. Washington's choice is simple: does it want to stop Iran's acquisition of nuclear weapons badly enough to deal with Iran's present government?

Like the Clinton administration with Iraq, the Bush administration has been unable to make up its mind, locking its policy into a cycle of self-defeating half-steps. The combination of "axis of evil" threats, partial support of European negotiations and publicly announced financial backing for the opposition in Iran ensures only that we will fail either to negotiate an end to the nuclear program or to overthrow the present regime.

The administration must, finally, hold its nose and recognize that the nuclear challenge is the indisputable priority. It must get off the sidelines and into negotiations with Tehran. It must solidify agreement among its fellow permanent council members by working closely with Russia, not least by concluding a long overdue pact on civil nuclear cooperation. Russian participation would make it possible to provide Iran with a credible international guarantee of uranium enrichment and reprocessing services.

With China and the others, the United States needs to make clear that the Security Council can resort to other steps besides economic sanctions to significantly raise the cost to Tehran of its continued defiance, beginning with making International Atomic Energy Agency inspections mandatory rather than voluntary.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice (and her fellow foreign ministers from the council's permanent members) should be flying to Brazil, Indonesia, South Africa and other leading countries of the G-77 to explain why Iran is wrong to claim that the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty gives it the "right" to enrich uranium, and why Iran's abuse of the treaty devalues each of their commitments to give up nuclear weapons.

Given the American record with Iraq and Iran, others will be skeptical that Washington has made a clear choice for nonproliferation and away from regime change. The message will have to be steady and unequivocal. If President Bush and Secretary Rice continue to say one thing and Vice President Dick Cheney and our ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton, say another, the effort will quickly fail.

Members of Congress have a direct responsibility as well. Only they — especially the Democrats — can make such a policy change possible. They will have to forgo the indulgence of slamming the administration from the right and currying favor with pro-Israel voters by vying to see who can be the most anti-Iranian.

All of this, and more, is what serious anti-nuclear diplomacy would look like. It has not yet been tried. Anyone who promotes the use of military force from the present position of American indecision and before the obvious political steps have been taken is repeating the error that led us into Iraq.

The international community's record on Iran's nuclear program (as on North Korea's) has been feckless. Only the United States can change that. If we fail to pursue this effort with unwavering, clear-minded diplomacy, a nuclear-armed world will be the Bush administration's chief legacy, no matter how the war in Iraq and the war on terrorism turn out.

Arab Leader: Hamas Must Deal With Israel (AP-Y2)

By Barry Schweid

AP2, March 21, 2006

An Arab leader said Monday a Hamas-led Palestinian government has no alternative but to deal with Israel.

"They will be obliged to do that because the Palestinians, as a government, deal with Israel," Crown Prince Salman bin Hamad bin Isa Al-Khalifa of Bahrain told reporters after meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

"How can they deal with Israel if they don't recognize Israel?" he asked in an exchange in Arabic.

The United States and the European Union have vowed not to deal with Hamas until it abandons terror and accepts Israel and the agreements that Israel has reached with the Palestinian Authority over the years.

Meanwhile, the Bush administration is reviewing U.S. assistance to the Palestinians. Rice has indicated humanitarian programs will get U.S. support, but not through a Hamas-led government.

"This is an international Palestinian issue," the crown prince said. "But we encourage our Palestinian brothers to be committed to all the agreements they were committed to over all the long years."

Referring apparently to the unresolved conflict between Israel and the Palestinians, he advised Hamas to "hurry up, and we will hurry up with them, to end this great humanitarian catastrophe."

Bahrain is not considering a cutoff in aid to a Hamas-led government nor is it about to establish relations with Israel, he said.

Nunn Urges Congress To Set Conditions On U.S.-India Nuclear Pact (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

In a setback for the administration's efforts to win approval of a landmark nuclear pact with India, former senator Sam Nunn said yesterday that he has serious concerns the deal would harm the "United States' vital interest" in preventing nuclear proliferation and urged Congress to set conditions for its support.

"Congress has a duty to look at the broader framework," Nunn, a moderate and highly respected Georgia Democrat who still has broad influence in both parties on proliferation and military matters, said in an interview. "If I were still in Congress, I would be skeptical and looking at conditions that could be attached."

Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns warned lawmakers last week that congressionally mandated conditions could cause the agreement to unravel. He and other administration officials say the agreement is a groundbreaking achievement that will bring India, which has not signed the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, into the nonproliferation mainstream, while bolstering U.S.-India ties and adding jobs to the U.S. economy.

But Nunn, who was briefed on the deal by State Department officials last week, said he is concerned it would lead to the spread of weapons-grade nuclear material, unleash a regional arms race with China and Pakistan, and make it more difficult for the United States to win support for sanctions against nuclear renegades such as Iran and North Korea. Nunn is a board member of General Electric Co. -- which built nuclear power reactors in India before New Delhi conducted its first nuclear test in 1974 -- but he said he thinks the economic benefits are overstated.

The administration last week proposed legislation that would exempt India from sections of the Atomic Energy Act that restrict trade with countries that are not party to nuclear treaties. The proposal already faces an uphill battle in Congress, where key lawmakers such as Sen. Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and Rep. Henry J. Hyde (R-Ill.), chairman of the House International Relations Committee, have remained neutral. The administration has actively sought, without much success, the support of moderate opinion leaders such as Nunn.

Under the pact, India is to separate its civilian and military nuclear programs over the next eight years to gain U.S. expertise and nuclear fuel to meet its rapidly rising energy needs. India's civilian facilities would be subject for the first time to permanent international inspections, but the agreement does not require oversight of India's prototype fast-breeder reactors, which can produce significant amounts of weapons-grade plutonium when fully operational.

The Bush administration originally sought a plan that would have allowed India to continue producing material for six to 10 weapons each year, but the new plan would allow India enough fissile material for as many as 50 weapons a year. Experts said this would far exceed what is believed to be its current capacity.

Nunn said that among the conditions he would attach to the legislation is the requirement it could not take effect until the president certifies that India pledges not to produce nuclear materials, such as plutonium or highly enriched uranium, for weapons. The current agreement "certainly does not curb in any way the proliferation of weapons-grade nuclear material," Nunn said.

"India was a lot better negotiator than we were," Nunn asserted. While the administration has said it has no intention of aiding India's nuclear weapons program, "the reality could be the opposite," he said. "The administration has a high burden to explain this."

Nunn added that suggestions by some former and current administration officials that it might be in the United States' interest to allow India to build up its strategic capabilities is "totally counterproductive and dangerous reasoning."

Nunn, who served in the Senate for 24 years, is co-chairman and chief executive of the Nuclear Threat Initiative, a nonprofit organization that seeks to reduce the global threats from nuclear, biological and chemical weapons. Lugar is also a board member of NTI, and the two men wrote the Nunn-Lugar Act, which has helped destroy thousands of nuclear warheads in the former Soviet Union.

In an interview published yesterday in the Indianapolis Star, Lugar said he might favor the legislation if he were convinced that the new relationship was in the United States' best interests, that there were "considerable if not complete" safeguards on the spread of nuclear fuel and that it would lead to a reduction of oil consumption.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce has vowed an all-out push to win approval of the agreement, saying it would be a boon for U.S. business. But it has also sparked a backlash from nonproliferation experts who believe it will lead to the unraveling of the Non-Proliferation Treaty, which sought to limit the number of nuclear weapons states.

"Nunn's voice carries weight," said Henry D. Sokolski, executive director of the Nonproliferation Policy Education Center and a Pentagon official in the George H.W. Bush administration, who opposes the agreement. "We have waited for a moderate, respected voice to speak clear sense on these matters. Now that he's spoken, it would be very strange if Congress doesn't listen."

NATO Ready To Help U.N. In Darfur (AP-Y2)

By Barry Schweid

AP2, March 20, 2006

NATO is prepared to support a U.N. force in the Darfur region of Sudan, the alliance's secretary-general told President Bush in a White House visit on Monday.

"I'm quite sure, as I told the president, that when the U.N. comes, the NATO allies will be ready to do more in enabling a United Nations force in Darfur," Jaap De Hoop Scheffer told reporters after his meeting with Bush.

Bush has called for greater NATO involvement in Darfur, which the United Nations has described as the world's gravest humanitarian crisis. The conflict there has left more than 180,000 people dead and 2 million displaced.

But Bush said the African Union must request that its mission in Darfur be converted to a U.N. mission. When that happens, NATO can move in with U.S. help "to make it clear to the Sudanese government that we're intent upon providing security for the people there and intent upon helping work toward a lasting peace agreement," Bush said.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, meeting with the NATO secretary-general, said Monday "NATO can play a very important role in enhancing the capabilities of African Union forces."

De Hoop Scheffer, repeating what he said at the White House while having his picture taken with Rice, said he was "quite sure that when that question comes that the NATO allies will stand ready to support that mission in Darfur."

"I'm not talking about NATO forces on the ground," he said later as he left the State Department. "But could you enable the mission by giving logistical support, by going on in the transport of the forces, by giving training, then I think the NATO allies would take a very positive stand on that."

After talks with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, the NATO secretary-general held a news conference in which he underscored the point that NATO could not act until after the African mission is converted to a U.N. mission.

Declining to predict when all the pieces would fall into place, De Hoop Scheffer said, "I fully share everybody's frustration and indignation about what is happening in Darfur."

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack issued a statement, meanwhile, criticizing the Sudanese government's closing of several U.S.-supported social development, health and food distribution offices.

McCormack urged the government in Khartoum to remove immediately all obstacles to delivery of humanitarian assistance and to provide protection for civilians and aids workers.

Earlier this month Sudan and the African Union agreed to extend the mandate of AU peacekeeping forces in Darfur to September, at which time they would be allowed to be merged into a larger U.N. force. But later Sudan said it will reject the proposed deployment of U.N. forces to Darfur.

Bush praised NATO's role in Afghanistan and its work training Iraqi security forces.

De Hoop Scheffer said all 26 NATO members have been assisting in the Iraqi training mission.

"I want to see NATO-trained Iraqi officers taking their responsibility in fighting the terrorists in their own country," he said.

U.S. Calls Belarus Vote For Leader Invalid (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers And Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

MINSK, Belarus, March 20 — The United States declared the results of the president election in Belarus invalid on Monday and called for a new race, even as President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko defiantly swept aside criticism and declared himself the winner of a third term.

In an impassioned appearance hours after state television announced that he had won nearly 83 percent of the vote, Mr. Lukashenko exuded confidence and said the outcome had "convincingly demonstrated who the Belarussians are and who is the master of our house."

He said he was unafraid of further economic and political isolation after an election that Washington and international observers described as illegitimate, rigged and held under widespread repression.

"The United States does not accept the results of the election," said Scott McClellan, the White House spokesman. "We support the call for a new election."

The principal opposition candidate, Aleksandr Milinkevich, who received 6 percent of the vote, according to the government's initial count, also declared Mr. Lukashenko's presidency illegitimate.

"We are simply not going to recognize the election," he said, calling for a new vote to be conducted with new election commissioners and a campaign free of arrests and harassment.

Several thousand opposition demonstrators once again ignored warnings that they could be arrested or beaten, and returned in the evening to a central square in Minsk to continue peaceful protests against the results.

But the crowd that appeared Monday was smaller than that on Sunday, and Mr. Milinkevich's campaign manager, Sergei Kalyakin, acknowledged the difficulties of challenging the deeply entrenched power of Mr. Lukashenko, often referred to as Europe's last dictator. "The number who came to the square was not enough," he said. "We need 10 times more."

By late Monday the number of protesters dwindled to several hundred, but those who remained appeared determined to stay, pitching tents and locking arms around them. For a second night the police refrained from dispersing them, but blocked others from bringing food, clothing or blankets.

Many in the crowd, and even Mr. Milinkevich himself, said they were disappointed that they had not been able to rally more people. He said they would stay through the night if allowed, but hinted at a concession. "I think that the dictatorship will fall, not on the day of elections," he said on the edge of the crowd. "I can't say when, but I feel its days are coming to an end."

Unsure that it can muster and maintain large crowds in the face of official threats, the opposition here has rested much of its diminishing hope on international disapproval.

Reaction has broken along familiar lines, with Western organizations and officials issuing condemnations and in some cases vowing to seek punitive measures against Belarus, and Russia and other former Soviet states celebrating Mr. Lukashenko's victory.

Echoing the Bush administration, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which brought 400 observers here, sharply criticized the election, noting harassment and arrests of opposition candidates, propagandistic coverage on state media and extensive irregularities in the counting of ballots.

"The arbitrary abuse of state power, obviously designed to protect the incumbent president, went far beyond acceptable practice," the report said.

Senior Bush administration officials said the United States would work with Europe to coordinate sanctions, like travel bans against those in the Belarus government believed to be responsible for the voting process. But American officials noted that they had numerous sanctions of this type in place.

Even as the European group issued its report, Mr. Lukashenko was several blocks away in a government auditorium, gruffly and at times crudely sweeping aside any questions about his victory or his leadership style.

The appearance was part news conference and part testimonial to Mr. Lukashenko's power, as the audience was stacked with his supporters and hand-picked visitors who described themselves as election observers. One pair of these self-described observers presented Mr. Lukashenko with a bouquet of roses.

Between statements of praise and bursts of applause, Mr. Lukashenko belittled the opposition's supporters as "children" paid by foreign governments, and described their demonstration on Sunday night as a display of weakness. "They were 14- and 15-year-old children who were paid 20,000 Belarussian rubles," he said, referring to a sum worth a little more than $9. "So they worked for their 20,000 rubles."

He also took questions from journalists, sometimes appearing to enjoy testy exchanges and other times interrupting speakers or arguing about their questions.

When asked whether he could assure the safety of demonstrators, whom he threatened last week with having their necks wrung, he chided the journalist for posing the question. "I see your neck is in place," he said. "Why are you so concerned?"

As his appearance dragged on, reaching nearly two and a half hours, more denunciations appeared from the West.

Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, secretary general of NATO, said in a statement that Belarussians had been cheated of a choice. "The people of Belarus have the right to choose their leadership through a true democratic process," he said. "That right was again denied to them."

Foreign Minister Ursula Plassnik of Austria, which holds the rotating presidency of the European Union, criticized the "climate of intimidation" that hindered the opposition campaign.

Benita Ferrero-Waldner, the union's commissioner of external relations, said the group would continue with democracy-building programs and relief aid and would not impose economic sanctions because that could hurt the Belarussian people. But she said European Union members were likely to widen a visa ban on top Belarussian officials.

In Moscow, underscoring the widening gap between the West and Russia over the conduct of elections and the state of reform in former Soviet republics, the Kremlin rushed to applaud the result. The Foreign Ministry said, "The elections were testament to a high civic awareness and an interest amongst the Belarussian people for stability."

The statement made no mention of the mass arrests, wide-scale intimidation and the fawning official media coverage of Mr. Lukashenko and his policies.

Belarus Leader Defiant After Reelection As U.S., E.U. Threaten Sanctions (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

MINSK, Belarus, March 20 -- President Alexander Lukashenko, citing official figures giving him 82.6 percent of the vote in this weekend's election, declared Monday that a pro-Western "revolution" had been defeated in his former Soviet republic and scoffed at threats of new sanctions.

The United States will work with the European Union to possibly freeze the foreign assets of Belarusans responsible for electoral fraud or human rights violations, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said Monday. Expansion of existing restrictions on travel by senior Belarusan leaders is also under discussion.

McClellan told reporters aboard Air Force One that the United States "does not accept the results of the election. The election campaign was conducted in a climate of fear. It included arrests and beatings and fraud. We applaud democrats in Belarus for their courage and peaceful stand to reclaim their freedom."

On the streets of the capital, Minsk, opposition leaders struggled for a second night to mount large-scale protests. By midnight, the numbers gathered at a central square had dwindled to about 2,000, but a dozen tents had been set up in freezing temperatures to attempt a long-term protest.

Riot police deployed nearby have not intervened, despite a threat last week from Lukashenko that he would "wring the necks" of demonstrators. Asked by a French reporter Monday what had become of that threat, the former collective farm manager said, "I see your neck is in place."

"You have seen our opposition," the president declared during a 2 1/2 -hour news conference. "And if you are reasonable people, you have been convinced that it's worthless." He said opposition leaders were in the pay of Western ambassadors.

Located between Poland and Russia, the country of 10 million has continued as a holdout of Soviet-style politics since gaining independence in 1991. The secret police, still called the KGB, routinely beat up opposition figures. Independent newspapers are shut down or lose entire press runs to police confiscations.

But large numbers of people here call Lukashenko a hero who saved their country from the upheavals of moving to capitalism. Even opposition figures say he could win a fair vote.

His landslide victory drew condemnation Monday from a variety of Western governments and organizations. Much of the criticism focused on how the campaign was conducted.

"Arbitrary use of state power and widespread detentions showed a disregard for the basic rights of freedom of assembly, association and expression," said U.S. Rep. Alcee L. Hastings (D-Fla.), who leads the parliamentary assembly of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, a 55-nation group that monitors elections.

In the past, the United States has taken action against a Belarus firm involved in arms sales, limited senior Belarusan officials' travel to the United States and barred high-level meetings. It has also tried to structure aid programs to skirt the government and favor nongovernmental organizations.

New steps would not be broad-based sanctions such as those against Iran or Cuba, according to an administration official. "What we're talking about are targeted steps that don't go after the people as a whole," the official said. Lukashenko and his associates are not believed to have many assets in the United States, so the European Union would be key to any attempt to go after him financially.

The E.U., which has three member states that border Belarus, also has steps in place. European officials were discussing options Monday for turning up the pressure. "Some action is now very likely," the E.U. external relations commissioner, Benita Ferrero-Waldner, said Monday.

Official figures showed that Lukashenko's nearest rival, Alexander Milinkevich, a former physics professor, got 6 percent of the vote. Milinkevich called the president's tally "monstrously inflated."

At the Minsk square where protesters had gathered, the crowd was shrinking by midnight Monday. Demonstrators chanted "Long live Belarus" as plainclothes police officers recorded video footage of them from the crowd's edge.

Opposition leaders conceded that the turnouts, 10,000 on Sunday night and somewhat fewer Monday night, were not large enough to threaten the government.

Sergei Kalyakin, who led Milinkevich's campaign, said 100,000 people would be needed for authorities to "hear the voice of the people." With an active opposition that is composed mostly of students, many analysts see significant public backlash as unlikely.

Opposition leaders say they hope the election and its aftermath will seed a movement that will grow to present a real challenge to Lukashenko's autocratic rule.

In what has become a pattern when elections in republics of the former Soviet Union are won by pro-Moscow candidates, observers from Russia said Monday that the vote was free and fair. "There is full ground to believe that the elections complied with universally recognized standards," the Russian Foreign Ministry said in a statement. "There are no doubts about their legitimacy."

Russian President Vladimir Putin sent Lukashenko a telegram congratulating him on his victory.

At his news conference Monday, Lukashenko dismissed the Western threats of sanctions and hinted that Belarus might retaliate by refusing to cooperate with its neighbors on issues such as illegal migration from the east.

"The revolution that so many people talked about and some were preparing has failed, and it could not be otherwise," said Lukashenko, referring to the possibility that a fraudulent vote could trigger the kind of street protests that toppled governments in Ukraine and Georgia.

Mocking the new pro-Western leadership in Ukraine and Georgia, Lukashenko also attacked the United States as a hypocritical, warmongering power. He said it targets governments that refuse to bow to its interests while embracing nations that are clearly not democratic.

"I'm not afraid of isolation," Lukashenko said. "It's very difficult to suffocate us economically or politically."

Belarus Leader's Victory Rejected By U.S. As OSCE Finds Fraud (BLOOM)

By Richard Keil James Neuger

Bloomberg, March 21, 2006

March 20 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. joined European observers in rejecting election results in Belarus that gave President Alexander Lukashenko a third term, after concluding that the declared win was engineered through fraud and intimidation.

``This campaign was conducted in a climate of fear that included arrests and beatings,'' White House spokesman Scott McClellan said today. ``We call for a new election.''

Lukashenko won 82.6 percent of the vote, trouncing his main rival, the opposition leader Alexander Milinkevich, who garnered 6 percent, according to the Belarus Central Electoral Commission. The Vienna-based Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe said about 400 observers found ``substantial empirical evidence'' of fraud. The elections were not ``free and fair,'' the group said.

Lukashenko, in power since 1994, has been assailed by the European Union, U.S. and United Nations for jailing opposition politicians, clamping down on the media, and changing the constitution to scrap a two-term limit for the presidency.

About 10,000 people answered Milinkevich's call to assemble late today in the central October Square of Minsk, demanding that the elections be annulled. State security forces watched the throng from the roof of the Palace of the Republic, which houses the electoral commission.

``I will stay at the helm as long as the people let me,'' Lukashenko said earlier today in Minsk, according to Russia's Interfax news agency.

Visa Ban

U.S. officials are consulting with their EU counterparts about how best to respond to the election, McClellan said today in Washington. EU governments are likely to widen a visa ban on top Belarus officials and impose ``rigorous sanctions'' on them, French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy told a news conference in Brussels.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the U.S. would take ``serious, appropriate measures'' against officials who had perpetrated ``election fraud and other human rights abuses.''

German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier said the 25-nation EU doesn't want to provoke Belarus, and possibly Russia, by taking drastic steps such as denying diplomatic recognition to Lukashenko's government.

EU diplomats ruled that out because ``such a decision could have very far-reaching consequences,'' Steinmeier said.

The Russian Foreign Ministry defended Lukashenko's victory, issuing a statement that said ``there is no reason to doubt the results.''

Since 2004 the U.S. and the EU have imposed travel restrictions on Belarusian officials the two allies suspect are connected to politically motivated disappearances and rigged elections.

Ties Strained

The U.S. has had strained relations with Belarus since Lukashenko came to power. Ties soured further a year later, in 1995, when the Belarus air force shot down a hot air balloon that had strayed into Belarusian air space, and killed two American citizens, according to the U.S. State Department.

Six top Belarus officials are barred now from traveling to the 25-nation EU. External Relations Commissioner Benita Ferrero-Waldner said the EU would seek ``targeted'' measures to punish the leadership, possibly adding Lukashenko to the blacklist.

``Some action is now very likely,'' Ferrero-Waldner told a news conference. ``It will be on the visa bans for a list of people. And we have to see if any other measure will be taken.'' She ruled out economic sanctions because they would hit the broader population.

In Washington, U.S. House Speaker Dennis J. Hastert, an Illinois Republican, denounced the elections for what he called their ``widespread disregard for basic rights of freedom and abuse of state power.''

``Our goal must be that the people of Belarus can free themselves of their Soviet past and participate in free and fair elections without fear of intimidation,'' he said.

EU government leaders will discuss the election at their March 23-24 summit in Brussels, and foreign ministers will consider the next steps at their April 10 meeting.

Lukashenko Scorns International Criticism (FT)

By Neil Buckley, Stefan Wagstyl, And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, March 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0019989

Alexander Lukashenko, Belarus' authoritarian president, declared on Monday that foreign-backed attempts to overthrow him had failed, claiming a crushing victory in elections that international observers condemned as seriously flawed.

More than 3,000 demonstrators gathered in the capital, Minsk, for a second night-time protest, as Alexander Milinkevich, the main opposition leader, continued calls for a rerun of Sunday's poll.

But the numbers were fewer than the 5,000 people who defied official threats of violence and arrest to rally on Sunday night – the biggest demonstrations in Minsk for a decade.

On Monday night about eight tents were erected in the central square for protesters planning to spend the night. Mr Milinkevich urged those who could to stay as long as possible but the protests seemed unlikely to escalate to the levels that brought about revolutions in Ukraine and Georgia.

Mr Milinkevich said opposition exit polls suggested the Belarus president won less than the 50 per cent required to secure victory in a single round of voting, though official figures yesterday gave him 82.6 per cent. The opposition said their data showed Mr Milinkevich scored 30 per cent, five times his official total.

Mr Lukashenko's victory is likely to increase the international isolation of a regime the US has labelled "Europe's last dictatorship". European Union foreign ministers denounced the elections as "neither free nor fair". Though EU ministers failed to agree on an immediate response, targeted sanctions, including broadening of existing visa bans on top Belarusan officials, as well as possible asset freezes, are likely to be agreed next month.

The US on Monday supported the opposition's call for a new election. Washington also said it would co-ordinate "serious appropriate measures" with the EU to be taken against officials responsible for election fraud and human rights abuses. A State Department spokesman said specific actions would be taken against individuals as well as the regime, but he did not say what those sanctions might be.

The Belarus poll also suggested the pro-democracy revolutions that swept Ukraine, Georgia and Kyrgyzstan had lost momentum. In recent elections in Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan and now Belarus the opposition has failed to overturn regimes accused of authoritarianism.

Diplomats and civil society groups have warned that Mr Lukashenko, in power for 12 years, is likely to use a new five-year term to crush remaining opposition and independent media. "What is important is the trend away from democracy and towards dictatorship and a totalitarian regime," said one senior Western diplomat in Minsk. "The significance of the election lies in the psychological impact it will have on Mr Lukashenko."

The Belarus president on Monday exuded confidence, telling a Soviet-style victory press conference the elections were "honest and free".

"The revolutionary project that was talked about and was prepared in Belarus has not happened," he said. He dismissed demonstrators in Minsk as "freaks" and said the idea of international sanctions against Belarus was "absurd".

But EU ministers endorsed the damning findings of the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe's 476-strong observer mission. The mission's report found Mr Lukashenko had "permitted state authority to be used in a manner which did not allow citizens to freely and fairly express their will".

It said statements by the Belarusan KGB associating the opposition with terrorism and accusing it of planning a coup had led to a "climate of intimidation".

Thousands Protest Lukashenko's Victory (WT)

By Michael Mainville

The Washington Times, March 21, 2006

MINSK, Belarus -- Thousands of opposition supporters gathered for a second night of protests in central Minsk yesterday, heartened by Western condemnation of a weekend election in which authoritarian President Alexander Lukashenko was declared a runaway winner.

About 6,000 protesters -- less than the 10,000 who rallied after the polls closed on Sunday -- called for fresh elections and the end of Mr. Lukashenko's 12-year rule.

"We free people of Belarus will never recognize this election," opposition leader Alexander Milinkevich told the crowd gathered in October Square. "This was not an election. It was an anti-constitutional coup d'etat."

The opposition hopes to re-create the weeks of protests that led to peaceful revolutions in two other former Soviet republics, Ukraine and Georgia.

With overnight temperatures at 28 degrees, protesters set up a dozen small tents and vowed to turn the demonstration into a round-the-clock presence, repeating a tactic used in Ukraine. Most of the tents were draped with historic national flags favored by critics of Mr. Lukashenko, who has scrapped them for a Soviet-style version.

DOJ_NMG_0019990

Protesters locked arms in a human chain guarding the tiny encampment. Others tried to bring in blankets, food and hot drinks, but often were detained by police.

Mr. Milinkevich returned to the square at about midnight to visit the campers, who were surrounded by about 1,000 supporters.

He vowed to remain with the campers, saying, "I don't have a tent, so I am going to stay on my feet," and predicted that more demonstrators would be arriving to join them.

"There has never been anything like this in Belarus," he added. "The whole world is watching us."

The protest was peaceful in spite of repeated threats from the authorities to violently suppress demonstrations. Hundreds of police and officers of Mr. Lukashenko's feared secret police -- still known by the Soviet-era acronym KGB -- watched from the sidelines or roamed through the crowd.

Mr. Lukashenko -- who since coming to power in 1994 has reintroduced Soviet-style economic and political controls on this country of about 10 million -- officially was declared to have won 82.6 percent in the vote, compared with 6 percent for Mr. Milinkevich. The president was allowed to seek a third, five-year term after a widely condemned 2004 referendum that removed presidential term limits.

Mr. Lukashenko defended his re-election as "honest and democratic," saying during a press conference yesterday that voters had shown "who's the boss" in Belarus. He also said his opponents had failed in their efforts to topple him in a foreign-backed revolution.

"The revolution that was talked about so much has failed," he said. "You have seen our opposition, and if you are reasonable people you have been convinced that it's worthless."

The United States and the European Union, which have labeled Mr. Lukashenko "the last dictator in Europe," yesterday rejected the election results and threatened further sanctions against the government.

"The United States does not accept the results of the election," White House spokesman Scott McClellan told reporters aboard Air Force One. "The election campaign was conducted in a climate of fear. It included arrests and beatings and fraud."

Mr. McClellan warned Belarusian authorities against "threatening or detaining those exercising their political rights in the coming days and beyond."

The run-up to the election was marked by the arrests of hundreds of opposition activists, official harassment of the opposition and pro-Lukashenko propaganda in the country's state-controlled media.

Among the possible sanctions are a wider ban on foreign travel by Mr. Lukashenko and other Belarusian officials, the seizure of officials' assets abroad and the cutting of foreign aid.

The biggest Western-based monitoring group to observe the election, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), was categorical in its condemnation of the vote yesterday.

"The March 19 presidential election does not meet the required international standards for free and fair elections," said U.S. Rep. Alcee L. Hastings, Florida Democrat, who coordinated the more than 400 OSCE observers during the vote.

Opposition Protests Belarus Vote Results (AP)

By Maria Danilova

AP, March 20, 2006

Thousands of opposition supporters gathered in the center of the Belarus' capital Monday for a second night, hoping their protest would help overturn a presidential election that the U.S. said was flawed by a "climate of fear."

The United States and the European Union called for new elections and threatened sanctions on Belarus, where the numbers of demonstrators was smaller than on election night and prospects for a Ukraine-style "Orange Revolution" seemed remote.

With overnight temperatures at 28 degrees, protesters set up a dozen small tents and vowed to turn the demonstration into a round-the-clock presence. Most of the tents were draped with historic national flags favored by critics of authoritarian President Alexander Lukashenko, who has scrapped them for a Soviet-style version.

"This is our last chance," said Vladimir Fivsky, a 20-year-old student who had wrapped one of the red-striped white flags around his shoulders and wore a pin in the same colors saying: "For Freedom!" He said came to the square to protest because he "had enough" after 12 years of Lukashenko's repressive rule.

The small but assertive move could rally others to the cause. But it could also prove unacceptable to authorities. Officials put on a show of force, with busloads of riot police fanning out into nearby streets and courtyards and preventing people from approaching the main square.

DOJ_NMG_0019991

Police had only a small and unobtrusive presence at the protest the previous night, when an estimated 10,000 people braved the freezing cold and snow to register their outrage after Lukashenko was declared the overwhelming winner of Sunday's elections.

Lukashenko asserted Monday that his foes had failed to topple him in a foreign-backed "revolution."

International observers said the vote fell short of democratic standards. Europe's main human rights organization said it was a "farce," and the United States called for a new election. Lukashenko's main opponent refused to accept the outcome, calling the longtime leader an "illegal, illegitimate president."

However, the leverage of the international community seemed limited, and even many of the protesters appeared to have little appetite for a prolonged vigil and a possibly violent confrontation.

The election result, if it stands, would entrench the status of Belarus as one of the least independent of the former Soviet republics.

Some 5,000 gathered in Oktyabrskaya Square in the capital, about half the number that came out Sunday night for a protest whose size was extraordinary in a tightly controlled country where police have cracked down swiftly on unsanctioned opposition gatherings.

The diminished crowd suggested to many that the opposition was losing momentum.

"There aren't enough people" a young man hollered into a cell phone amid the din of the rally.

But Alexander Milinkevich, the main opposition presidential candidate and symbolic heart of the protests, called on the demonstrators to gird for a lengthy campaign. He is demanding an election rerun.

"Our protest will be long and strong," he vowed. "We will never recognize this election. It's not an election but an anti-constitutional seizure of power."

The crowd thinned as hours passed, but many shared a determination to go to the bitter end.

"We plan to stay here overnight and to stay until the moment when the vote is pronounced falsified, when the authorities admit this and a new election is announced," said a 21-year-old student who gave his name only as Alexander, one of a dozen people sitting among the tents.

A few tents "may not change much, but if people lose their fear they will join us," he said.

Milinkevich visited the growing makeshift tent camp, taking sips of tea from a cup he was offered and saying: "We're together."

As the rally was about to begin, busloads of riot police streamed into Karl Marx Street near the square. Security forces in helmets and camouflage uniforms disembarked from the buses, jogged into neighborhood courtyards and prevented pedestrians from walking toward the square.

On the square, a 45-year-old woman who gave her name only as Irina said she was scared about the prospect of bloody police action, but "if Lukashenko stays in power, it will be even worse."

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said the election was flawed by a "climate of fear," and hinted that penalties such as travel restrictions "are things we will look at."

"We support the call for a new election," McClellan said. "The United States will continue to stand with the people of Belarus."

A cheer went up from the crowd in the square when a speaker reported the U.S. statement.

By contrast, Russian President Vladimir Putin on Monday congratulated Lukashenko in a telegram and said the results would help strengthen the alliance of the two former Soviet nations.

The chief electoral official said Monday that Lukashenko, who has ruled with an iron fist since 1994, won a "convincing victory" with 82.6 percent of the votes — a number Milinkevich called "monstrously inflated."

Lukashenko scorned the opposition, saying voters had shown "who's the boss" in Belarus. "The revolution that was talked about so much ... has failed," he told a nationally televised news conference.

He asserted that Sunday's protest leaders were in the pay of Western ambassadors and claimed there was no crackdown because the opposition is weak.

"Who was there to fight with? Nobody, understand? That's why we gave them the opportunity to show themselves, even though it was illegal."

But the observer mission from the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe said Monday that the election did not meet standards for a free and fair vote.

"Arbitrary use of state power and widespread detentions showed a disregard for the basic rights of freedom of assembly, association and expression," it said.

The EU threatened diplomatic and financial sanctions against Belarus' leaders, notably a wider travel ban.

DOJ_NMG_0019992

Lukashenko said Monday he was "not afraid of further isolation." He added: "If the EU wants problems here, it will have them."

Status Quo Wins In Belarus (CSM)

By Fred Weir

The Christian Science Monitor, March 21, 2006

MINSK, BELARUS - A triumphant Alexander Lukashenko hailed his 82.6 percent victory in widely criticized presidential elections as "the dignified choice of the Belarussian people" Monday and dismissed allegations of fraud as "provocations" by a few Western-linked political forces.

"The revolution that has been talked about for so long, and which some people have been actively preparing, has failed in Belarus," Mr. Lukashenko told a press conference in Minsk's ornate Soviet-era Palace of the Republic. During the 2-1/2 hour meeting Lukashenko tussled - in a sometimes scornful tone - with critical questioners, and repeatedly blamed hostile outsiders and "anti-Russian forces" for Belarus's image in the West as "Europe's last dictatorship."

"These elections took place under conditions of unprecedented international pressure on Belarus, and aggressive antipopular behavior from the so-called opposition such as Belarus has never seen.... But our people have shown that they are master in their own home," he said.

Life appeared to be returning to normal in Belarus, a Russian-allied industrial republic of 10 million, after a bitter election campaign that saw the arrest of over 300 opposition activists, the closure of 16 independent newspapers, and shuttering of several foreign-funded nongovernmental organizations.

Many ordinary Belarussians pronounced themselves happy with the idea of a third term for Lukashenko, who is credited with reviving the country's shattered post-Soviet economy, raising wages, and paying pensions on time. "We're doing very well here, better than most other places," says Nikolai Komash, a pensioner who said he voted "proudly" for Lukashenko. "People should appreciate what they've got, and not go out on the public square to shout and complain."

But activists for opposition candidate Alexander Milinkevich pledge to continue the protest movement they opened with a huge election-night rally in central Minsk and accuse Lukashenko of falsifying the vote to give himself a celestial majority while making the opposition appear nonexistent. Official results gave Mr. Milinkevich just 6 percent of the votes.

Speaking to reporters Monday, Milinkevich said Lukashenko's victory was "monstrously inflated." He described the election as an "unconstitutional coup" and Lukashenko as an "illegal and illegitimate" leader.

"I think it fully likely that Lukashenko got over 50 percent, but 82 percent is just unreal," says Oleg Manaev, an independent sociologist who conducts the only nonofficial opinion surveys in Belarus. "It is of some political urgency to clarify the actual vote the opposition received, which is possibly in the region of 25 percent."

Russia's 500-strong contingent of election observers praised the election as a model of democratic conduct. "There were a few technical imperfections during the elections, but no violations that could have changed the results of the vote," said Sergei Baburin, a Russian Duma deputy.

But 450 observers from the mainly Western Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe issued a statement saying the polls "failed to meet OSCE commitments for democratic elections."

The OSCE slammed Belarus's security service, the KGB, for creating "a climate of intimidation" and "an atmosphere of insecurity" through public accusations that the opposition was planning to launch a "terrorist" coup under the cover of protest rallies on election day. The report cited arrests and harassment of campaign workers, physical assaults on opposition leaders, and coercion of state employees to vote.

Milinkevich and another opposition candidate, Alexander Kazulin, are urging supporters to continue protesting on Minsk's central square. But hopes for a repeat of Ukraine's Orange Revolution, which forced fresh elections after 12 days of mass rallies in Kiev following allegedly fraudulent presidential polls in 2004, appear to be fading fast.

"Now the harsh times are about to start," says Yaroslav Romanchuk, vice chair of the United Civil Party, one of 10 opposition parties that backed Milinkevich. "Many people fear there will be mass arrests once all the foreign observers and journalists leave Belarus. Lukashenko has crossed a line with this election, and we expect him to crack down hard on independent forces now."

Experts say Lukashenko has proven much more adept at controlling the media and hobbling the opposition than his pro-Moscow Ukrainian counterparts in 2004.

In the week before election day, Belarussian police were able to seize all copies of the country's only nonstate daily newspaper, Narodnaya Volya, and to prevent any movement of opposition supporters into the capital to take part in election-day rallies.

DOJ_NMG_0019993

"The only source of information for most people is the state media, in which Lukashenko's opponents' names are never mentioned at all - they are referred to only as 'opposition' or 'so-called democrats,'" says Andrei Bastunets, deputy chair of the independent Belarussian Association of Journalists. "People simply have no sources of alternative information."

The editor of Narodnaya Volya, Svetlana Kolinkina, says she isn't sure whether the paper will ever be allowed to reopen. "This is a police state, with tough repression against any act of protest," she says. "The longer Lukashenko stays in power, the more this country will become a reactionary black hole."

The Struggle For Belarus (WP)

PRESIDENT BUSH'S new national security strategy makes the point that "though tyranny has few advocates, it needs more adversaries." The good news about Belarus's farcical presidential election Sunday is that dictator Alexander Lukashenko has acquired a few. To the long-standing enmity of the Bush administration can be added that of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, whose monitoring mission quickly judged the election as unfair and condemned the "arbitrary use of state power"; the Council of Europe, which called the ballot "a farce"; and the European Union, which said that new sanctions against Mr. Lukashenko and his regime were "very likely."

Most encouraging of all was the appearance in downtown Minsk on Sunday and again last night of thousands of opposition protesters, in spite of snow and a hail of threats by Mr. Lukashenko to break up demonstrations by force. The largest opposition gatherings in his 12 years of rule showed that there is a foundation for a Belarusan freedom movement, like those that eventually triumphed in neighboring Poland and Ukraine.

After years of tolerating a dictatorship on their borders, European countries finally are taking measures against Belarus. Visa sanctions have been applied against some officials of the regime; those now need to be extended to Mr. Lukashenko himself, and complemented with a freeze on bank accounts and other assets. The European Union has begun broadcasting objective news into the country, which could help to counter pervasive censorship. Neighbors such as Lithuania and Slovakia have been working with the opposition, which needs funding for communications and organizing.

All of this might have a decisive impact if not for the countervailing influence of Russia, which still prefers dictatorships in Europe. The new chairman of the Group of Eight -- that would be Russian President Vladimir Putin -- publicly congratulated Mr. Lukashenko yesterday, saying the election "highlighted voters' trust in your course." What of the massive manipulation witnessed by the international election observers? The Kremlin approves of it.

In fact, the G-8 chairman, who has been promoting "energy security" as a topic for discussion during the summit he will proudly host in St. Petersburg, is so pleased with Mr. Lukashenko's government that he is supplying it with gas at one-fifth the price he recently proposed to charge democratic Ukraine. That subsidy, and Russian purchases of the substandard goods of Belarusan state factories, prop up an economy barely changed from the Soviet model. The unambiguous policy of the G-8 chairman is to preserve Russia's domination of its neighbor by backing a dictator who falsifies elections, has murdered leading opponents and enriches himself through arms sales to such countries as Iran and Sudan.

That presumably won't stop President Bush and the six other leaders of Western democracies from toasting their G-8 chairman in St. Petersburg this summer. Too bad the national security strategy seems not to extend that far; Mr. Putin's emerging autocracy also deserves some adversaries.

Recent Shifts Good News For Putin, Russia (AP)

By Henry Meyer, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 21, 2006

The Kremlin may be reclaiming a dominant role in its former Soviet backyard. In Belarus, Moscow-allied strongman Alexander Lukashenko just won re-election by a landslide — at least by the official count. And President Vladimir Putin's allies could return to government in Sunday's Ukrainian parliamentary election, just over a year after the Orange Revolution.

Such developments set back Western hopes of a democratic tidal wave in the former Soviet sphere and could further tarnish Putin's democratic credentials as he tries to cast himself as a statesman capable of brokering deals with Iran and Hamas.

For Putin, however, asserting dominance over Belarus and Ukraine appears to be part of his strategy to re-establish Moscow as a global player during his year of the G-8 presidency.

"Russia wants to restore its superpower status, and that includes putting these countries back into its orbit," said Yevgeny Volk, Moscow director of the conservative U.S think tank Heritage Foundation.

"It is seeking to reclaim its influence over the former Soviet Union, and remove that of the United States and European Union," he added.

DOJ_NMG_0019994

Russia was furious at what it saw as Western encroachment on its home turf after Ukraine's November 2004 Orange Revolution — the mass protests over election fraud that brought reformist opposition leader Viktor Yushchenko to power over the Kremlin's favored candidate, Viktor Yanukovych.

Months later, the impoverished Central Asian nation of Kyrgyzstan had its Tulip Revolution, becoming the third former Soviet state within 18 months to see opposition forces topple a Soviet-era leader. Georgia's Rose Revolution started the process in 2003.

Today, however, Russia is once again on the rise as nervous authoritarian regimes from Kazakhstan to Uzbekistan — where rights groups say government troops killed hundreds of civilians in a crackdown on protesters last year — build closer ties to Moscow, partly as a way to cow opposition forces.

Even in Ukraine, disillusionment at political infighting and the economic collapse that followed the Orange Revolution have brought about a political comeback for Yanukovych, whose rigged victory in the 2004 presidential election was annulled by the Supreme Court.

Enjoying strong support in the Russian-speaking east, his party is poised to win the most seats in the new parliament and earn the right to form the government, even if it will probably need to govern in an uneasy coalition with the party of the pro-Western Yushchenko.

"The West's influence that triumphed in the color revolutions has clearly become a dead end for these nations," said Sergei Markov, a Kremlin-connected political analyst. "In Georgia, Ukraine and Kyrgyzstan, people live worse, not better than before."

By contrast, in Belarus, whose authoritarian president is shunned by Western nations as Europe's last dictator, cheap supplies of Russian gas provide a vital lifeline to the inefficient, state-dominated economy.

Analyst Alexei Malashenko of the Carnegie Moscow Center think tank said on Ekho Moskvy radio that while the Kremlin sometimes had tense relations with Belarus, its greatest interest lay in preserving the status quo in Minsk.

He also said that despite loud Western criticism of the Belarus election, there was no serious attempt to help pro-democratic forces, as happened in Ukraine.

"There was a strong fight for Ukraine, but no one fought for Belarus," Malashenko said.

Analysts agree that Russia's trump card in the region is its immense energy resources. They ensure that despite pro-Western inclinations, both Georgia and Ukraine remain dangerously dependent on their larger neighbor.

Ukraine meanwhile had to swallow a twofold increase in gas prices after a bitter New Year's dispute that saw Moscow turn off the gas taps.

"Russia is using strong economic levers. With the growth of oil and gas exports it has become much richer than it was in the 1990s and it is translating this economic might into political influence and power," said Volk.

At the center of the Russian policy in the region is a determination to resist the West's efforts to boost its influence at Russia's expense, in what Moscow says is falsely portrayed as a bid to promote democracy.

Russia on Monday accused the United States of trying to enforce its vision of democracy on others, angrily rejecting President Bush's criticism that the Kremlin has rolled back freedoms.

Putin To Discuss Oil Pipeline With Chinese (AP)

By Mike Eckel, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 21, 2006

Russian President Vladimir Putin arrived Tuesday for a visit to China that is to include talks on building a pipeline to deliver Siberian oil to fuel China's booming economy — and his fifth meeting in under a year with the Chinese president.

With China's wealth and might on the ascendancy, Putin's meetings with Chinese President Hu Jintao and other officials are expected to be spectacles of symbolism and overtures to Russia's gigantic neighbor.

Officials in both Moscow and Beijing are looking to spur new investment between the former Cold War adversaries and double last year's $29 billion in trade by 2010.

Both Tokyo and Beijing — a leading buyer of Russian oil and gas — have maneuvered hard for the best routing of the 2,550-mile East Siberian-Pacific pipeline. For now, China imports all Russian oil by rail.

China is also Russia's top customer for military weaponry and equipment.

DOJ_NMG_0019995

The two countries have also moved to deepen political ties following years of Cold War suspicion. Both have pledged commitment to a "multipolar world" and last year warned other nations against attempts to dominate global affairs and interfere in sovereign nations' domestic matters.

In an interview with China's official Xinhua News Agency, Putin gave a veiled warning over U.S. policies to encourage democracy in the former Soviet republics, saying that attempts to "forcibly export democracy and impose cultural standards and values" result in conflicts.

"We do not impose our viewpoints by force, we never 'flex our muscles', but instead we consistently advocate political and diplomatic approaches to the settlement of conflicts," Putin was quoted as saying.

Last week, the Bush administration released a foreign policy review that expressed dismay at rollbacks in democratic reform in Russia and warned China against denying personal and political freedoms.

In August, the two countries held unprecedented military exercises, underscoring how far the two former adversaries had come since the 1960s, when they fought border skirmishes.

Chinese Assistant Foreign Minister Li Hui said last week that the two sides will also develop five military projects to highlight "friendly cooperation." He gave no details.

Putin and Hu are also expected to discuss disputes over the Iranian and North Korean nuclear programs.

Russia and China, both veto-wielding members of the U.N. Security Council and longtime supporters of Tehran, want a more cautious approach to reining in Iran's nuclear ambitions. Russia has offered to process uranium for Iran in an attempt to break a stalemate in negotiations.

Russia and China are also participants of six-nation disarmament talks on North Korea's nuclear programs, along with the United States, Japan and South Korea. Negotiations have stalled due mainly to a dispute over U.S. sanctions against North Korea's alleged currency counterfeiting and money laundering.

Russia's Putin To Tackle Energy During China Visit (FT)

By Richard McGregor And Andrew Yeh

Financial Times, March 21, 2006

Vladimir Putin, Russia's president, arrives in China on Tuesday for a visit that Beijing hopes will secure it a decisive advantage over Japan in their lengthy battle to secure the route of an oil pipeline from east Siberia.

Despite booming bilateral trade which reached $29.1bn in 2005, up 37 per cent year-on-year, an energy-hungry China has been increasingly frustrated by Russia's prevarication over various oil and gas deals.

Beijing was angered when Moscow abrogated a 2003 agreement to build a pipeline to Daqing, China's oil capital in the north-east, after Tokyo offered a more attractive financial package to re-route it to a Russian port.

Although the Daqing route is shorter and cheaper, the Japanese proposal gave Russia more options to market the oil throughout north Asia and ensure it did not become totally dependent on China.

However, the pendulum may be swinging back Beijing's way, with China National Petroleum Corp, the country's largest energy company, expected to sign an investment agreement during Mr Putin's two-day trip with Transeft, Russia's oil pipeline monopoly.

"We are full of confidence that the branch pipeline will be built," said Chen Gang, the CNPC chairman, in an interview with the Russian media before the visit.

One possible compromise that has been discussed would see the pipeline go through Daqing to the Chinese port of Dalian, from where the oil could be shipped to South Korea or Japan.

The absence of any pipeline between the two countries means that Russia oil imports, which account for about 5 per cent of China's total foreign purchases, have to come in on an overloaded rail system.

Sergei Razov, Russia's ambassador to Beijing, said in comments before the visit that "energy cooperation was progressing smoothly" and that the pipeline project was being negotiated.

"It's a large-scale project of great vision that requires a high level of investment," he said in a pointed reference to Russia's demand that China pay for most of the project's construction cost.

Mr Razov said Mr Putin's visit takes place when Sino-Russian relations were at "their best time in history."

However, many Chinese officials and commentators are critical about how the warmth in ties between Mr Putin and Hu Jintao, China's president, and other top leaders, have not translated into concrete co-operation.

The Chinese media has characterised the relationship as "hot on the top but cold on the bottom."

"The impetus that improves bilateral relations appears weak due to a lack of communication and understanding and even a misunderstanding between people of the two countries," said the Oriental Morning Post newspaper in Shanghai.

DOJ_NMG_0019996

The two sides may also discuss possible gas sales by Russia, but such talks are not expected to progress very far as long as energy regulations in China keep the domestic price lower than the international price, making any such imports uneconomic.

Mexico Weighs In On Migration (DMN)

By Michelle Mittelstadt

The Dallas Morning News, March 21, 2006

WASHINGTON – Worried by the sometimes harsh tone of the immigration debate unfolding in the U.S., the Mexican government on Monday took its message directly to the American public: As your neighbor, we want to work with you to fashion a solution.

In full-page ads in The New York Times, Washington Post and other newspapers, the Mexican government acknowledged a shared responsibility to address illegal immigration and to stem its citizens' northward exodus by creating more jobs at home.

While continuing to press for a guest worker program that would confer legal work status on millions of Mexicans living illegally in the U.S. – a long-held goal for Mexican President Vicente Fox – Mexico is now outlining its responsibilities. Among them: enforcing its own migration laws; combating human smuggling and criminal networks; securing its southern border; and promoting the return of Mexican émigrés.

For its part, the ad says, the U.S. should allow Mexico to participate in the "design, management, supervision and evaluation" of a guest worker program that should cover "the largest possible number of workers and their families" currently in the U.S. illegally.

The ad campaign, designed by Dallas-based Allyn & Co., reflects a migration resolution approved in February by the Mexican Congress.

"We thought it was about time to have the American people looking firsthand at what's our position on these issues that are so sensitive and important for both countries," Mexican Ambassador Carlos de Icaza said Monday.

"Our message to the American people is that we are your neighbors, we are your friends, this is a common challenge, and we are part of the solution, not only part of the problem," Mr. de Icaza said.

The public relations effort comes as Congress is grappling with the question of how to treat the 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants living in the U.S. – more than half of them Mexican.

While some lawmakers favor giving illegal immigrants work permits and placing them on a path to eventual citizenship, others are pressing for heightened immigration enforcement that would pressure many unauthorized workers to leave the country.

The Senate Judiciary Committee appears poised next week to approve a guest worker program – setting senators on a collision course with the House, which in December approved a tough enforcement-only approach that was silent on President Bush's call for a temporary worker program. With a wide philosophical chasm between the chambers and within the Republican Party, the chances of an immigration accord this year are slim, many experts say.

The Senate immigration subcommittee chairman, Texas Republican John Cornyn, pressed Monday for a comprehensive immigration accord including increased enforcement and a guest worker program.

Failure to do so would increase the dangers posed by drug- and human-smuggling networks and leave the country vulnerable to terrorism, Mr. Cornyn said in a speech to the World Affairs Council of Dallas/Fort Worth.

"I am not against immigration, I am against illegal immigration," Mr. Cornyn said.

The Mexican ambassador voiced concern with the tone of the immigration debate, which has proved to be a hot topic on talk radio, cable TV news shows and in public forums.

"It's a very emotional debate. And sometimes the debate is encouraging, but on other times, it's discouraging," Mr. de Icaza said. "So we thought it was about time to directly make known which is our position in black and white, written on paper."

In a speech Monday in Cleveland, Mr. Bush renewed his case for a guest worker program matched with tougher border enforcement and sanctions on employers who hire illegal workers.

Asked about immigration during a question-and-answer session, Mr. Bush said the debate "can get harsh."

"My call for people is to be rational about the debate and thoughtful about what words can mean during this debate," he said.

Mr. Bush, Mr. Fox and Canada's new prime minister, Stephen Harper, meet at the end of the month in Cancún, Mexico, to discuss security and economic issues.

Morgan's Chief Economist Warns Against Tariffs On Chinese Imports (WSJ)

By Jason Dean

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0019997

BEIJING -- Morgan Stanley Chief Economist Stephen S. Roach said Tuesday that a successful move by the U.S. Congress to pass sweeping tariffs on imports from China would be "close to economic suicide" for the U.S.

U.S. Senators Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.) and Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.) have proposed a bill that would impose 27.5% tariffs on all Chinese imports unless Beijing sharply revalues its currency. The senators, who are in China this week, have argued that Beijing keeps the yuan's value artificially low, making its exports unfairly cheap and exacerbating a huge U.S. trade deficit with China. A vote on the bill could come next week.

Mr. Roach, in Beijing for meetings with Chinese officials, told reporters Tuesday that he believes that bill would easily pass in the Senate, and could well pass in the House of Representatives as well. He also said he believes the U.S. Treasury Department appears increasingly likely to label China a currency manipulator during an upcoming review.

He said the tariffs proposed by Sens. Schumer and Graham would be a "horrible mistake" that could prompt Beijing to cut back on purchases of U.S. treasuries, leading to a weaker dollar and higher interest rates.

"I do think that the political climate with respect to U.S.-China trade tensions is as bad as I have ever seen it," said Mr. Roach, who said he's been observing the bilateral relationship for two decades. "At a time when the U.S. is more dependent on foreign capital than ever before, to impose tariffs not just on a major provider of goods, but a major lender of capital, I think would be close to economic suicide."

French Protesters Set Strike Date (NYT)

By Craig R. Smith

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

PARIS, March 20 — French students and unions stepped up pressure on the government today, calling for more demonstrations culminating in strikes next week to fight a hotly contested new labor law that makes it easier for companies to fire young employees.

The protesters set March 28 as the fourth "day of action" since street rallies over the new job rules began Feb. 7.

"There was a consensus from the beginning," said Coralie Caron, head of a federation of high school students. "The 28th is going to be like a very large protest everywhere in France."

President Jacques Chirac repeated calls for dialogue between the government and opponents of the law, saying the new edict could be "improved."

Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin, meanwhile, met with business leaders, unemployed youths and students in an effort to find a way out of the impasse that threatens to cripple his political career. The business leaders warned against any rollback in the legislation, saying that could slow the revamping of the nation's labor markets for months, if not years.

But the government hinted at some room for negotiation.

"He is ready to go further than this," a spokesman for Mr. de Villepin said today. "If there are proposals from the unions, he is ready to study them."

The battle over an incremental change in the country's social contract is emblematic of the overwhelming challenge facing much of Western Europe as it tries to loosen rigid labor laws and trim costly entitlements that have built up in the decades since their hybrid capitalist-socialist economic systems emerged after World War II.

Governments recognize the need for fundamental change, particularly as their societies age and the burden of pensions and health care balloon. But few have the political will to force those changes on their societies.

So far, Mr. de Villepin has rebuffed calls to revoke the law. Yet he hasn't demonstrated the iron hand of Margaret Thatcher, who broke the control of British unions and pushed for a more flexible labor market in order to create a competitive Britain.

The French unions have refused to cooperate with Mr. de Villepin.

"For now, the unions reject the government's conditions for a dialogue," said a representative of the C.F.T.C., one of the country's union syndicates, adding that both the unions and the students are demanding that the new contract rules be suspended before talks with the government begin.

"Without this condition, we won't do anything," the union representative said.

Though French unions account for less than 10 percent of the country's work force, their concentration in the public sector, particularly in transportation, gives them the ability to wreak havoc on daily life, putting enormous pressure on the government.

Mr. de Villepin has made three proposals "within the framework of the law," according to his spokesman, who said that rescinding the law, as demanded by student and union leaders, is not really possible.

Those proposals, meant to soften the impact of the new contract rules, include designating a mentor for young employees hired under the new law, a six-month review to give those employees a sense of how they are doing, and free training if they are fired.

DOJ_NMG_0019998

"We have to give the C.P.E, a chance," Mr. de Villepin said in an interview with the monthly student magazine, Citato, published today. He was referring to France's "first employment contract," known as C.P.E.

"Everybody knows it's impossible to continue with this model, but nobody in France has found a solution to respond to the problem," said Jean-Daniel Levy, a director at Paris-based polling company CSA. "What they've been able to do is define what they don't want, but they have trouble saying what it is they want."

The new law, passed by Parliament earlier this month, would allow companies to hire people under 26 for a two-year trial period, during which the young workers could easily be fired. It is intended to open up full-time jobs for people entering the work force.

Because of France's heavily regulated labor market, many companies now prefer to hire temporary workers rather than risk putting on the payroll inexperienced people they would not easily be able to lay off. As a result, unemployment among the youth is more than double the national average of about 10 percent. Joblessness is even higher among the second-generation immigrant youth who were behind widespread rioting last fall.

The standoff threatens to weaken Mr. de Villepin, a diplomat and poet, at a time when he wants to be consolidating power for next year's presidential elections, which he hopes to win. Already, his approval rating has plunged to the lowest level since he took over the job last May.

A survey last week by CSA found that two out of three French people are against the labor law.

The Decline Of France (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

The right to assemble is a pillar of free society. But in France it's the only pillar its citizens seem to take seriously. So much so that any public debate of import gets conducted in the streets rather than through the ballot box or institutions of a purportedly mature democracy.

In less enlightened societies, as opposed to the birthplace of the Enlightenment, that's usually called mob rule. But the violent street demonstrations roiling France's cities today, and the unhappy career prospects of Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin, are the latest symptoms of an ailing democracy.

The troubles began with student unhappiness about a new "First Job Contract" law, adopted by the National Assembly two weeks ago. They grew into a protest movement once the unions joined in. A nationwide strike has been called for next Tuesday. The merit of the new law isn't the issue here. One can hate the new law as well as the tactics employed by the mobs to kill it. The bill is designed to reduce the youth jobless rate of 23%. But if France wants to reverse a 30-year pattern of low growth and high unemployment, it needs to tear down labor law barriers across the board, not just for people under the age of 26.

Reasonable people could have had a spirited debate about this policy. So why didn't they before the jobs contract became the law of the land? Parliaments and elections exist so complicated issues can be digested and decisions calmly taken. France went from little discussion to protests in central Paris, blockades at the Sorbonne and a rampage through a McDonald's restaurant. That's "civic discourse"?

The masses on the streets reply that this is the only way to fight a sclerotic political system, and the claim isn't without merit. MPs and the president face voters only every five years. The National Assembly is notoriously unresponsive to voter concerns, though the chicken-and-egg problem is that citizens don't bother even to try to sway their representatives. The jobs bill was pushed through using a special procedure that allowed for little debate or amendment. It is the brainchild of Mr. de Villepin, an official chosen by party rule and heir apparent to deeply unpopular Jacques Chirac.

The roots of the problem go back further. The French have never shied away from guillotining aloof rulers, from Louis XVI to, more figuratively, Charles de Gaulle. Lesser men have fallen to nationwide protests, and Mr. de Villepin may be next. All these small revolutions were inspired by the French Revolution, but France never managed to establish a political system both durable and flexible.

How instructive it would be to send Alexis de Tocqueville through France today. He'd find dependence on the state and the absence of individualism, symbolized by the low levels of private charity and civic engagement. He would not find the bounty of groups and lobbies of healthier democracies. "In every case, at the head of any new undertaking, where in France you would find the government," Tocqueville's "Democracy in America" asserts, "in the United States you are sure to find an association."

Yes, the banners of student groups add color to the street demonstrations. But look closer. The force with real bite is the public-sector employee unions. Blue-collar workers long ago abandoned the union movement, leaving civil servants who, like Charles de Gaulle once said of France's cosseted farmers, are desperate to hold on to their "mediocre but secure" posts.

The government workforce -- one-quarter of the population -- can terrorize the majority by stopping the trains or turning off the electricity. In other words, the state funds its own opposition, which torpedoes even modest efforts to modernize France. By marching with the public-sector unions to defend this status quo, the boys and girls of the Sorbonne are saying they want to be

"mediocre but secure," too. What a dream for a 20-year-old. And a useful warning to Americans about the danger of giving public-sector unions too much power as well.

In its post-Revolutionary history, France has been characterized simultaneously by instability and immobility. In the 217 years that America has lived under a single Constitutional order, France has been ruled by 10 different regimes. Yet the France of de Gaulle's "Fifth Republic" has had fewer leaders -- five -- than the Soviet Union did by the time of its dissolution in 1991. Stability and dynamism are surely a better formula for a successful state. And the only proven way to get there is a stronger democracy.

Nicolas Sarkozy, a presidential candidate, wants to make the president more directly accountable by removing the rule against his speaking before the Assembly. Others are calling for a new constitution to replace the current one, which was designed in the troubled days of 1958. A real parliament would help. France's growing protests make the case for a constitutional rethink. When the thousands on the street assert the right to make laws for the millions, a country loses its right to call itself a "democratic republic."

Soft Landing For The Danish, A Job Loss Can Be Learning Experience (WSJ)

By Marcus Walker

The Wall Street Journal, March 21, 2006

HJORRING, Denmark -- After graduating from high school, Susanne Olsen spent 10 years at the local slaughterhouse hacking ham off dead pigs. It was arduous, unskilled work that left her ill-equipped for most other jobs.

Then the slaughterhouse closed down last year, leaving 500 people without jobs in a small town that had recently lost its biscuit factory and its mobile-phone factory. All three employers were striving to cut their labor costs amid rising competition from low-wage Eastern Europe and Asia.

But unlike millions of laid-off workers in similar circumstances elsewhere in Europe, Ms. Olsen was sure she was going to find a new job. Now she's an apprentice golf landscaper, with her salary subsidized by the state while she takes four years of training paid for by the government and her new employer. "I miss my old colleagues, but I don't miss the pigs at all," Ms. Olsen says.

Most of Western Europe is fighting to hold on to its traditionally strong job protections while in some cases cutting jobless benefits, as the region struggles to compete in a globalized economy. Denmark has gone the other way.

The government allows liberal hiring and firing as in the U.S. And it has imposed limits on the duration of its high unemployment benefits. But it also invests more than any other country, as a percentage of its gross domestic product, in retraining the jobless -- a combination it calls "flexicurity." Its unusual mix of the free market and big government has helped Denmark cut its unemployment rate in half, from about 10% in the early 1990s to U.S.-style levels of under 5% now. The economy has been relatively robust, growing 3.4% last year. Meanwhile, France and Germany are at or above the Danish jobless rate of a decade ago.

Even though Danes are among the most easily laid-off workers in Europe, polls show the country's workers are the most secure about their future. The European Commission now holds up Denmark as a model for other countries to try to follow. Politicians from other EU countries have made numerous study trips to Copenhagen. France has cited Denmark as a model for its own more modest labor-law reforms, which in recent days have touched off mass public protests.

Meanwhile, Danes change jobs more frequently than any workers in the developed world except Americans and Australians, says the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development. But fewer than 10% say they're concerned about job security, compared with nearly 40% in Germany and more than 60% in Spain. Most Danes believe they can always find work in their fluid labor market. In the interim, they get security from a dole that replaces up to nine-tenths of their last wage, the highest level in Europe.

Critics say the experiment might not be easy to replicate. For one thing, Denmark is small, with just 5.4 million people. And close-knit Scandinavian countries historically have had a higher tolerance for taxes. The system isn't cheap: Denmark spends about 4.4% of its GDP every year on supporting and retraining the jobless, the most expensive labor-market policy in the world. That and Denmark's other welfare generosity keep income taxes sky-high. Tax revenues take up half of gross domestic product, second only to Sweden.

Not everyone benefits equally. Annabeth Garvold, a university graduate who was jobless for much of 2003, says the state computer-training course she took was too basic to be useful, though the program did place her in three months of subsidized work at a tech company, through which she found a job. Workers retrained for new industries also aren't guaranteed to find salaries as good as their old ones. Ms. Olsen's golf-course wage, which started at $20 an hour, won't rise as high as the nearly $30 an hour she made butchering pigs, she says.

Meanwhile, immigrants, including many Muslims, have significantly higher unemployment rates and are unemployed for longer than the native-born, just as in other European countries. Such tensions boiled over when a Danish newspaper published provocative cartoons of the prophet Muhammad, a controversy that has become global.

Denmark has long been accustomed to flexible hiring and firing, agreed between unions and employers back in 1898 in exchange for unions' rights to organize and strike. Rising prosperity in the post-World War II era allowed the state to pay generous benefits to the jobless, the sick, early retirees, parents, and anyone who wanted to take a break from work.

But by the early 1990s, Denmark, like many European welfare states, found itself supporting a rising number of working-age people who lived comfortably on welfare and had little incentive to find jobs. Social problems grew: The children of the unemployed grew up to be unemployed. "Welfare dependency developed into a social state of mind," says Helle Seerup, a labor-market expert at the Danish trade union confederation.

In 1994, the center-left government of Prime Minister Poul Nyrup Rasmussen scrapped indefinite benefits for the unemployed, who suddenly faced state pressure to actively seek work. The prime minister's close ties to trade unions helped him to win acceptance for the change.

The present center-right government, under Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen, has tightened the system further. If a person hasn't found work after a year, their consultant "activates" them, proposing specific training or work experience -- and reducing benefits if they don't comply.

Denmark's different regions run the policy with variations, constantly experimenting and tweaking the system as officials learn what works. The nationwide success rate: About two-thirds of Danes who are laid off have a new job within a year, say labor-market specialists.

The state is so determined to get Danes off the dole that it sometimes designs and funds entire new college courses just to fill a small number of jobs. In the cramped corridors of the Public Employment Service for the Copenhagen area, labor consultant Kim Jorgensen has arranged for a business school to run three courses in the past three years in how to program the business software system Microsoft Axapta, at a cost of $160,000 to the taxpayer. In total, 16 unemployed people were trained this way to fill specific vacancies.

Mudassar Qureshi, 28 years old, couldn't find a job when he graduated from university two years ago. He says his computer-science diploma was too general for employers, who wanted specialists. The Axapta course led to a job at a local software company, HOB Business Solutions, which taught part of the course. For the first half-year at HOB, almost 40% of Mr. Qureshi's starting salary of $3,700 a month was paid by the state. The subsidy led HOB to hire two subsidized trainees instead of one expensive veteran. "It helped to bridge the mental jump of taking on two guys who are inexperienced," said the company's chief executive, Hasse Bergman.

In the same cramped Copenhagen building as the consultants, Kirsten Thomsen prepares the "bottleneck analysis" that makes Denmark's peculiar hybrid possible, in which a big, active government helps the free labor market to flow better. Every three months, Ms. Thomsen has the U.S.-based polling firm Gallup survey employers in the Copenhagen area on what jobs they will need in coming years, and uses the feedback to identify the next labor shortages. Right now they're short of lots of skilled workers, from hospital X-ray technicians to "smorrebrods maids" -- women who prepare Denmark's traditional version of the smorgasbord.

The consultants who deal directly with unemployed people use her reports in picking training courses for individuals. "In our system, we can make supply and demand match," Ms. Thomsen says.

The true test is how the system deals with low-skilled, manual laborers in declining industries. The staff at Ms. Olsen's slaughterhouse in Hjørring, in Denmark's thinly populated far-north, tried hard to persuade the plant's owner, Danish Crown, to keep it open. They even released a protest song called "You Can't Slaughter Us," which made it onto national TV, and features 200 burly meatpackers in blue overalls singing en masse with a rock-band backing.

But Denmark's easy layoff rules meant the plant was doomed. Local workers cost the company more than $32 an hour. Rival German slaughterhouse labor costs only $16 an hour, while Polish workers cost only $6 an hour, according to Danish Crown. Even German slaughterhouses increasingly use migrant Polish meatpackers to keep their costs down. In recent years Danish Crown has opened two slaughterhouses in northern Germany, at which it employs teams of Poles.

Finding new work for the 500 laid off at Hjørring in the May 2005 shutdown was a double challenge. Most of the workers didn't want to leave their home town. Danes are very rooted people, says Jan Winther, Danish Crown's director of human resources: "If a new job is more than an hour away, Danes say it's too far." In addition, the meatpackers weren't qualified for new employment, says Jim Jensen, a negotiator for the Danish foodworkers' union NNF. "Slaughterhouse workers are not skilled, except that they can get up early and work hard," he says.

Danish Crown went beyond state requirements and paid shop steward Jorn Katballe to stay at Hjørring for a year and help his laid-off colleagues find new jobs. To Mr. Katballe, the task seemed huge at first. "People who've given 20 or 30 years and they've not learned anything else, it's difficult to get them out into the real world," he says.

Standing before the desolate single-story redbrick slaughterhouse, Mr. Katballe looks mournfully at the boarded-up gap in the wall where the pigs used to be brought in. "Normally, by this time in the morning, there were hundreds of people around," he says. He's still up at 5 a.m. each day himself by habit of his old job. "It's like a light in my head that goes 'ding,' " he says.

Despite Hjorring's spate of large-scale factory closures, new vacancies keep appearing in Denmark's flexible labor market. Working with the public-labor consultants, Mr. Katballe has been sending his ex-colleagues in ones and twos to new employers.

Where qualifications are lacking, the state pays for courses at vocational colleges, often sharing the cost with a new employer, and in a few cases even with help from the old employer, Danish Crown. The company invested $9,800 to pay for a one-year diploma in hairdressing for a female former employee. Hairdressing was not on public officials' list of job bottlenecks, but there was a vacancy in town.

In most cases the Public Employment Service was willing to pay for new qualifications because of the scale of the town's layoffs. Two of the former meatpackers, including Ms. Olsen, have ended up working at golf courses. Another became a carpenter. Several have gone to work in Denmark's large wind-energy industry. Two were trained as oil workers on North Sea platforms. Others have become gardeners, security guards, and even computer technicians

Finn Larsen, 46, is training to be a school teacher in math, physics, chemistry and sports. His former job was to slit pigs' throats with knives. "It was tough work on the slaughter line, but we had a good team spirit," Mr. Larsen says.

Even though he will be 49 when he qualifies as a teacher, the state agreed to pay for his books and other costs at Hjorring's teacher training college. The state is paying Mr. Larsen benefits of $2,400 a month for four years to help support his family while he retrains. Although there are no vacancies in Hjorring now, other teachers' retirement will create a shortage by 2009, according to labor officials' bottleneck analysis for the area.

Since becoming a meatpacker 12 years ago, Mr. Larsen has had little use for math, other than helping his two daughters with their homework. "Of course I am a bit rusty," he says. But Mr. Larsen is already being deployed in schools as a trainee teacher, recently teaching algebra to 14-year-olds for several weeks' work experience.

Ten months after the slaughterhouse closed, some 300 ex-workers have found new professions in addition to the 80 who got other jobs as meatpackers. Others from Hjørring are in full-time education, or chose retirement where close to the age of 60. Today, only 60 of the 500 laid-off workers from Hjørring are still on unemployment benefits.

Britain Moves Toward A Ban On Secret Loans (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

LONDON, March 20 -- The government of Prime Minister Tony Blair on Monday proposed banning secret loans to political parties to try to end a financing scandal blamed for sending Blair's popularity ratings to record lows.

Charles Falconer, the cabinet minister in charge of the judiciary, said he would immediately seek to amend campaign finance laws to force political parties to disclose who lends them money. "The system has not been cleaned up enough and we need to change it," he said.

Blair's Labor Party said Friday that it had accepted loans worth more than $24 million from unidentified donors. Under British law, political parties must disclose the source of donations, but they do not have to declare the source of loans.

Blair has been badly hurt by recent disclosures that several wealthy businessmen who privately lent money to his campaign were then recommended for seats in the House of Lords, the upper house of Parliament.

The appearance that seats in the House of Lords were up for sale -- an allegation Blair has denied -- has caused critics to call his government as sleazy as the Conservative government of former prime minister John Major, which Blair ousted in 1997.

Back then, Blair promised to run a government "purer than pure," a statement that increasing numbers of critics are throwing back at him.

Noticeably quiet in the debate has been the opposition Conservative Party, which also appears to have benefited from secret loans from wealthy supporters. Some analysts here said Blair sanctioned the lending simply to keep pace with money the Conservatives were receiving.

Challenged by Labor officials, Conservatives have not yet announced how much money in undisclosed loans the party received last year, nor have they listed the donors.

Thomas Strathclyde, the Conservative leader in the House of Lords, said Monday that the government's move to change the funding rules now was like a burglar "caught in a back garden with a bag of swag, saying he only wanted to polish the silver."

DOJ_NMG_0020002

"I have no sympathy at all for the prime minister and his coterie of cronies who are at the heart of this affair," Strathclyde said. "They have dragged politics, their party and sadly this house into disrepute."

Other conservatives joined Labor in seeking new transparent campaign financing rules.

The Labor Party on Monday decided to make public a list of wealthy donors who lent money to its campaign. The list included a $4 million loan from property developer David Garrard, and $3.5 million loans from retail magnate Richard Caring and from Trade and Industry Minister David Sainsbury. Sainsbury is a member of one of the country's wealthiest families, which owns a supermarket chain.

The loans were ostensibly to be paid back, but critics contended that they would quietly be turned into donations.

Two polls published Sunday offered more bad news for Blair.

A YouGov poll for the Sunday Times put Blair's personal approval rating at 36 percent -- its lowest point in his tenure. A separate poll commissioned by the Sunday Telegraph indicated that 73 percent of voters believe Blair's government is "as sleazy or sleazier" than Major's.

The scandal has added fuel to the public debate about when Blair, now in his ninth year in office, should step down.

The prime minister has declared that he will not seek a fourth term and indicated that he wants Gordon Brown, his chancellor of the exchequer, or finance minister, to succeed him. In recent months, there has been growing speculation that Blair will resign to turn the office over to Brown well before 2010, the latest year in which the next election could be held.

A poll for the BBC, released Monday, showed that 50 percent of British voters want Blair to quit either right away or within the next 12 months.

An editorial in the Guardian newspaper, a longtime supporter of Blair's party, said Monday that the prime minister "should go this year."

"Undercover loans from uncertain sources degrade him both personally and politically," adding to his other missteps, including the Iraq war, which is extremely unpopular among the British public, the editorial said.

Rodney Barker, a political scientist at the London School of Economics, said Blair's current problems "make it more likely he will go sooner than later."

Drawing a comparison to lame-duck presidents in the United States, Barker said he saw Blair as a "molting prime minister who is losing a few more feathers every day."

Barker said the loan scandal has hurt Blair, but the Iraq war hurt him more.

"I wouldn't be surprised if he went this summer," Barker said. But he added that history has shown that leaders worldwide tend to want to "hang on and on and on."

Thai Leader Digs In As Protest Swells (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, March 21, 2006

BANGKOK -- For several weeks, Thai Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra has faced nightly demonstrations demanding his ouster. Tens of thousands of protesters have crowded into the capital, joining ranks with brown-robed monks, Chinese opera performers and tribal children in colorful costumes.

Set initially against the towers of the Grand Palace and more recently outside Government House -- the princely villa the prime minister uses for his offices -- the spectacle so far has remained peaceful, though the potential for violence is growing as Thaksin refuses to budge.

No matter what the outcome, the persistent protests have marked a stunning reversal of fortune for Thaksin, a cellular telephone and marketing tycoon who attained such popularity during his first term that he was reelected in a landslide just last year.

"We're in uncharted territory," said Abhisit Vejjajiva, the leader of the opposition Democrat Party. "This is the first time we've seen mass protests concerning the legitimacy of a person who's been elected."

Simmering discontent, particularly among Bangkok's middle class and intellectuals, turned to outrage two months ago after Thaksin's family sold its controlling interest in the Shin Corp. telecommunications empire to a Singapore investment company for $1.9 billion. Critics said Thaksin, already the country's wealthiest man, had improperly used his influence to enrich himself.

To calm the uproar, Thaksin has called snap elections for April. Meanwhile, even though the kingdom's electoral system remains healthy compared with most in Southeast Asia, its cultural and political divisions have plunged Thailand into crisis.

In the largely impoverished countryside, Thaksin's populist policies have brought him tremendous loyalty. But in Bangkok, the modern capital, many people expect more from democracy than elections. Thaksin's foes accuse him of progressively undermining the parliament, mass media and other checks on his power.

Opposition parties, deeming elections a losing proposition, have announced a boycott of the vote. At the same time, the anti-Thaksin protests have gained momentum since the prime minister's onetime mentor, Chamlong Srimuang, moved to the forefront.

"In this country, we expect ethics from our prime minister," the ascetic former general said during a recent rally. Chamlong introduced Thaksin to politics after leading a 1992 popular uprising against military rule. Now he heads the Dharma Army, associated with a Buddhist splinter group, and dresses in simple blue garments.

Thaksin insists that Thailand's constitution lays out a clear solution in the form of a popular vote. His aides, while clearly taken aback by the extent of the uprising, blame it on old-time politicians and public employees embittered by government reforms.

"The opposition should come back and play the game and join the election. You have to accept the rules," said Suranand Vejjajiva, a minister in Thaksin's cabinet.A Falling-Out

For years, Thaksin has been accustomed to scripting his own dramas. In the fall of 2003, Thailand hosted the presidents of the United States, Russia and China at the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit in Bangkok, and Thaksin welcomed them in grand style.

As dignitaries from 21 countries watched, a nighttime procession of 50 royal barges floated down the Chao Phraya River, rowed by 2,000 oarsmen. Across the river rose the illuminated facade of the Grand Palace and its glittering temples. Monks chanted, and hundreds of lanterns drifted skyward.

"All the world's leaders were captivated by Thai history and by the Thai leader," said Thitinan Pongsudhirak, a political analyst at Chulalongkorn University. "Thaksin was sky-high. He was untouchable at home and seen as bold and credible abroad."

Thailand's economy was among the fastest-growing in Asia, and Thaksin declared that the country would be a benefactor to its poorer neighbors in Indochina. By the end of 2003, President Bush had officially recognized Thailand as a major non-NATO ally. But within months, cracks appeared. A Muslim insurrection in southern Thailand erupted, and the government seemed at a loss how to respond.

Thaksin's deftness after the December 2004 tsunami led to his decisive reelection, but grievances continued to mount. Detractors criticized the military's brutal response to the insurgency and official efforts to muzzle the news media.

Still, it took a falling-out between Thaksin and a former business associate, the media mogul Sondhi Limthongkul, to bring people into the street.

"The irony is I used to support him," recalled the tall, bespectacled Sondhi. "I naively trusted him when he told me, 'I'm rich and wealthy and want to do something for the country.' But he does everything for himself, his family and his cronies."

Sondhi hosted a talk show on state-owned television and had used it as a platform to defend Thaksin. But last fall, he criticized Thaksin's business dealings during a broadcast. The show was canceled, so Sondhi took his critique to the streets, staging rallies that drew hundreds, then thousands, of people.

The sale of Shin Corp. to Temasek Holdings of Singapore fueled the nascent movement. Critics alleged that Thaksin had pushed through a change in foreign ownership laws, that his family had avoided paying taxes on the transaction and that the sale betrayed his credentials as an economic nationalist.

"It went against everything Thaksin stood for," said Thitinan, the political analyst.

The prime minister said the sale was legal and motivated by his desire to eliminate any conflict of interest in retaining the business.

"When the prime minister sold his shares, people didn't understand it was a private matter," said Suranand, the cabinet minister. "We were quite off-message at first."Rural Loyalty

In the Thai heartland, Thaksin's performance is seen through an entirely different prism. In late January, eager to display his popularity, the prime minister spent five days in the poor northeastern province of Roi Et, instructing television cameramen to follow as he counseled villagers, drove a tractor and camped in an army tent.

In advance of his arrival in Nonsomboon village, authorities cleared away debris and repaired the dirt road. Local women were paid to cook a repast of prawns, fish and straw-baked chicken. Though the scene was partly contrived, the villagers' affection for Thaksin seemed genuine.

Thaksin had long targeted rural voters with his policies. Among them are a health program that provides medical care for 75 cents and a revolving fund offering small loans.

"I like his good heart," said Orn Pancharee, 67, as she and her sister sat outside their stilted wooden house, their faces deeply etched from years of rice farming.

DOJ_NMG_0020004

"Because of him, if I go to the doctor, I don't have to pay much," said Orn's sister, Thongsai Yothanan, 73. "Since Thaksin became prime minister, we get compensated for damages when our rice paddies flood. Before him, never."

The sisters said they had heard little about the Shin Corp. sale and understood even less.

"For us, it's not important," Thongsai said as chickens pecked in the dirt nearby. "I watched the television news, and I feel pity for him."

Orn nodded in agreement.

"Previous prime ministers never visited the countryside," she said. "He's the best because he cares about the poor."

Ethiopia Gripped By Fear Of Regime (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, March 21, 2006

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia -- A climate bordering on fear has taken hold of the Ethiopian capital as journalists, lawyers and politicians carefully measure their public remarks and contacts in the face of widespread arrests and prosecutions.

"Oh, no, that would not be wise," said a law professor when asked if a reporter could observe a class where students were to discuss the ongoing trial of 131 opposition leaders, publishers, journalists and human rights activists. Despite boasting about the openness of debate in his class, the professor declined to give his name.

The defendants face charges of attempted genocide, treason and "crimes committed against the constitution" -- which is punishable by death -- stemming largely from protests against elections last year.

Tens of thousands more have been arrested on a variety of charges, according to Amnesty International, most of these stemming from violent political demonstrations in November. Advocates say it is impossible to know how many are still being held.

Human Rights Watch offers anecdotal reports of farmers denied fertilizer and seed because of their political affiliations, nighttime sweeps by federal police and beatings at checkpoints.

Most independent newspapers have been shut down. The few remaining news outlets carefully tailor their coverage to not run afoul of stringent government censorship. The longtime Associated Press correspondent was expelled last month. And visas are rarely issued to human rights advocates or investigators.

In its annual human rights survey this month, the State Department reported a sharp increase in civil rights violations by the Ethiopian government during 2005.

"We can say we've regressed since the May elections; there is no independent voice in Ethiopia right now," said Yoseph Badwaza, chief of the monitoring division of the Ethiopian Human Rights Council, which lost three senior investigators when warrants were issued for their arrest.

He said critics of the government are subject to intimidation, and many are arrested without charges, denied access to lawyers or contact with their families, and tried by judges who are "not independent."

"This is a dictatorship in the guise of democracy," Mr. Badwaza said. "The recent crackdown is not the first of its kind, but we've never witnessed such widespread punishment and retribution."

The turning point was the November general strike, called by frustrated members of the Coalition for Unity and Democracy (CUD), an opposition umbrella group.

The CUD and other opposition parties had captured an unprecedented 220 seats in the 547-member Parliament, up from 12 seats previously, but felt cheated out of an absolute majority despite the finding of international observer groups that the election was generally fair.

Politicians advocated peaceful resistance, but protest demonstrations in June led to 36 deaths and another 46 were killed in the three days of protests in November, including seven policemen and soldiers. More than 100 were injured.

In an interview with The Washington Times last month, Prime Minister Meles Zenawi defended the use of force, but said a government inquiry would release its findings, possibly in April.

The Bush administration has carefully modulated its criticism of Addis Ababa, reluctant to alienate a strategically located country of more than 60 million people that is an avowed ally in the war on terrorism. That has frustrated some European diplomats and many Ethiopians, who had hoped for a more outspoken response.

"The last year or so has been one of promise and disappointment," said a U.S. diplomat in Addis Ababa, acknowledging that the government "has been operating more or less as a one-party state."

Mr. Meles came to power with the military defeat of Mengistu Haile Mariam's communist administration in 1991. His backing comes mainly from the Tigreans, an ethnic group in northern Ethiopia that allied itself with the Eritreans' decades-long struggle that ended with independence for Eritrea.

DOJ_NMG_0020005

The opposition is centered on the nation's Amhara ethnic group, who have traditionally ruled Ethiopia; they are supported in the south by the Oromos, long oppressed by successive Ethiopian regimes.

Mr. Meles took office with promises to rebuild a shattered economy and transform the country into a model of democracy.

His government has made strides, especially by the yardstick of eastern Africa: International observers gave the May elections high marks for the quality of open debate between the parties, and the apparent lack of coercion at the polls.

But while the opposition parties have become a much larger bloc in the parliament, they say the rules of procedure have changed to make it harder for them to air their issues.

Beyene Petros, chairman of the United Ethiopian Democratic Forces party, says the ruling party has silenced them with a rule change that requires 51 percent agreement to introduce any issue. "And when we do have a question period, they cut it off after maybe 15 minutes," he said in an interview.

Politicians aligned with the CUD also say they cannot work effectively, with their offices shuttered and party leaders under arrest. Jailed CUD candidates include the mayor-elect of Addis Ababa, a former prosecutor in the U.N. tribunal for Rwanda and a former high court judge.

Extraditing Charles Taylor (NYT)

The New York Times, March 21, 2006

Last week, Liberia's new president, Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, called for Nigeria to extradite the former president and warlord Charles Taylor to face war crimes charges. Mr. Taylor, who has been living in a Nigerian government guesthouse since 2003, is wanted on a range of charges relating to his decade-long West African rampage, which unleashed campaigns of torture, rape and dismemberment in Ivory Coast and Sierra Leone and on his home turf, Liberia.

In a just world, Mr. Taylor would have already been tried, condemned and sent up the river.

But the world has never been just, and this case is complicated. When Mr. Taylor was under siege by rebel forces in 2003, the United States, Britain and Nigeria arranged for him to get asylum in Nigeria, under the correct assumption that his quick exile would reduce the bloodshed. Nigeria gave Mr. Taylor a safe harbor on the condition that he stop sending his minions out to rape, pillage and plunder.

A report last year gave some weight to the argument that Mr. Taylor hadn't stopped his bad ways. The Coalition for International Justice charges that Mr. Taylor tried to destabilize Liberia, influence last year's elections and build a regional army. Specifics are vague, but it is true that Mr. Taylor's ex-wife, Jewel, was elected to the Liberian legislature in the same elections that swept Ms. Johnson Sirleaf to power.

There's no law against Jewel Taylor's running for office. And it's tempting to think that it may be better just to let this sleeping dog lie. After all, Mr. Taylor still has many loyalists in Liberia with no qualms about taking to the streets again.

But Ms. Johnson Sirleaf is taking a courageous, very risky step. It is incumbent upon America and Europe, which say they support justice in West Africa, to make sure that she and the new Liberian government get the necessary security aid, including United Nations troops if necessary, to handle any pro-Taylor backlash.

For West Africans, who have endured more than a decade of war, there's no justice without peace.
